Laymen Hold Church on Wheels

Cincinnati Knights Templars Conduct Services While Traveling to Denver — Brotherhood Men Plan Chapel for China.

CINCINNATI—En route to Denver to the triennial conclave Cincinnati's Knights Templars enjoyed a gospel service on wheels. One of the cars of their train was fitted as a chapel, equipped with hymn books and all needed literature. The services were conducted by the prelate of Trinity commandery, Sir H. A. Weeks, a Presbyterian layman and one of the active members of Pleasant Ridge chapter of the brotherhood.

Brotherhood laymen are taking charge of the Sabbath evening service at the new Oakley church during the absence of the supply, Horace Orr of Lane Seminary.

At the August meeting of Norwood chapter of the brotherhood it was resolved to put through the plan to build a $500 chapel in China—one of the projects dear to the heart of E. F. Evans, who was so tragically killed at Bay Bridge a few weeks ago. The meeting resolved itself into a memorial for the late president of the union of the brotherhood and an early president of the Norwood chapter.

Among visiting clericals of Presbyterian faith during the vacation period were Henry S. Brown of Lake View, Chicago; Rev. W. R. Spurlock of Corcoran, Cal.; Rev. W. H. Crothers of Logan, Utah, and Rev. W. M. Reese of Struthers, Ohio.

Vacation time finds no closed Presbyterian churches, but a large number of pulpits are supplied while pastors are circulating among the rest spots. In the suburban fields union outdoor Sabbath evening services have once more proved their popularity.

During the absence of Dr. Robert Watson, Rev. T. W. Rainey of First church, Newport, Ky., has been preaching the evening sermons on "Ideals of the Christian Life." Rev. David Wallace McMillan is conducting the other services.

Midsummer is the church time when usually there is little stir. Norwood church, however, has been the center of activity. A number of members were received at the last meeting of the session. At the preceding communion one Sunday school teacher came into church fellowship, bringing his entire class with him—a remarkably beautiful picture.

Two Women Leave for India

Seattle Ties Itself to Mission Work on Other Side of Globe—Men at Victoria Conference Discuss Practical Problems.

SEATTLE—A reception of unusual interest to Presbyterians in Seattle was held recently in First church, when farewells were said to two young women going out as missionaries under the Foreign Board. Miss Louisa Lee, daughter of Rev. George H. Lee, pastor of Ballard church, and Miss Sarah McRobbie, a member of First church, will go to Allahabad, India, under the auspices of the Women's Missionary Society of First church, sailing from San Francisco Aug. 26. A consecration service was held also in Ballard church on Sunday evening, Aug. 3, setting the young women apart for this service.

The third annual Pacific coast theological conference was held in Victoria, B. C., Aug. 12-15. Two men of great ability were obtained as the principal speakers—Principal Adeney of Lancashire College, Manchester, England, and Dr. James Moffatt of Edinburgh. Bishop Keator of Tacoma and Dr. Leonard of Seattle were the representatives from Washington and Bishop Roper from Canada. This conference is a sort of get together summer school in theology for the Northwest, where practical questions are freely discussed.

The brotherhood downtown mission will be opened the first of September by the Union League of this city and will be in charge of George M. Lowry. The every-night services will be taken by the Presbyterian, Baptist, Methodist, Congregational and Episcopal churches. Practical relief as well as religious services is in the program of the mission. Thousands of men were blessed in these meetings last year.

Rev. E. Hubert Broyles came to Mount Baker church eight months ago and has wrought a complete revolution in the work there. He has infused new life and strength into every department. Many members have been received and a new church building is a certain outcome of this brief ministry in this section of the city, other churches under the Home Missions Council rules leaving it wholly to the Presbyterians.

Rev. J. M. Robinson of Port Blakely church and Rev. W. A. Conden of Kent have accepted appointments as Sunday school missionaries. Their respective fields of labor will be the two Presbyteries of Bellingham and Wenatchee and the Presbytery of Spokane. This leaves these two Seattle suburban churches vacant.

Churches Desert Old Part of City

Twelve Congregations Leave District of 250,000 People—Use of Automobiles Found Very Effective in Open Air Meetings.

PHILADELPHIA—There is a district of the city, including the oldest portion of it and containing a population of 250,000, that has suffered a most wondrous loss of Presbyterian churches, mainly in the last quarter of a century. It lies between Green street on the north and Federal on the south, and between Broad street and the Delaware river. No fewer than twelve Presbyterian churches have disappeared from this section. North church at 6th and Green removed to Broad and Allegheny avenue. Spring Garden church at 11th and Spring Garden streets consolidated with Columbia Avenue church at 21st and Columbia avenue. Central church at 8th and Cherry removed to Broad and Fairmount avenue and later consolidated with North Broad Street church. Arch Street church at 10th and Arch consolidated with West Arch church at 18th street. Second church, once at 7th and Arch, removed to 21st and Walnut. Sixth and Seventh churches, formerly east of 6th street, consolidated into the Tabernacle on Penn square and removed to 37th and Chestnut, West Philadelphia. Tenth church, long at 12th and Walnut, united with its daughter, West Spruce church, at 17th and Spruce streets. Union church moved from 13th and Spruce streets to Darby road in West Philadelphia. Clinton Street church was dissolved. Fourth church moved from 12th and Lombard to 47th and Kingsessing avenue, West Philadelphia. South church at 3d and Federal and the Atonement at 12th and South consolidated with Scots church at Broad and Castle Avenue. Only four white Presbyterian churches remain in the entire district—Northern Liberties at 5th and Buttonwood, First and Third, near the center of it, and Greenwich Street in the south. There is also a colored Presbyterian church in the district.

A large portion of the population in the district referred to consists of Jews, Italians and negroes. Where formerly in the center of the city a church of some kind stood upon nearly every corner now there are none. As has been said, business first drove away the congregations and then superseded the churches themselves.

AUTOS HELP EVANGELISM

Such success has attended the use of the two automobiles in open air work of the Presbyterian evangelistic committee this season that the superintendent, Dr. W. P. Fulton, suggests that a much larger number will be recommended in the future. Dr. J. B. Ely of the Lemon Hill Association goes so far as to suggest that every church in the city be closed from June to October and that ministers spend their vacation in preaching from automobiles in all parts of the city.

The many warm friends in Philadelphia of the late Robert C. Ogden were much affected by the announcement of his death. He was born in this city and his education was received here, mainly in the public schools. During the years of his adult life passed here in business he was an elder in Hollond Memorial church and superindent of its Sunday school and closely identified with the boards and charitable institutions of the Presbyterian Church.

W. P. WHITE.

Preliminary work looking to the Bible conference to be held in this city Nov. 8-23 is now being done. The conference has engaged a number of prominent Bible teachers to conduct classes which will be held at the noon hour, in the afternoon and at several places simultaneously in the evening. Among the instructors expected are Dr. C. I. Scofield, Dr. James M. Gray, George L. Aldrich and P. W. Philpott. The association in charge has enlisted the cooperation of a large number of the denominations of the city.

IN olden days the alchemist placed a cross on his crucible so that no evil spirit might enter to impair the contents. America has been called God's Melting Pot. Shall we keep the cross on high? Comparatively few immigrants come with the Bible in their hands or their hearts. Foreign speaking church members find not a little difficulty here in obtaining pastors who are educated in their tongue. To train men to be ministers in this country to congregations that still retain the speech of their fatherland is the mission of Dubuque German College and Seminary. Young men of nearly a score of nations have learned to preach in English as well as in their native language. We are trying to do our share to keep the cross on God's Melting Pot. Dubuque German College and Seminary, C. M. Steffens, D. D., President, Dubuque, Iowa.

The Largest Three Churches

The largest church in General Assembly, according to the Minutes recently issued with all reports of the churches, is First church, Seattle, of which Dr. Mark A. Matthews is pastor, having 5,025 members. Bethany, Philadelphia, is second with 3,514 and Fifth Avenue, New York, with 2,436 members, comes third. In total number of worshipers the city of Philadelphia is first, New York second and Chicago a close third.

At Auburn Seminary the summer school of theology has already become a well established institution, but the summer school for lay workers which immediately succeeded the theological session this season was a new experiment. The attendance was so good and the interest so keen that President Stewart has determined to follow the same program next summer.

Dr. Leon C. Hills Preaching on Sherman Mountain, Wyoming, to a Party of Automobilists at a Special Sunday Service

Autoists Worship on Mountain Top

On the crest of the Rocky mountains in a natural amphitheater of granite bowlders on the top of Sherman mountain, thirty miles west of Cheyenne, a special preaching service for automobilists was held on the afternoon of Aug. 10. The owners of automobiles in Cheyenne who are attracted to the splendid roads in that part of the country arranged the meeting and asked Dr. Leon C. Hills, pastor of First church, Cheyenne, to deliver the sermon. The meeting was postponed from Aug. 3 on account of rain and on the following Sunday was attended by about 170 persons, who traveled thirty miles or more to the service. Representatives of many denominations were present, including members of the Roman Catholic Church.

The site of the service was 8,500 feet above sea level, halfway between Cheyenne and Laramie, at the highest point of the transcontinental highway, not many miles from Long's Peak. Dr. Hills was assisted by Rev. George Van Winkle of the Baptist church. A city orchestra furnished the music.

Leon C. Hills, D. D.

According to local newspapers, this service was attended by many who are not regular or even frequent in church attendance. One man had not been to a church service for ten years. The service had nothing of the spectacular about it and the sermon showed the users of automobiles some of the advantages of Sabbath observance and need of following the principles of the sermon on the mount in application to the acts of every day.

This service is said to be the first of its kind ever held, and may be imitated by pastors in other parts of the country where automobiles attract many people away from regular church service. Such an outdoor service might be arranged in many parts of the country where automobilists could come together from several different points. Just as religious services are held in parks, where people gather to escape the heat, so a meeting can be held for automobilists at an appointed place. This will attract many who do not care to dress and go to church in a building.

Tangled Web at Long Beach

Dr. Mason Resigns Pastorate After Public Discussion of His Conduct—Presbytery and Officers Disagree.

LOS ANGELES—The tangled web of misunderstanding in the affairs of Long Beach church and of its pastor, O. H. L. Mason, D. D., seem no nearer to a satisfactory straightening out than at the beginning of the trouble.

About two months ago, when Dr. Mason returned from the meeting of General Assembly, certain members of Long Beach session informed him that information had come to them alleging that he had dined with a young woman, a member of his church choir, in the city of Los Angeles, and that wine had been served at this meal. Dr. Mason admitted the fact, but explained that the wine had been ordered and was drunk by the young woman; that he had not tasted the wine, but in paying the bill he had paid for the wine rather than make a protest in a public place. Dr. Mason put the matter entirely in the hands of the session, consenting to have them meet without him in order to give freedom in discussion.

The session decided that it would be for the best interest of all concerned that the pastoral relation be dissolved. Dr. Mason acquiesced and, with Mrs. Mason, went to Berkeley for rest, whence he sent his resignation.

The congregational meeting which was called to consider the pastor's resignation concurred unanimously in the request that the pastoral relation be dissolved. Dr. Mason asked that rumors in regard to his wrongdoing be investigated. The officers of the church investigated as far as they thought necessary and drafted a statement which seemed at the time to be a satisfactory solution of the whole difficulty. This was signed by all the elders and read at a public meeting on Sunday morning, when about 1,700 people were present, and was indorsed almost unanimously by them. The session declared they had never made any charges against Dr. Mason of a criminal or any other nature and they were convinced that Dr. Mason is not guilty of any intentional wrong.

A special meeting of presbytery was called to act upon the request of pastor and people for a dissolution of the pastoral relation. During the discussion a petition was presented, bearing the signatures of over 500 of the members of Long Beach church, asking that presbytery deny the request. Pastors of the Methodist and U. P. churches addressed presbytery and appealed for the retention of Dr. Mason on the ground of his usefulness in moral and civic reform. Presbytery voted unanimously to grant the request for dissolution, but set the date for the expiration of the pastorate at Oct. 1. This was intended as a compromise.

The session of Long Beach church construed the action of presbytery as a reflection on their integrity and immediately filed with the stated clerk the papers containing the information concerning Dr. Mason's alleged misconduct, together with a protest against the action of the presbytery, signed by the elders. The deacons and trustees also forwarded statements, in which they declared their confidence in the integrity of the elders and their indorsement of the action which they had taken in regard to Dr. Mason and the presbytery. These officers then resigned.

According to figures presented at the conference on Christian education of the Southern Church at Montreat, one in every seven of the students in all the state institutions of learning in the South belongs to the Presbyterian Church or has Presbyterian leanings.

Will Show Work of Negroes

Board of Freedmen Will Take Part in Anniversary Exposition in Philadelphia — Many Pittsburgers at Chautauqua.

PITTSBURG—The state of Pennsylvania has made an appropriation for celebrating the fiftieth anniversary of the freeing of the slaves. All the agencies that have been engaged in educational and religious work among the colored people have been invited to participate in an exhibit showing the progress made by the negroes during fifty years. This celebration is to be held in Philadelphia during September. The Board of Missions for Freedmen has arranged an exhibit of articles made by the pupils in church schools, with a large number of photographs of ministers, missionary teachers and buildings. This exhibit will be under the direction of Rev. John M. Gaston, associate secretary of the board.

Dr. J. Ross Stevenson of Baltimore, Md., preached to a large audience in Third church Aug. 10.

Oakmont church has united with the other churches of the borough in holding outdoor Sabbath evening services. These services are proving of great interest to the community and are attended by 500 to 600 people.

Many of the ministers of presbytery are spending their vacations at Chautauqua, N. Y., among whom are Dr. W. A. Jones of Knoxville church, Dr. O. N. Verner of McKees Rock church, W. F. Silvius of Duquesne church, W. E. Howard of Oakland church, Dr. W. T. Garroway, retired, Dr. Samuel Cullen, J. F. Patterson, formerly of Sixth church but now of Orange, N. J., and Henry A. Grubbs, now of Baltimore. Mr. Grubbs is a son-in-law of the late Dr. Richard S. Holmes.

Dr. Hugh Black of Union Seminary and Rev.

R. J. Patterson of Belfast, Ireland, have been prominent preachers in local pulpits lately.

J. C. Bruce, D. D., for some years pastor of First church, Crafton, who was elected field secretary for the Board of Church Erection, gives up his work at Crafton on Sept. 1 and will have his headquarters in New York City.

Allegheny Seminary of the U. P. Church is to change its name to the Pittsburg Theological Seminary of the U. P. Church.

Gains Made by Small Churches

Proportionate Increase in Membership on Confession Shows Work of Minor Congregations—Dr. Robinson Sails for Palestine.

CHICAGO—Twenty-three churches of Chicago Presbytery have a rating of 10 per cent or over in comparing the number of members received on confession with the present total membership of the church. This means of estimating the growth of the church is looked upon by many students of religion as the most fair. People may join a church by letter because they happen to move into a community. Those who have never been connected with a church join on account of special work by someone. The Chicago church which had the largest growth of members on confession of faith, 33 per cent, was Hope, with Homewood church next with 32 per cent. West Division 29, Windsor Park 24, Chicago Heights Italian 24 follow. Churches which had 15 per cent or more gain of members on confession were Belden Avenue, Chicago Lawn, Italian, Logan Square, Marlboro and Olivet Memorial.

Dr. Robinson will be director of the American School of Archæology for the coming year. Mr. Robinson, a recent graduate of McCormick Seminary and son of the Englewood pastor, will assist Dr. Robinson in his work for the winter.

The Women's Liberty League is the name of an organization of women formed to support the liquor policies in any contest at which women can vote. The league will be affiliated with the United Societies for Local Self-Government. The women were appealed to join the league on the ground that narrow-minded people who want to say what people should drink ought not be permitted to make the laws.

The Chicago Christian Endeavor Union has lately issued a year book containing a list of "Who's Who" in the city and Illinois unions, with detailed accounts of the various Endeavor activities—some sixteen in number. The booklet also contains special messages from Dr. Clark, the founder of Christian Endeavor, and General Secretary William Shaw. The latter greets the Chicago union as "Efficiency Union No. 1." There are also portraits and statements from Walter R. Mee, state president; Walter R. Ceperly, formerly Chicago president; E. P. Gates, field secretary, and Amos R. Wells, editorial secretary of the United Society. The Chicago union, with headquarters at 405 Association building, publishes the book, which is edited by A. G. Fegert, the newly elected president, and Field Secretary Gates. The organization reports 400 local societies, representing sixteen dnominations, and a membership of from 12,000 to 15,000.

New York Churches Help Families to the Open Places in Summer Divergent Opinions on Value of Jingly Hymn Tunes.

NEW YORK—Madison Avenue church house having received a gift of a farm of sixteen acres in Newtown, Conn., with a fourteen-room farmhouse and a carriage house, whose upper story has been transformed into a dormitory, has been enabled to carry on extensive fresh air work there this summer, in addition to its camp in New Jersey.

Brick church and its affiliated churches conduct a girls' camp in Connecticut and a boys' camp in New Jersey, in addition to a mothers' home and various locations for fresh air visits of a fortnight.

Fifth Avenue church has its vacation house in New Jersey and gives many trips to Northfield and Altamont. The Sunbeam Day Nursery has a roof garden for babies.

ABANDON SOCIAL SERVICE BUREAU?

It is rumored that the Home Board is likely to abandon the social service bureau from which Rev. Charles Stelzle recently resigned as secretary. In this case each presbytery may organize social work for its district, working in close relation with the churches.

Widely divergent opinions are being expressed following the recent discussion of the church organists at their convention in Ocean Grove this month. There are many church members who would welcome a return to the solid old hymns and be heartily glad to banish forever the "ragtime" and "German band tunes" condemned by the organists. One of the leading newspapers of this city published a strong editorial on the value of the common knowledge and use of old hymns, especially those which have descended from generation to generation as a precious heritage. On the other hand, some of the mission leaders have expressed themselves in appreciation of "jingly" tunes, music with a "move" and a "glow" in it, as adapted to their peculiar needs in winning the attention of their audiences and reaching their hearts.

In the presence of many city officials and charitable workers, the corner stone of the new children's court, to cost $250,000, was laid Aug. 11. In the course of his remarks Justice White said: "The new courthouse will be the ideal court for juvenile delinquents. Within its walls no child shall be pronounced guilty of a misdemeanor or a felony or receive the bread of a criminal."

Word has been received of the death of Dr. Thomas Kennedy in London at the age of 85. Dr. Kennedy, who had been moderator of General Assembly of the United Free Church of Scotland, was a brother of the late John Stewart Kennedy, the New York banker whose name is famous for his monumental missionary benefactions. This ministerial brother was born in Scotland and spent all his active ministerial life there, but was educated in Princeton University, where he was graduated in the class of 1874.

HOME BOARD LECTURER DIES

Rev. Delos Edwin Finks, for many years connected with the Board of Home Missions, died after only half an hour's illness Aug. 15 at his summer home in Igunquit, Me. The cause of death was angina pectoris. Dr. Finks was 65 years old. He was graduated from Hamilton College in 1870 and from Union Theological Seminary three years later. His first pastorates were in Colorado, but his eyesight began to fail and it was feared he would be blind, so he and his bride came East for treatment. He connected himself with the Home Board as stereopticon lecturer, while Mrs. Finks became editor of The Home Mission Monthly, the organ of the Women's Board. Mrs. Finks died in November, 1911, and her place as editor was filled by her daughter. Dr. Finks kept up to the last his lecturing work for the board. His latest visits were to Erie and Northumberland, and other presbyteries in New York and Pennsylvania. He was under appointment to many other places, where the news of his sudden death will be received with regret. The funeral services were held Sunday afternoon from Munn Avenue church of East Orange, N. J.

Services for the late Dr. Roswell Bates were held Sunday afternoon from Spring Street church, where he served so long.

Financial Situation

Uncle Sam Could Easily Deposit $150,000,000 to Help Move Crops — Lower Express Rates Cut Railway Income—Rural Credits Plan.

Just how the government will be able to deposit $150,000,000 in the banks of the country, or even $50,000,000, is not just clear to the average man whose income may be about $1,500 a year. As a matter of fact, however, the report of the cash holdings of the government on Aug. 1 shows that Uncle Sam has in his strong box $365,937,000. This does not include gold and silver which is held against outstanding certificates, but does include $150,000,000 of gold reserve. This vast amount of cash gives the government a tremendous power in the finances of the country.

The bureau of railway news and statistics, an institution subsidized by the railway systems of the country, points out that there will be a loss in gross earnings of railways of from $10,000,000 to $20,000,000 as one effect of the recent order of the interstate commerce commission reducing express rates. These rates, which have been ordered to go into effect Oct. 15, involve a reduction of about 25 to 30 per cent. The railways in most cases get a fixed percentage of the gross express receipts. Thus the roads lose, too, and as the rates for packages of less than four pounds are greater than under parcel post transportation, the roads will be obliged to carry a great lot of merchandise as mail which formerly they have transported at express rates and participated in the profits therefrom. The great saving to the shippers who pay the present express rates has been pointed out by no news bureau. But it will mean that the public will not be forced to pay exorbitant prices for transportation of small parcels and it is not beyond possibility that the new rates will do much toward bringing producer and consumer into closer relation and thus assist in lowering the cost of living.

Plan for Farmers' Help

A system whereby the farmers of the country may obtain money on more favorable terms than is now possible has occupied the attention of certain members of Congress during the last few days, and it has been proposed that to the pending currency bill there be added a provision for more ready accommodations for the farmers. The President, while favoring the plan, objects to thus amending the currency measures. Senator Fletcher has introduced a bill proposing a system of local national rural banks owned and operated by farmers, a state national rural bank, owned and operated by the local banks, and a national bank to be located in Washington and owned entirely by the state rural banks.

Brief Bits of Business News

—A bank run in which $250,000 was withdrawn, and $160,000 deposited by those who had faith in the institution, was recently witnessed in Chicago. It is said that the run started when someone saw a real estate trader withdraw $2,400 in currency. Men who knew the bank was sound made a neat profit on the excitement by buying passbook accounts at a discount.

—The shortage of cattle is due directly, in the opinion of many meat wholesalers, to the slaughter of calves. At six principal live stock markets of the country calves composed 16 per cent of the total cattle receipts for 1912. At South St. Paul alone there were marketed 130,700 calves, which made 13,592,800 pounds of veal. If these animals had been held a year they would have weighed twice as much, with a gain of $3,194,300 to the farmer so far as payment at this one point was concerned. If they had been held until three years old the gain would have been more than twice as much.

Northfield at Concert Pitch

Northfield has been having the largest attendance in recent years. People are attending six and seven services daily. This is particularly true of those who find it possible to stay only a few days. Three thousand heard Dr. G. Campbell Morgan on the second Sabbath morning and he preached for an hour and twenty minutes. Almost as many heard Dr. Len G. Broughton in the evening, and Mr. Moody announced that the audience which greeted Dan Crawford at 4 o'clock was the largest ever assembled in the auditorium at an afternoon hour.

Dr. Morgan preached on "How to Satisfy Christ," the fourth of a series of sermons, the others being "How to Come to Christ," "How to Serve" and "How to Please Christ." This series is complementary to one by Dr. J. D. Jones. Dr. Holden gave the lectures for the ministers during the first week, closing with the theme "The Perils of the Minister." Dr. Holden is quiet and grave almost to an oppressive degree, but he often insists that he does not believe in long-faced religion. Dr. Hutton, speaking on the eighth of Romans, is impassioned and strenuous; he expresses everything in the superlative, yet he frequently tells us he wants a calm, sane religion in its essence and expression. Between these two contrasted speakers come many who tend more toward one or the other characteristic, illustrating what Dr. Holden most aptly said, "We are made after our pattern, not of one pattern."

It is a wonderful thing that W. R. Moody is able to continue to do what his honored father did, viz., command the very best talent of the church for this conference. One thing is apparent, and that is that these noted men enjoy meeting each other. Dr. Hutton said in friendly fun: "It is wonderful what great and good things these men say off the platform," quickly adding, "I do not mean to say that they do not say some great and good things on the platform."

Dan Crawford Receives Close Attention

Dan Crawford held the close attention of large audiences for three addresses on Africa. In 1889 this man who has found the secret of "thinking black" bored his way into the interior of the "land of the yellow grass" and until 1912 was shut in a thousand miles from any kind of supply station which could give him what he, as an English gentleman, had considered the ordinary necessaries and comforts of life. He speaks eloquently of "the glory of doing without." In 1912 he "bored out," a process which required twenty-three days. As a partial fruit of his labors he left behind sixty miles of good wide road, except for which "the sons of the yellow grass" know only the narrowest paths through a dense growth averaging thirteen feet in height. And he left six miles of cottages except for which these black folks know only closely built groups of huts most unsanitary and uncomfortable.

Mr. Crawford speaks with admiration of the politeness, modesty and fidelity of the Bantu character, with sympathy for their sufferings and with largest hope for their evangelization. It is speaking mildly to say that this great missionary won the admiration of all. Dr. Broughton spoke of him as the most real missionary of modern times.

When he emerged, with his black attendants, from his twenty-two years of seclusion Mr. Crawford was deeply affected by his first sight of the railroad train. He spoke to his companions of the railroads, automobiles, aeroplanes and other similar things, but these "fine men" of Africa were not moved to wonder or envy. They turned to Mr. Crawford and said, "Sir, to be better off is not to be better." This, said the man who thinks black, meant, "You go to your boasted civilization; we desire none of these things; we can be better morally more easily if we are not better off materially."

"The Smile Worn from Your Faces"

When this remarkable missionary reached England an English lord asked, "What is the greatest change which you see in our civilization." The reply was, "The greatest change is this: Your materialism has worn the smile from your faces." "I saw, on a subway train," he said, "thirteen fine young Englishmen just entering active life and a worried, anxious look upon their faces lest they be outdone and overreached in their quest after wealth."

We have spoken of the men who seem to be making the deepest impression at Northfield. As the conference draws to a close Dr. Hutton is getting the closest attention of every minister on Saul, the son of Kish, whom he styles as "the man who was called to a bigger thing than he was fit for."

Dr. Holden is showing us that the standards of and pathways toward goodness are identical in Old and New Testaments. Dr. Morgan is making us know more clearly that One only is God—that is God. And Dr. Broughton is showing us how, in the church and in the world, we may work out our salvation with fear and trembling, while Doctors Jones, Chapman, Robinson and others are giving most excellent warnings, exhortations and encouragements. Northfield merits the attention it is attracting and gives good promise of extending its renown and power. M. V. HIGBEE.

Ministerial Obituary

Rev. L. N. Williams

Ten great grandchildren are among the relatives left by Rev. L. N. Williams, who died July 25 at Neoga, Ill., after an extended illness. He was 74 years old and was born in Indiana. He was ordained thirty-eight years ago and preached last at Watson, Ill. Funeral services were conducted by the Neoga pastor, Rev. C. W. Estes.

Rev. Amos A. Randall

Rev. Amos A. Randall, pastor of Oak Ridge and Irondale, Ohio, churches, died near Wellsville, Ohio, Aug. 4, after a long and lingering illness. He was born in Rockford, Ill., June 18, 1863, and was taken at an early age by his parents to Cedar Rapids, Iowa, where he attended the public schools and Coe College. He was graduated from Macalester College, St. Paul, Minn., in 1890, and from McCormick Seminary in 1893. His first charge was at Armstrong, Iowa. Other work was at Marengo, Iowa; Ontario and Santa Monica, Cal.; Princeville, Ill.; LaCrosse, Wis., and Geetingsville, Ind. He was installed pastor of the Oak Ridge and Irondale churches Aug. 20, 1912. Mr. Randall is survived by his widow and five children, a mother, brother and two sisters. Funeral services were held Aug. 9. Rev. M. W. Woolf, pastor of Bethel church, preached.

Kentucky Church Dedicated

The congregation of Westminster church, Bowling Green, Ky., is rejoicing over the dedication Aug. 10 of the new church edifice which was begun nearly two years ago in the face of apparently insurmountable difficulties. J. Frank Smith, D. D., of Dallas, Texas, preached the dedicatory sermon. Ira Landrith, D. D., of Nashville, Tenn., in less than thirty minutes obtained pledges covering the $15,000 debt that remained on the building. With the exception of a gift from Andrew Carnegie for the organ, and about $200 subscribed by friends in the town, the entire cost of the church, over $40,000, has been met by the membership. The building, of Bowling Green limestone, is of colonial design and is complete in its appointments, up to date in its equipment and meets every requirement of a thoroughly modern church house. Dr. R. W. Binkley is pastor.

Missionary Killed in Turkey

At headquarters of the American Board in Boston word has been received of the assassination of Rev. Charles Holbrook, a young missionary sent out by the board two years ago. He was stationed in Sibas, on the borders of Armenia. His death is said to have occurred in the Armenian village of Souchier while he was on a vacation tour. The circumstances of the tragedy are not indicated in the cable reports, but the incident naturally arouses not only grief for the loss of Mr. Holbrook but much anxiety for other missionaries in the Turkish interior, where there has been dread of fanatical antimissionary outbreaks ever since Turkey began to suffer so seriously in the Balkan war struggle.

Discuss Bible in Public Schools

Three tracts relating to the public schools of the country in connection with the use of the Bible have recently been issued by the National Reform Association. They are offered to all pastors who will discuss in their pulpits on the second Sunday in September the subject of Christian morality. The association offices are in Pittsburg. It has also recently published in tract form the reports delivered at the citizenship conference at Portland June 29. They contain up-to-date material on many questions of interest to the church at large.

Missouri Church Case Settled

According to recent press reports the United States circuit court in Kansas City has decided in favor of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America a case against the Cumberland Church involving property in Missouri worth $1,500,000. The suit grew out of the refusal of some churches to surrender property to the Presbyterian Church following the merger of the Cumberland Church with the larger branch. Ten state courts have quieted title to property of the merged churches in the Presbyterian Church in the same way.

Build Home for Mothers

Mrs. Sayre, mother of Francis Bowes Sayre, who is engaged to Miss Jessie Wilson, is expected to make formal application to the town board of Babylon, L. I., before Aug. 31 for permission to secure a tract of land between Great South Bay and the ocean, on which to erect a home for mothers in poor financial circumstances, where they may spend three or four months before the birth of their children.

Find Jobs for All Homeless Men

A system of pushcart collection of waste paper in the downtown district of Chicago is being worked out by Rev. George A. Kilbey, superintendent of the Christian Industrial League, a Presbyterian institution which during the last three or four years has given shelter and work to thousands of men. The plan which is now under contemplation will require several thousand dollars to furnish equipment for these itinerant collectors of paper and other waste material. It is proposed that the league, which is situated on East 12th street, not far from the loop, shall purchase a number of pushcarts and loan them to men who are unable to find other employment. The league will purchase from these collectors all waste paper at a price which it is estimated will enable the men to earn $3.60 a week. Lodging can be provided for 10 cents a night and, with further plans which are now being considered, meals will cost but 25 cents a day. This will leave the workman with $1.15 a week for clothes and other expenses.

It is part of the plan that the Christian Industrial League shall establish a savings department of some sort where these men and others may deposit their earnings and remove from them the temptation to spend their money foolishly.

Arrangements have just been made whereby all the homeless men cases which are referred to the Associated Charities of Chicago will hereafter be turned over to the league. Each year the league, which has facilities for employing a number of men at profitable occupation, has enabled an average of sixty men a day to get a new start in life by productive labor. The Associated Charities will turn over many other men of the same sort, who will be given work in the waste paper department, in the numerous stores which the league conducts and in the factory.

All men who apply for charity in Chicago will be given an opportunity by the league to earn the clothing or food they need. In fact, so far as the homeless men in Chicago are concerned, the league will be the agent of the Associated Charities. This arrangement has been made at the suggestion of the officers of the charities after investigation of the work which the league has been doing. Clothing collected by the Associated Charities will be kept and dispensed by the league.

The scheme of pushcart collection of waste paper, especially for those buildings where there is too much waste to burn and not enough to have a wagon call for it, has appealed to business men of the city and they have promised their assistance in the new plan. They recognize that this will do away with practically all of the begging on the streets, as the league will undertake to furnish work to every man.

There will also be established this fall in connection with Popular hall on South State street, the evangelistic arm of the league, a free employment bureau, which will be the means of connecting homeless men with employers of labor.

YOUNG PEOPLE AT WORK

Indiana Endeavorers Meet—R. A. Walker, state field secretary of Christian Endeavor, conducted the conference on methods at the recent district young people's convention at Brownstown (Ind.) church. It was addressed also by Rev. F. Davis of Freetown and Rev. Frank L. Freet.

U. P. Young People at Waterloo—Work for others was suggested by Rev. James E. Walker of Chicago as one of the best ways to interest young men and women in the young people's societies of the U. P. church, at the national convention of the young people of that denomination at Waterloo, Iowa, Aug. 15 and 16. Nearly a thousand delegates were at the convention. Mr. Walker summarized for the young people the responses he had to a large number of letters from societies over the country telling the most successful way of doing work which they had used. From the East came a report of the society where the attendance increased 80 per cent because the new officers felt that they must really do something to infuse new life into the society. Varied programs and announcement of the meetings in the Sunday school has helped the attendance of many organizations. In one society a special committee keeps a record of the attendance of all members, which is posted at the back of the room. Mr. Walker suggested that one of the secrets of successful work is giving everybody something to do.

GIVE BIBLES AT HOME AND ABROAD

Six colporteurs of the American Bible Society, two army men and four college students distributed copies of the Scripture to the veterans at the recent Gettysburg reunion., The government furnished a tent, and copies of the Bible bound in khaki were distributed on the grounds. Thousands of copies were sold.

Six thousand copies of the New Testament were recently distributed among the policemen of Tokyo.

Constant calls are being made for Bibles in English by natives of many of the Chinese cities. They learn English by reading these books. During the first six months of this year nearly 1,000,000 Bibles and Testaments were distributed by the China agency of the American Bible Society, with many orders left unfilled on account of the large demand.

Presbyterians Lead at Conference—Presbyterians had the largest number of delegates at the Laymen's Missionary conference lately at Lake Geneva. There were eighteen denominations represented, the delegates coming from fifteen states and provinces. The total enrollment was about 125. A number of the denominations were represented by mission board secretaries and officers of the Laymen's Missionary Movement of the several denominations. This was the only conference held by the Laymen's Missionary Movement preliminary to the series of 600 or more local conferences which will meet in various parts of the country this winter.

Definite Work for Men—The central office of the brotherhood of the Disciples of Christ has laid plans to send out monthly to each of the 1,000 organizations of that denomination a plan of work which will tend to train members of the churches represented for the united missionary campaign which is being undertaken by all denominations. This brotherhood will make the preliminary plans for the every-member canvass the definite work for the men of its church during the winter.

McIlvaine—Mrs. Priscilla Jane McClure McIlvaine, widow of George H. McIlvaine, died on May 20, 1913, at her home in Peoria, Ill., having been a resident of that city for fifty-nine years. Mrs. McIlvaine had been associated with Grace Presbyterian church from the time of its founding, some forty-five years ago. Her modest, gracious personality is and will be sorely missed in this organization, with whose history the name of her godly husband is intimately linked. Mrs. McIlvaine was born in Franklin county, Pa., May 19, 1834. She is survived by two sons and three daughters, who with a large circle of relatives and friends revere her sainted memory.

Niles—Mrs. Jennie E. Niles, widow of the late Henry E. Niles, D. D., died at her home in York, Pa., on July 2. She was born in South Bridge, Mass., and was married on June 26, 1850. Her home as a bride was in the manse at Valatie, N. Y.; then at Angelica, N. Y.; St. Louis (North church); Albion, N. Y., and at York. Her three sons survive her—Henry C. Niles of the York, Pa., bar; Hon. Alfred S. Niles, ex-judge and present police commissioner of Baltimore, and Rev. Edward Niles, pastor Second church of Baltimore. The following is an extract from a tribute which appeared in the York newspapers:

"Forty-eight years of thorough identification with York and promoting its intellectual and spiritual life made Mrs. Henry E. Niles one of its beloved citizens. Although born in 1828, none who knew her quickness of body, mind and soul ever thought of her as old.

"A beautiful and brilliant girl, graduating from Mount Holyoke in its Mary Lyon day, her mind was stored with gems new and old, which she held at tongue's end for felicitous use. She chose to become a minister's wife, and for thirty-five years in the York manse she shared the burdens and blessings of that fruitful pastorate, her influence permeating every activity. Fifty years of continuous revelation of what human love can be was followed by thirteen years of widowhood. Instead of withdrawing from the world to selfishly mourn, she devoted herself to continue and perpetuate her husband's influence. Because her religion was so genuine, her conviction so absolute that "all things work together for good to those who love God," nothing daunted her joyful faith.

"Her sons and grandchildren shared with her every experience, whether great crises or daily happenings. Saturated with both the religion and culture of her Puritan ancestry, with untiring enthusiasm she pursued her pilgrim pathway. She leaves a sweet and uplifting memory. Before her lie illimitable opportunities of eternal youth."

Why Immigrant Children Sin

The children of foreigners rather than recent immigrants themselves help unduly to swell the American prison population. Professor Robert H. Gault of Northwestern University discusses the reason for this next week. What is it in America which so acts on newcomers that the sons of foreigners land in prison more often than they would if they had been born abroad?

What Are the Foes of the Home?

Dr. Robert Francis Coyle from his Denver pulpit has fought the enemies of home and state for many years. In an article to appear next week he analyzes the foes above, below and within the home which are seeking to destroy it. He says some pertinent things pungently.

All of these articles are especially worth reading. Send us the names of friends who ought to take THE CONTINENT.

BONDS WHICH FIT THE PURSE OF SMALL OR LARGE INVESTORS

In amounts of $100, $500, or $1,000, due ten years from date

Besides bearing 7 per cent interest per annum, payable semi-annually, these bonds will share in the profits of the company to such an extent as the Board of Directors may deem advisable.

These Bonds Secured by Mortgages

Placed on hig[illegible]ed farms and good income producing city property such as shown in the accompanying [illegible]hs. These mortgages are deposited with the Pacific National Bank of Boise, the capita[illegible] of which is $415,000. Should the holder of any bond desire to have the actual mortgage in his possession, we will at any time exchange bonds for mortgages. As the mortgages are not for more than 50 per cent of the actual cash value of the property, the safety of this investment is apparent. Send for our new illustrated booklet giving full information about our company and its methods.

Around the Shop

To that lively periodical, Life, the Around-the-Shop Man is indebted for an interesting and somewhat truthful quotation from the English Tit-Bits. The editor has one advantage—most of his criticisms come by mail, and though sometimes he may grit his teeth and yearn for a personal interview, as a rule he does not feel individually ill-treated. Editors and ministers who succeed remember that the butcher and baker and candlestick maker also are criticised and that subjection to fault-finding is no excuse for failing to do one's best. Here's the quotation:

"The preacher has a hard time. If his hair is gray, he is old. If he is a young man, he hasn't had experience. If he has ten children, he has too many.. If he has none, he should have, and isn't setting a good example. If his wife sings in the choir, she is presuming. If she doesn't, she isn't interested in her husband's work.

"If a preacher reads from notes, he is a bore. If he speaks extemporaneously, he isn't deep enough. If he stays at home in his study, he does not mix enough with the people. If he is seen around on the streets, he ought to be at home getting up a good sermon. If he calls on some very poor family, he is playing to the gallery. If he calls at the home of the rich, he is an aristocrat.

"Whatever he does, someone could have told him how to do better. He has a fine time living off donations which never come in, and promises that never mature. Next to being an editor, it is the most awful life."

The Around-the-Shop Man doesn't know how to sympathize, because the comments that come to him are so invariably kindly. The most flattering type of letter he receives reads like this:

"Believing in the value of The Continent, I have done a good service to my friends by persuading them to subscribe for it. Inclosed find," etc.

Should Protestant Ministers Marry?

Marion Harland in an article in next week's Continent, "Does the Protestant Church Favor a Celibate Clergy?" in effect shows that the churches are "freezing out" the married minister. Actions speak louder than words in church or out of it. The average salary of pastors of one large denomination is $600 a year. Nor can the minister who gets this—$12 a week—engage in other employment after hours—he is always on duty! Can he support a family? Marion Harland writes for a syndicate of twenty-five daily papers and is "a criminally busy woman," as she remarks. "But," she says, "now and then the strong necessity of utterance along other lines comes upon me"—and she seeks The Continent audience. As in the past she will write for no other religious paper. The first of a number of articles appears in the issue of September 4. She feels earnestly that ministers of the gospel should be supported in a manner befitting their calling and speaks vigorously in her striking article in

Boosting a Competitor

"Please, mister, buy a paper off'n him."

The shrill boy voices were pleading for a reversal of judgment. nother voice, timid and weak, faltering with inexperience, which d just begged the passer-by for patronage, had been already lenced by a perhaps too curt refusal. But two alert lads, prac-ced in the business, were running to the rescue:

"Please, mister, buy a paper off'n him. He ain't sold no paper t this mornin', and he's been here ever since half past six. We've th sold a lot. Now you buy one off'n him, won't you?"

The passer-by stopped. In this world, whose wisdom bids the gacious to "look out for number one," it is not altogether usual be solicited by a firm of merchants to buy goods from their val. The circumstances were worth inquiring into.

The two young intercessors were apparently no older than the ird boy whose cause they were pleading. But the difference in the nfidence of their bearing was vast. They knew what they anted and were bent on having it—a customer for the other llow. The prospective buyer demanded to know why they were interested in their shrinking neighbor. Was he some friend theirs?

"Naw, he jist come here this mornin' to sell papers. This's the rst time he ever tried it. And you know you can't sell papers hen you don't know nobody. We fellers sell to men we know. his kid'll be all right when he gits to know somebody. But this rst day, maybe he won't sell none if you don't buy one off'n him."

The argument was irresistible. The novice did sell one paper at ast his first day. Whether his energetic competitors got him any ore trade later the passer-by could not wait to see. But at least ey insured him enough encouragement at the outset to keep him ing. Undoubtedly the newcomer tried a second day at least.

This twentieth century incident of an American city street com-rises in miniature all the elements of a sort of business spirit that itics of the present social order say existing conditions can never evelop.

Competition in industry and trade, these reformers allege, neces-arily compels men to an unmitigated selfishness. For a man in usiness to be interested in the prosperity of his neighbor who lls the same kind of goods, is, according to their account, not erely incredible but inconceivable.

Nothing but the complete reorganization of business on a radically ifferent principle, we hear, will ever permit business men to prac-ce the Christian ideal of extending the helping hand to those eaker than themselves. Pending such reform, even the best-isposed dealer must grab for all the business he can get and drive verybody else out of his field if he can. This is declared to be e inexorable law of competition.

And it is unpleasantly undeniable that such as this is the cold gic of the competitive theory. To this it comes out if its premises re pursued without mitigation to the end.

But happily the response of the human spirit to the facts of life often better than the logic of the human brain.

Here in very real life was a valid example and proof that com-etition in trade is not inevitably bound to run to that bitter extreme of heartless destruction whither it seems headed. There can be competitive business eager and driving in its own behalf, and yet over and above it all can rule a watchful spirit looking out to see that other folks following the same road are not run down.

For just such was the style in which these two newsboys were conducting business. It was no big business, to be sure, but it was very real to them—a great deal more vitally, indeed, a matter of bread and butter to them than the transactions of the great millionaire "on 'change" are to him. And they were pushing business with all their might.

Yet they were not so taken up with their own affairs that they had no eye for another fellow. If the other fellow were doing decently well, they would, of course, let him take care of himself. But when he wasn't making headway, it seemed to them the most natural and necessary thing in the world, in a lull of their own business, to give this lagging neighbor a boost.

Not to take his place and carry his responsibilities for him—not that. Their boyish instinct taught them that it was better for the new boy to depend on himself in the long run. But just enough encouragement to keep him trying; just enough suggestion to set him on the sensible road for success—to their code it would have been scurvy meanness not to give him that much help.

And just that much addition to the code of modern business would be everything needed to humanize and indeed to Christianize competition throughout the business world.

But if competition is not so amended, nothing can stop economic and probably civic revolution.

Perhaps some skeptic may yet deny the application of the lesson. He may insist that these newsboys could be as fair and generous as they were only because they were so unsophisticated—understood so little of what business really involves.

But the fact is the contrary. These newsboys were as fair and generous as they were because they saw deeper into the fact of things than their selfish, grasping and miserly elders.

The unspoken and doubtless unconscious faith which lay behind the kindliness of these two small merchants of the street, as they were trying to get a competitor established in business, was the profoundly true assurance that there is room enough in the world for everybody if everybody will be content with a fair sufficiency.

To them a new aspirant for business appearing in the field was a self-evident sign that there must be business for him to do. At all events, he was entitled to the privilege of trying out the situation to see if he couldn't make a living.

As for themselves, these lads were content with the fact that they were making a living. That was enough to trust the future on.

And their philosophy in this matter, so far from being the comfort of ignorance, is the native intuition of human hearts unspoiled by greed.

When the mighty merchants and manufacturers of the millionaire business world have become as little children in the contented wisdom of these unafraid and ungrasping newsboys, then the realm of business also will have become a province of the kingdom of God.

The pause where a man ceases from his own gain to add to the gain of his neighbor will be the hour of salvation to modern business.

The World

Bankers Want Amended Currency Bill

Bankers of the country, represented by the currency commission of the American Bankers' Association, are engaged in an earnest and widely discussed effort to influence Congress to make several changes in the pending currency bill in order to obtain its general acceptance "by existing banking institutions." These changes, they say, would avoid a credit disturbance and would provide a system that would "gradually develop into a great bulwark" for the protection of commerce as a whole. Their ideas will be presented at Washington through a committee consisting of J. B. Forgan and George M. Reynolds of Chicago, E. J. Hill of Norwalk, Connecticut; R. F. Maddox of Atlanta, Sol Wexler of New Orleans, Joseph Chapman of Minneapolis and F. J. Wade of St. Louis.

The bankers' views were formulated at a two days' conference in Chicago on Friday and Saturday. The committee will speak for forty-seven state bankers' associations and 191 clearing houses. A. Barton Hepburn of New York was chairman of the gathering. A spirit of cooperation with Congress supplanted early hostility, and the resolutions adopted concede that the administration's bill has many excellent features. The bankers urge, however, that many of the provisions applying to national banks shall be optional instead of compulsory; that there shall be not more than five federal reserve banks instead of twelve—many of the bankers favored one central reserve bank—that the federal reserve board shall consist of three members chosen by the President, three elected by directors of the federal reserve banks, and the secretary of the treasury, thus giving the bankers direct representation on the federal reserve board. Many of the alterations suggested are of a technical nature, but the bankers believe they are in the direction of securing for the nation a currency, based on gold, "which automatically adjusts its volume to trade requirements." The ends desired are flexibility for the currency and stability for commerce.

Meanwhile the Owen-Glass bill continues its progress through the house majority caucus. Secretary Bryan has given the measure his unqualified approval, and this helps to offset the active opposition of sixty Democratic representatives and half a dozen Democratic senators.

Peace Congress Holds Sessions at The Hague

The Universal Peace Congress held its twentieth session at The Hague last week, with nearly a thousand delegates in attendance. Professor de Louter of Utrecht, who was elected president of the Congress, hailed America as the foremost nation in the peace movement. The congress adopted a resolution favoring arbitration between the United States and Great Britain of the Panama canal tolls question. Another resolution adopted called for the stoppage of armaments building and appealed to the governments of the world to fulfill past promises of limitation. A proposal which the congress postponed for further study provided for an international police force in the shape of a fleet under an international admirality board to compel the observance of the law of nations. The Balkan war was discussed at length and the president declared that it had shown how much harder advocates of peace must work.

Mrs. May Wright Sewall of Indianapolis addressed the congress on Friday and was applauded when she said that the Panama canal ought to be free for the whole world and should not be fortified. She asserted that 2,000,000 women of America protested against its fortification. The congress went on record against war loans and against the construction of military airships.

The Interparliamentary Union will also meet at The Hague on September 1. Secretary Bryan's plan for a compulsory arbitration of international differences will be laid before the union by Senator Burton of Ohio, one of the American members. Senator Burton is one of seven committeemen representing America, Germany, France, Russia, Austria, Belgium and Greece charged with planning a permanent Hague court.

New Governor General for Philippines

Congressman Francis Burton Harrison of New York has been nominated for governor general of the Philippine islands after long consideration by the President, in the course of which a large number of candidates were eliminated. The new governor is a Democrat, has been in Congress five terms and is a lawyer by profession. He saw service as a volunteer in the Spanish-American war and visited the Philippines several years ago with the then secretary of war, Mr. Taft. A general statement was reported from the White House to the effect that Mr. Harrison would carry out the pledges of the Democratic platform which declared for ultimate independence of the Philippines. "Ultimate," according to the dictionary, signifies "most remote."

Mississippi River Dam Is Opened

What is said to be the largest dam in the world was opened with two days of celebration on Monday and Tuesday at Keokuk, Iowa. The dam stretches nine-tenths of a mile long from the bluff on the Illinois side to the power house in Iowa, and will create a new power zone from Burlington, Iowa, to St. Louis. Its cost was $27,000,000, and it is estimated that the concrete in the work is equal to all the masonry in the great pyramid of Cheops. The total length of concrete, including power house, lock, sea wall, ice fender and dam, is two and a half miles. Deep water navigation will be bettered for sixty-five miles up the river.

Mexican Relations Undergoing Severe Strain

Ex-Governor John Lind, President Wilson's special commissioner to Mexico, was called home the first of the week after having presented the President's communication to Provisional President Huerta, to which the latter made a long and uncompromising reply. The Mexican foreign minister gave an interview on Monday designed to quiet alarms, but great uneasiness was felt by foreign residents over the apparent deadlock with the United States.

On the invitation of the President members of the senate and house committees on foreign affairs conferred with him and he discussed with them the character of the message which he later proposed to present to Congress in person. These conferences, in the indorsement of the President's course voiced in the senate last Thursday by representative senators, gave notice to Huerta and his advisers of the solidarity of the American people when foreign affairs are involved, and showed the fallacy of the Mexican assumption that the President is not upheld by Congress and the American people in his firm stand against recognizing the Huerta government.

This rather impudent idea was put forth last week by President Huerta in reply to the American note transmitted by Commissioner Lind. The so-called ultimatum issued by the Mexican minister of the interior was disavowed by Huerta, but he turned down flatly the suggestion that he withdraw from the presidency. Huerta bolstered himself up by referring to the official recommendation for his recognition made by Ambassador H. L. Wilson, and he intimated that the power of the Democratic party was temporary. In a general way President Huerta placed the blame for Mexico's civil war upon the United States because the refusal of the latter to recognize him had cheered the rebels, or constitutionalists, and also —a fact which Huerta did not mention—prevented him from getting additional foreign loans, money being one of the things of which he stands in need.

Great Britain, France, Japan and most of the Central American nations gave their support to the efforts of the United States to restore peace in Mexico, and exerted diplomatic pressure to induce Huerta to yield.

An Investigation of the Balkan War

Now that the Balkan trouble seems safely over—all but the reejectment of the Turk from Adrianople—the managers of the Carnegie endowment fund for international peace propose to investigate the conduct, cost and causes of the war of Bulgaria and the other Balkan states and to inquire into the many charges and counter charges of atrocities which the Greeks made against the Bulgarians, and vice versa. If Bulgaria is guilty of the horrible cruelties which have been laid to her door the world should be informed in the interests of historic accuracy and justice. The Carnegie commission, which is to be of international membership, may also be able to turn some fresh light on the economic waste, the monumental expense and the heart-rending slaughter of human beings which is summed up in the one word, war. Nowadays there is less glamour surrounding wholesale slaughter than there once was, and men are coming to see more clearly the cold brutality and abject misery that accompany war. And almost equally dire, except in the one element of bloodshed, are the vast military and naval armaments with which European nations burden their citizens. Possibly the Carnegie commission may be able to present some of these facts in a way to command the world's attention.

It has recently been estimated that in the Balkan wars for every man who was killed in battle there was an expenditure of $3,437. Servia alone is said to have lost one of every forty of its male population—men whom it could least afford to part with. Exact figures are not yet available, but a correspondent of a Roman newspaper gives figures showing that in both conflicts 400,000 men perished, and the total money cost was $1,360,000,000. If the great powers of Europe had acted together, surely Turkey in Europe could have been eliminated or suppressed and boundary lines readjusted without any such terrible price as this.

England and Russia, Persia and Partition

A recent debate in the house of lords has served to direct attention to the unsatisfactory and unsettled state of affairs in Persia as relating to England, Russia and the empire of Persia. The Persian empire, although theoretically an important buffer state between Russia on the north and British possessions on the south, is reported to be negligible or approaching negligibility.

Following the creation of the triple entente, by which British statesmen offset the triple alliance and thus preserved the balance of power in Europe, England had to make a working agreement with Russia with regard to a division of influence in Persia. It was the price paid Russia for the latter's partnership in the triple entente. Under this plan Persia was divided into a northern sphere of influence for Russia, a southern sphere of influence for England and a neutral zone in which it was hoped that an independent Persian government might be maintained. This latter desire was hoping against hope, says The London Spectator, and then preaches a long sermon on the Persian situation, with the house of lords debate as a text. The conclusion reached is that a friendly partition of Persia between Russia and England is not to be looked upon with either dread or horror. This idea is based upon the belief that the degeneracy of the Persian nation makes it impossible that an independent government can ever be regenerated. The Spectator is one of the few voices in England which are not raised in alarm at any suggestion of a close approach by Russia to the frontier of India, most Britishers holding that it would be dangerous for Russia and Britain to possess coterminous frontiers. But The Spectator insists that England must see to it that her naval force in the Persian gulf is always stronger than that of any other nation, and risk in India will be avoided if command of the sea is maintained.

Lord Curzon, who is the author of a book on Persia, in the house of lords painted a gloomy picture of things in Persia, reenforcing himself by the latest official blue book. In the north, he said, life and property were comparatively safe, but that was due to the presence of an overwhelming force of Russian troops, a force out of all proportion to the requirements for preserving law and order. As regards the Trans-Persian railway line, he declared that England was already committed to the construction of the Russian section. Lord Morley in behalf of the government maintained that the state of things in Persia was not materially worse than it was before the Anglo-Russian agreement.

It is noteworthy that in none of this discussion is any particular heed paid to the wishes of the boy shah's government at Teheran.

Helping to Pull a Big State Out of the Mud

Missouri is one of several states in the union that have literally, not figuratively, been in the mud. Last week an earnest and practical effort was made in every county to improve conditions by means of two "good road days," August 20 and 21. Governor Major, who personally took a hand in the work and who is given credit for the success of the idea, says he will ask the governor of each state to set aside these dates in August next year as good road days. The governor of Kansas came into Missouri to help, and it is estimated that 50,000 men were actually engaged in building and repairing highways, bridges and culverts, cutting weeds and brush and digging ditches. Farming operations were suspended in many places and business and professional men joined the crusade, the idea being to have everybody, as far as possible, work in person, and not by proxy. Women volunteers furnished meals and helped feed the toilers. Arkansas is already preparing to follow suit, the governor having designated September 3 and 4 as days for statewide community road work.

It is to be believed that the display of old-fashioned community spirit which Missouri has just given will not be sporadic but, on the other hand, that the example will be contagious and the effect continuous. The good roads movement in America is still in its infancy, but it has been growing rapidly of late, thanks to the automobile and other causes, and every advance is welcomed.

Holland's Great Theologian Retires

Dr. Abraham Kuyper at the age of 75 has resigned his seat in the states general of the kingdom of the Netherlands and has retired from public life, thus ending a unique career in modern politics. Both as statesman and as theologian Dr. Kuyper has attained international fame. He entered parliament forty years ago, but at that time served only a three-year term. Devoting himself then to the ministry, he became known for the strictness of his orthodoxy, defending the most extreme Calvinistic position. In 1880 he founded the Free Reformed University of Amsterdam, in which he has continued to lecture on theology ever since. In 1886 he led a secession from the Established Church of Holland, in some respects comparable to the Scottish "disruption."

In 1894 Dr. Kuyper went back into parliament, and there his great force of character soon put him in the lead of the extreme conservative party. Paradoxically, this conservatism threw Dr. Kuyper, though himself so intense a Protestant, into friendly relations with Catholic members of the states general, and on the strength of a combination with them he was elevated in 1901 to be premier of the kingdom. His seven years of administration gave him high credit of statesmanship.

In the political party which he led and the seceding denomination which he founded Dr. Kuyper's influence has been almost despotic. His slightest wish seems always to have been among his followers the end of discussion and controversy. With Americans Dr. Kuyper's most intimate contact was in 1898, when he came to Princeton Theological Seminary to deliver the Stone lectures.

Italy Official Host of Temperance Convention

The fourteenth international congress against alcoholism, following at the regular biennial interval after the thirteenth congress which met at The Hague in the autumn of 1911, will assemble in Milan, Italy, September 22. Although Italy is a wine-growing and wine-drinking country, antialcohol sentiment has taken strong hold in many influential quarters, and the Italian minister of foreign affairs did not hesitate to issue the invitations to the congress in the name of the royal government. Moreover, the royal palace at Milan has been put at the disposal of the delegates. Responses from practically all the important governments of the world are favorable. The American delegation, just as two years ago, will sit with commissions from the President of the United States.

The program provides for the discussion of the moral decadence caused by alcoholism, its pathological results in the human body, the economic disturbances caused by drunkenness, the possibility of utilizing grapes for nonalcoholic products, the treatment of inebriates, the diminution of saloons, the creation of counter attractions to offset the saloon's social appeal and the instruction of children in the dangers of drinking. Simultaneously there will be held in Milan the sessions of the International Federation of Blue Cross Societies, which will take up the religious aspects of the battle against drink. An international understanding among Protestant churches aiming at more active church temperance measures will be sought through this unofficial organization.

Various Tokens of Church Unrest in Europe

Dr. John Clifford, the venerable Baptist leader of Great Britain, is authority for the statement that a great exodus from the Roman Catholic Church is going on in Poland, especially in the cities of Warsaw and Lodz. In Warsaw two priests who have seceded from the papacy have congregations that number over 4,000 adherents. Fifteen thousand Polish Bibles have been sold in Poland within the past year, though prohibited by Roman interdict. In Lodz the Baptist church has accumulated a membership of over 1,600.

Despite Roman denials, "Los vom Rome" continues also in Austria, and seceders who have publicly registered themselves as refusing longer to be classified as Catholics now number 540,000. Since 1900 the Protestant population of Austria has risen from 500,000 to 675,000. These figures take no account of Hungary.

It is fair to note, however, over against these Roman losses, that there have been nearly 200,000 registered defections from Protestant state churches in Germany in the last two years. This fact indicates that much current change results not merely from revolt against papal tyranny, but from revolt against religion.

The Unexpected Rewards

ONE OF JESUS' greatest parables might fairly be called the "Parable of the Surprises of the Judgment." It is the one in which he foretells the welcome of those who have rendered him service, visiting him when he was sick, and giving him drink when he was thirsty, and many other things. His friends cannot recall any such service. The things he describes have been very small in their lives. They have passed without notice at the time. Indeed, they are the kind of things that become matters of course to people with the Christlike character. Such servants of Christ are not conscious of doing these small deeds for his sake, and they do not recognize him in those whom they help. But even though they have forgotten, he has kept a record of them. These inconspicuous deeds are treasured in his thought, and when the time comes they are brought out of the record and become part of the reward.

This kind of thing is always surprising. Many a minister has come out of his pulpit after what he felt to be a dead failure, only to find, perhaps months after, that his honest effort which had so dismally failed had actually been used by God for striking results. Dr. James MacGregor, who was for forty years the minister of St. Cuthbert's, Edinburgh, remembered the first communion which he conducted. He was almost a beardless boy, small, unimposing and unimpressive. He got through the service somehow. It may have been rather flat, but he was frankly honest in heart and zealous to help. The service made no impression at all, so far as he could see. But thirty-five years after he was traveling in New Zealand, and at Auckland a man came to him to say, "I was brought to God at your first communion and have lived near him ever since." It was the beginning of the surprises of the judgment. God had used him more largely than he had supposed.

That is a condition which is not peculiar to ministers. A large financial man in New York City made a trip recently to the Pacific coast. Almost everywhere he went he found himself welcomed not so much by bankers with whom he had had dealings, and not so much as treasurer of an institution known the world around, but by men who were in places of trust and who remembered that he had encouraged them in his office, and who told him incidents which he had forgotten; by men and women who were making their homes worthily and nobly, and who traced their inspirations to his Sunday school service. Everywhere he went there were these men and women, and his greater deeds seemed forgotten while God had kept in store his lesser ones and was giving him unexpected rewards. It is true that it was partly the greatness of his life and deeds that made the lesser things so weighty in the minds of his Sunday school pupils. But the marvel of it all was that it was the things which he had forgotten which were coming back to him now.

Our papers frequently tell of the large bequests which are given to waiters and clerks who have been kind to unrecognized benefactors. We generally smile significantly when these stories appear, and remember how frequently such kindness goes not only unrecognized but abused. That is, however, our human way of estimating it. As a matter of fact, all these kindnesses take their places not only in the social order but in the divine plan. In the enrichment of one's own life, in the sweetening and strengthening of society, and in the enlarging purpose of God these all bring their reward.

So it comes to this, that it is worth while for one to keep at one's best all the time. When the real crisis of life comes, when the supreme opportunity of life comes, no one can guess. The event which will be recorded in God's books in our behalf is not apt to be the one which we would select. It will be the one in which the spirit of Christ is most fully shown. If that spirit appears most in some great financial transaction, then that will be the great event. But if it appears chiefly in the giving of a cup of cold water, then that will be the record. Only this—life is exceedingly worth while and its best rewards are unexpected.

Another Case Wherein One Exceeds Two

The Watchman of Boston and The Examiner of New York, two Baptist journals of long service to their denomination and of eminent repute in the field of religious journalism, have been consolidated under the title of The Watchman-Examiner, which will maintain offices in both New York and Boston. This interesting combination (not in restraint of trade, but in undoubted promotion of up-to-date religion) is an event for the Baptists and a sign of the times for church people of other names. It certainly means that the illogical fatuity of trying to run a denominational paper on a sectional appeal has become visible from every angle broad enough to take in comprehensively the interests of the whole church.

If a church paper is really to contribute to the advancement of an entire national body of Christians, it must reach the whole connection with news and information pertaining to the whole connection. Telling three or four states about what has happened in those three or four states is simply to intensify the short-sightedness of that parochial spirit which prays for blessing on "us four and no more." It is fostering sectionalism by assiduously teaching a part that it is more important than the whole. If a church paper is moved by the slightest desire to unify and solidify the denomination to which it gives allegiance, its aspiration must be to escape being identified with a mere portion of the body and achieve a national identification with the entire fellowship.

This ambition accounts for the union in the Baptist family of what have been called the "New England paper" and the "middle states paper" respectively. The combined paper will serve both sections more inspiringly. The same logic brought The Interior and The Westminster together to form The Continent. Operating still more widely, it will point the way to other consolidations in other denominations. "Tendency" is here unmistakable and irresistible. The church paper of the future will be a national paper, and its acceptability to its intelligent readers will depend upon its disseminating facts of national concern and impulses to national cooperation. Parochial pride and regional prejudice and preoccupation with short and near interests must be transcended.

The editor in chief of The Watchman-Examiner will be Dr. Curtis Lee Laws, who has given up his pastorate in Brooklyn in order to devote his whole energies to the building up of the combined paper. Dr. Edward F. Merriam, the veteran editor of The Watchman, will continue as editorial associate. Under such direction the combination must go to the front of vigorous journalism.

Good Word in Bad Use Because Neglected

The denomination of Friends in the United States is making a systematic effort to secure in different states the enactment of laws prohibiting the use of any religious appellation for designating a commercial product. Their object is self-evidently to rescue "Quaker" from its now extensive employment in business.

Our friends, the Friends, however, should realize that it is mainly their own fault that the word "Quaker" has been diverted from religion to traffic. They have not themselves been understood to value it; the impression they have given the public is that they preferred to get away from it as an undignified nickname. No wonder that others picked up so honorable a word when its real owners seemed to wish to be rid of it. And The Continent is very sure that the first commercial appropriation of the term was without intention of disrespect to the Quaker fellowship; rather it was a tribute to the unassuming integrity which two and a half centuries of history have associated with the name. As for that, we suppose the Friends themselves would not have objected much if the business application of "Quaker" could have continued to relate only to sound and beneficial articles of trade. But when some audacious rascal began to advertise "Quaker" whisky, it is by no means strange that their protest broke out.

Nevertheless, we fear they have spoken too late. Unless the Friends are prepared to adopt the word "Quaker" as an official denominational title it is hard to see how in either law or equity they can set up a claim of exclusive right to what is, after all, a common, uncopyrighted dictionary word. Indeed, their own bill, if passed, prohibiting the advertisement of wares "under the name of a religious body," would very likely in present circumstances be held, on test in the courts, not to apply to their own case, for "Quaker" is not the name they recognize.

New Flame from the Old Huguenot Fire

The Record of Christian Work recounts inspiringly the life of a saintly Swiss girl, Mademoiselle Adele Kamm, who died two years ago at the age of 25 after having spent the six years previous a helpless invalid imprisoned in bed with excruciating pain. A girl of singular beauty and vivacity with everything to live for, Mademoiselle Kamm, daughter of a prominent Huguenot family in Geneva, fought out in her soul a momentous struggle when first she realized the fate to which she was condemned. But she attained a mighty victory in realizing that it had been put within her power to make an irresistible, convincing demonstration of the reality of Christian faith. If faith in Christ could support her in her circumstances, she believed that none could question its sufficiency in any human circumstances whatsoever.

With this inspiration she consecrated herself to joy in pain. She had her room hung and her bed dressed in rose-colored draperies—the hue of delight. And she wore unfailingly a smile-wreathed face, whose light brightened still as her pain increased. Her bedroom door was kept open to all comers, and soon scores sought her daily to tell her their woes and be cheered by her serene confidence in God. Able barely to move her hand, the beautiful, devoted Huguenot wrote a little book, "Joyous in Affliction," which proved a minister of consolation to thousands in her own case. Moreover, she organized an extensive circle of "shut-ins" like herself and corresponded tirelessly with the whole membership. The motto which she prescribed for her companions in suffering was "Joy is a duty." And right royally did she meet her own duty, dying as joyous as she lived.

Surely suffering in this world loses something of its mystery when it is seen to develop characters of such loftiness and such human use. The same grace that made Mademoiselle Kamm a light set on a candlestick to give light to multitudes is available in every other sickroom ruled by an equal consecration.

—In France it has become rather common for city authorities to post public handbills appealing to the people to desist from the use of alcohol. But the first instance of such municipal temperance preaching in the United States has just been furnished by the mayor and park commissioners of Cambridge, Massachusetts, who have put up in the city's parks and public buildings large and boldly printed posters that begin with these uncompromising statements: "The public thinks that it is only heavy drinking that harms. Experiments show that even moderate drinking hurts health, lessens efficiency. The public thinks that alcohol braces us for hard work and against fatigue. Experiments show that alcohol in no way increases muscular strength or endurance." And the poster concludes even more vigorously: "The public should know how small is the revenue from liquor compared with the cost of carrying the wreckage. Your money supports this wreckage. Your will allows it. Your indifference endangers your nation." Where is there another American city prepared to stand up officially and in so emphatic a fashion against liquor?

—When the Master's compassion was stirred by the hunger of the 4,000 who had continued with him three days the consideration which counted most in his unwillingness to send them away fasting was the fact that "some of them are come from far." With his church generally today the ratio of comparative concern balances the other way. It is those who come from near by about whom the church is most solicitous. Those who have grown up in church atmosphere and are familiar with the ideals of religion are the people whom the church feels responsible for feeding. Those who approach with some vagrant and casual show of interest from outside church circles, whose notions of Jesus are crude and unorthodox, whose attention to Christian conceptions seems wholly curious and temporal—the church doesn't really consider them capable of getting anything from the Master. Or is it that the church thinks the Master cannot feed them? In any case modern Christianity misses the preeminent eagerness of its Lord to supply specially the wants of those who come from farthest away.

—The Akron (Ohio) Beacon-Journal does a service to social morals at large as well as in its own city when it indignantly challenges "the leniency of judges in our courts to men guilty of despicable offenses toward womanhood as compared with judicial severity toward women who compromise themselves." This is "the double standard of morals" with a vengeance—its injustice sanctioned by the very ministers of justice itself. As this forcible daily newspaper editor goes on to say, "These shocking crimes will increase in frequency just as long as it is possible for men offenders to escape with reprimands or light sentences, while for the women there is no escape." The observation is true to vice in all phases. The sin of man is always far greater than the sin of woman in this province of the devil's realm, and fair play will never be satisfied till the man's disgrace is correspondingly the heavier.

—The vast work of the Young Men's Christian Association among the employees of railroads is so much a part of the fixed order of things today that it seems always to have been so. Railroad directors appropriate money nowadays to the associations along their lines with as little question as if they were buying coal and crossties. Yet men are not very old who remember when the mere suggestion of asking railroads to take an interest in the religious and moral welfare of their operating force was enough to create doubt of the sanity of the enthusiast who thought it possible. Indeed, it was only last week that there passed away at the age of 77 the indomitable enthusiast, Edwin D. Ingersoll, who first proved that trusting the railroads to encourage the idea and the men to respond to it was both rational and practicable. More than any other one man he was the creator of "the railroad association." Unfortunately he worked so terrifically at the task that in midlife he wrecked entirely his working strength, and for the rest of his days had to remain an onlooker. But he lived to know for how great things he had builded in the beginnings. Mr. Ingersoll was a second cousin of Robert Ingersoll, the famous infidel lecturer, and loved to think that he had been able to checkmate some of his kinsman's mischief.

—The first thing that a God-fearing and man-loving soul can do for others is himself to live purely and believe faithfully. There is no selfishness in a righteous life. Its benefits and blessings are more for neighbors than for self. The influence which it radiates through the community in which it exemplifies the beauty of goodness and faith is a richer benefaction than any largess of purposed generosity can bestow. It is all the better and all the farther-reaching because the good of a good life's good influence is unconscious and unintended. Browning's silk weaver—innocent, trustful Pippa—passing through the streets of her native village, singing the overflowing songs of her faithful heart, did vastly more to restore purity and truth among her neighbors than possibly she could have done if she had set out to preach to them. To live is the primitive preaching—the only preaching of inevitable effect.

—The Continent's recently expressed confidence in the United States courts as sure to defend the right of Christian churches to merge and combine when and as they will is further confirmed by the sweeping decision of the district court at Kansas City. The maliciously biased verdict of Missouri's state supreme judges, who held the Cumberland union illegal, is completely overridden. And thus the one intolerable brand of antiunionists—the fellow who defies a union majority with his threat of resorting to the courts for injunction—is robbed of his power to intimidate. Religious liberty would amount to mighty little in this nation if churches convinced that they do wrong in staying apart were not allowed under the law to come together. But that liberty is now fully safeguarded, and the champions of church union in all denominations may move forward without fear.

—Every interchange of friendly courtesies between Christian and Jewish congregations starts going some bitter comment on the supposed decadence of Christian faith to the point of compromise with Judaism. But why not look at it the other way round and see a sign of encouragement in Jewish approach to Christianity? There is certainly a good deal of the latter significance in the voluntary offer of the use of a great Jewish synagogue in San Francisco which came to First Congregational church of that city as the latter was ready to begin building its new edifice. The Jewish invitation said the altars of the synagogue would be more precious to the regular worshipers there after they had been solemnized anew by Christian prayers. Doesn't that mean a wonderful mellowing of the Jew toward Christ?

—The Federal Council of Churches has organized a commission on the church and country life, and the chairmanship has been accepted by Gifford Pinchot, the distinguished apostle of conservation. Rev. Charles O. Gill, author of a recent book on the country church, will be the commission's research agent. Just when other people are being taken with so serious a concern about the church problem of the rural districts is a poor time for the Presbyterian Church to drop the question. On second thought it will undoubtedly decide not to.

—Theosophists have fallen afoul of an embarrassing hindrance to their plans for presenting to the world a reincarnated Christ. The young Hindu lad, Krishnamurti, whom they have had in training in India for this role—"Alcyone" Mrs. Besant had named him—has been taken away from theosophist control by an order of British courts and restored to his father. The father alleged that the boy was being taught evil habits by his theosophical instructors. The judge considered the proof offered in support of the complaint good enough to justify the father's anxiety.

What Are the Foes of the Home?

BY ROBERT FRANCIS COYLE

OF THE THREE great divine and elemental institutions of society—the home, the church and the state—the home was first and it will be last, for both church and state will sink out of sight in the perfect home life of heaven. The home is the chief corner stone upon which the whole social fabric rests. We find society high or low, civilized or savage, pure or impure, just in proportion to the place which the home occupies in popular estimation.

The difference between the cannibal tribes of interior Africa and God-fearing American citizens comes more than anything else from the difference of their home life, or from their estimate of the family relation. Because France went down in her home life and one-fourth of the children born within her borders were illegitimate, she fell an easy prey to the home-loving German in the short but decisive war of forty years ago. We are in danger in America. This institution, without which the republic cannot live, is beleaguered and imperiled. Whatever may appear on the surface, crumbling homes mean a decaying nation; they declare that the tree of our national life is being worm-eaten at the core, and that unless the disintegrating process is arrested the tree's life will wither, its glory will fade and it will fall into ruin.

Enemies in All Classes of Society

Today in this country the home is being attacked both from the top and from the bottom of society, and assaults upon it are multiplying in the center. At one end we see wealth and luxury and extravagance striking at it, corrupting it, dissolving the discipline and severing the bonds by which the home is bound together. There are few children—the fewer the better. With plenty of money to spend and no family service to render, unknit by ties of parenthood and childhood, with lives largely given up to pleasure, amusement, travel, the satisfaction of the table, the excitement of the footlights and the diversions of new sights and scenes, there is no place for the home and no liking for the restraints and sanctities of the domestic fireside. So at the extreme society end of modern life this divine institution is seriously imperiled.

Swinging around to the other limit we find the same thing. Under the terrible pressure of earning a living, driven by the whip of stern necessity to become bread winners, vast numbers of women—and their numbers are constantly increasing—are disqualified for wifehood and motherhood. If they are married and have children they cannot care for them. They are swept into offices and factories and sweatshops with no leisure and no opportunity to minister to their little ones and cultivate domestic love. Still farther down in the ranks of the lowly, to get the benefits of cheap rents, millions are huddled like cattle in miserable tenements, compelled to live oftentimes in shameless promiscuity, in rooms which preclude the possibility of privacy and of those sacred family intimacies without which there can be no home.

Then between these extremes, in what we call the great middle class, which always constitutes the very bone and sinew of the state, easy divorce is making increasing inroads, separations are becoming more numerous, and so everywhere, up and down, the home is menaced. A certain sort of literature is lending its aid. The popular novel is making its contribution. The theater is assisting in the wrecking process. From every quarter this fortress of the world's best life, this institution without which the pillars of government rest upon the sand, is threatened, and it behooves all good people to rally to its defense.

Godless Marriage as a Home Menace

In addition to the forces attacking the home just indicated, let me specify two or three more. The first I mention is godless marriage. In the Roman Catholic Church marriage is one of the sacraments. We Protestants do not go as far as that, but in theory, at least, we teach that wedlock is of divine origin and in the books we call it "holy." How one man and one woman should live together, how they should cleave to each other and supplement each other in the family relation until severed by the inexorable hand of death is all made clear enough in the Bible. Speaking on this subject, Jesus said, "What therefore God hath joined together, let not man put asunder."

But this is precisely what man dares to do. Our blundering lesislators presume to take the matter into their own hands. They do not hesitate to usurp the prerogative of the Almighty. They reject the biblical doctrine of marriage; they strike out its holy sanctions; they eliminate God altogether; they formulate doctrines and lay down laws of their own. Thus they divest it of its divine authority and make it a civil status as distinguished from a divine institution. The inevitable logic of this legislative interference is that what Colorado hath joined together, or Kansas hath joined together, or any other state hath joined together, the state can put asunder. It is certainly obvious enough that what God joins together man has no authority to separate. It is equally obvious that a state marriage can be annulled by the state. How much of this is done is almost appalling.

The severance of God from marriage is one of the greatest perils that threaten the home today. It strikes at the very foundations of family life. Let us think clearly and boldly. The foundation of the state is the family; the foundation of the family is the marriage bond; the strength of the marriage bond is the bridal vow; and the sanctity of this vow is that it is made in the name of God. Now let the state intermeddle, let it strike out the God element, and it is in so far guilty of suicide. It is striking at its own life. What security can there be for the home if its existence hangs upon the votes of legislators or the ruling of courts? And what security can there be for the state if, by its own sanction and its own action, the homes of the people are afloat on the emotions and passions, on the misunderstandings and temporary alienations of men and women? What is needed everywhere in this country is to emphasize and enforce the divine nature of marriage, to reintroduce God into this relation, to make it holy wedlock indeed, and in this effort the state for its own security should reenforce the church.

Love of a Common God as a Bond

And not only at the marriage ceremony should God be recognized and the vows made sacred and binding and inviolable by being offered in his name but after the orange blossoms have faded, after honeymoons have given place to the practical realities of life, God, who planned the family, the God of the home, should still be its center and the bond of its union. I know there are occasional separations of husbands and wives who are church people; I know that those who have sat together at the communion table sometimes disagree at the fireside and settle their quarrel in the divorce court. But I know also that such cases are comparatively rare. Where the husband and wife are Christians, where they kneel together at the family altar, where Christ is enthroned in their affections, where they are united in Him, annulment of the marriage relation does not occur once in ten thousand times. With Christ in the house, the devils of deceit and hatred and lying and lust and jealousy are barred. There is a barricade around that house which they cannot climb, a wall of protection too strong for them to overcome. The most effective remedy for the divorce evil of our times is Christ.

The home is endangered, moreover, by lack of instruction in prenuptial days; instruction of boys and girls in the adolescent period of life on the part of the parents and instruction later on as to the mating of the diseased and the unfit and warning as to the consequences which must follow. Thousands of households are broken up and thousands of families split in sunder because marriage was entered into in ignorance of certain physical laws and in ignorance of what must be the effect of the mingling of tainted and diseased blood. The teaching of sex hygiene, if taught in the right place and by the right persons, and education in eugenics will do much to forestall this danger in the future and make for happier homes and healthier offspring.

But along with it all we must have a more wholesome public sentiment. Marriages entered into at a venture; entered into hastily and as a kind of joke; entered into without deliberation, without solemnity, without a sense of responsibility, and with a feeling that the marriage bond is not necessarily binding and indissoluble, should be frowned upon. Disapproval should be so emphatic and unmistakable as to cover with shame and confusion those who form such alliances. They should be refused social recognition. If we had such a sentiment as this it would crystallize into sane and wholesome legislation, and what are now practically trial marriages and progressive polygamy would cease to be the disgrace of our country and the menace of family life. A few days ago statistics were given the country showing that since 1870 nearly 2,000,000 divorces have been granted in the United States, of which 100,000 were obtained from the courts in 1912, and that by reason of these divorces 70,000 children had been deprived of one or both parents last year. It is appalling. If the home is the foundation of the republic, how can the republic stand with the foundation slipping out from under it at such a rate as this?

For Homes of the Right Sort Thank God

Thank God for homes of the right sort, homes where love reigns, where trust reposes, where peace broods, where happiness dwells and cheerfulness is ever present. A home of this kind is a refuge from the storm. The husband, tempest-tossed out in the world of business, sometimes almost shipwrecked on the rough sea, puts into this blessed harbor for repairs and sails away in the morning a new man. Weary, it rests him. Discouraged, it heartens him. Unnerved, it braces him. Its threshold is the wharf where his burdens are unladen. The welcome of the house mother and the laughter of the children and the genial atmosphere make him forget his annoyances and exasperations. The deceits and the humbugs and the hypocrisies of the market place are left behind, and here he knows everything is genuine. It is tonic. It is refreshment. It is invigoration. It is life. Homes like this are still numerous. They can be found in every community, and they are the hope, the mainstay of the nation. Confounded be every influence that would destroy them. Confounded be every influence that would attack them. The queenly wives and mothers enthroned in them are a mightier power for good than all the pulpits and all the senates and all the statesmen and all the reformers in the land. Take away such homes as these and nothing can save us from the Goths and Vandals. Take them away and the hordes of Alaric and Attila will play havoc with our civilization.

Not better ships, not standing armies, not stringent laws, not incorruptible courts, not cordons of police, not thick-walled penitentiaries—these are not our best defense. No fortress is like the home; no stronghold of the republic so impregnable. If ever it falls, down will go the pillars of the state.

Real Help for the Immigrant Child

BY ROBERT H. GAULT

Professor Gault is one of the chief members of the department of psychology of Northwestern University at Evanston, Illinois, and is managing editor of The Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology. His study of criminology has directed his attention to the fact that the prison population is disproportionately of foreign extraction, and to consider ways of preventing children of immigrant parentage from turning to crime. Vocational training and Christian homes are his suggestions, and it is interesting to consider Professor Gault's article in connection with Dr. Coyle's message on the foes of the home, which immediately precedes it.

STEAMSHIP companies, labor organizations and manufacturing interests are accustomed to bring heavy pressure to bear upon our national legislature, each from its own point of view, whenever the complex problem of restriction of immigration is brought forward for consideration. There is another aspect to the whole question, however, that has not been brought before the public in its proper light. I refer to the connection between immigration and crime. When once it shall have been sufficiently emphasized the popular attention will be turned toward really constructive measures relating to our immigrant neighbors.

It has easily been taken for granted that there is a direct relation between the volume of the tide of immigration and the population of our penal institutions, and that a similar relationship exists between the number of immigrants and the number of convictions for crime. Quite the contrary of this assumption is true. Taking the state of New York as an illustration, Dr. Horwicz, statistician in the census bureau in Washington, has shown that in the course of several decades preceding our own the volume of crime in that state, as measured by the prison population and by the number of convictions in courts of record, was actually less in those years in which the greatest influx of European immigration into the state occurred than in other years. But this does not dispose of the whole matter.

Immigrants' Children and Prison Population

Our socializing, citizen-making machinery as applied to our immigrants from other shores breaks down in dealing with the offspring of our immigrant population. There is, therefore, an indirect relation between immigration and crime in America. The children of the foreign-born apparently contribute more than their share to the criminal classes. The prison census of 1904 says that "of the native white prisoners, committed in 1904, 29.8 per cent were of foreign parentage, while of the entire native white population only 18.8 per cent were of foreign parentage." The children of foreign-born parents in that year, therefore, contributed to the number of those who were convicted and imprisoned about 60 per cent more than they should have done in proportion to their numbers. This is a startling record of criminality among the children of immigrants. It points to a condition that obtains in our American cities, where the immigrant population is concentrated. In approximately forty cities of over 100,000 population, the proportion of foreign-born is four times and that of the children of foreign parents three and one-third times as great as that of colonial and older native stock.

Our institutions—our schools and our homes—the function of which is to make each one who comes under their influence a part of our civilization, a part of our nation, fall short of attaining their high purpose. It is not because in the immigrant stock they have defective material upon which to work. In spite of the disadvantage under which this element in our population labors on account of unfamiliarity with our language the percentage of sons and daughters of foreign-born in our schools who are retarded in the grades because of inefficiency is not much greater than of the children of the native born. The figures are 36 and 34 respectively. Yet our institutions fail. The American home of the immigrant parent is not like that which he maintained in his native land. Here he must make a living and at the same time learn to interpret a new environment. The two together are a heavy responsibility. His children make more rapid progress than he in adjusting themselves to our American community life. They must therefore interpret many things to their parents. This only increases the difficulty of the parent as a ruler of his home. The children have a certain prestige there that the elders have not, and they take advantage of it. Here is the beginning of a breakdown of a home that in the foreign land in a small town or rural community was entirely successful in performing its normal function. The home of the foreigner in America calls for our support.

A strict enforcement of compulsory education laws would be in the line of what is required. But we do not enforce the laws. We say in Illinois that children between 14 and 16 years of age who are not employed must be in school. But there are probably more than 12,000 such young people in the city of Chicago alone who are idle in the streets in open defiance or disregard of the law. How many of them belong to immigrant families is probably not known. It is safe to assume, however, that a liberal percentage of them belong closely to the immigrant class. They as a group are ambitious to enter industrial or commercial life. They want to "get ahead" and they have lived in an atmosphere that emphasizes material gain. Add to this the fact already mentioned that the restraining influence of home is weakened directly or indirectly by the American environment, and we have, as a consequence, the spectacle of hundreds and thousands of immature young people leaving unwilling homes against the will of the state to seek elusive "jobs." Few succeed. Hence idleness, temptation, juvenile crime.

If the state would but bolster up these homes by keeping a hand upon the youth through, or almost through, the critical period of adjustment known as the "teens" there would be a great gain. Something would be accomplished by enforcing at least the "compulsory" education law already on the books.

Urgent Need of More Vocational Training

But parents and children throughout the union are saying, "Give us schools of vocational character that will help us more distinctly than other institutions to realize our ambitions and the enforcement of your law will be more practicable." Very well! But such schools are good for their pedagogical and moral value as well. We are not dealing today alone with the small town and rural school of twenty-five or forty years ago. The growth of cities and the concentration of a foreign population within them have brought new educational responsibilities. We must adjust ourselves to the load. If we do not create more special vocational schools to meet the classes of whom we are thinking our teachers must judiciously introduce at least a vocational flavor into the present activities of the schools. If such measures will make the schools more attractive to our industrially inclined young immigrant population nothing but good can be the consequence.

But the responsibility of the state must not be cut short as soon as the youth has found employment. He is not necessarily upon his feet when he begins at the foot of the ladder in industrial or commercial life. There are yet so many possible slips between him and the attainment of good citizenship that the state cannot afford to let him go and take the risk. At this stage of his career the youth's outlook is confused. He cannot see what the great establishment may have in store for one who is careful, industrious and honest. He sees only a cog and a pinion in the whole complex situation and before long he is discouraged and drifting away to try another and another "job." He becomes a "ne'er-do-well" and is at the next door to temptation and crime.

The state must shoulder the responsibility to support this employee at least until he is 18 years old by compelling him to attend for a minimum of six hours a week a vocation part-time school in which the course of instruction shall be designed to provide vocational enlightenment for youth breadwinners. Such institutions would do a world of good by steadying the young people who are under compulsion to attend the classes that they provide. They are not innovations. Cincinnati, Cleveland and Boston are among the large cities in America in which such schools have successfully passed the experimental stage. Employers of labor in those cities are friendly to the movement and cooperate fully with the authorities in executing the plan, even though the minimum hours a week required of the pupil must be taken out of the time that would otherwise be occupied by labor.

The present earnest discussion of projects for vocational education will bring results. But to be most effective from the viewpoint of the criminologist and from that of the employer who wants to hold interested and intelligent helpers, whatever legislation is effected must include a provision for compulsory attendance at part-time day vocational schools on the part of all youths who are employed in gainful occupations up to the age of 18 years. Such a provision should be made to apply at least in cities of the first class where our congested immigrant, labor-seeking population occurs. When some of these things are done we shall have turned toward really constructive efforts in behalf of our immigrant population.

In the last analysis the solution of every problem that concerns the criminologists must rest upon enlightened Christian homes. There is the crux of the whole matter. To take the responsibility away from the home is in the direction of danger. Reenforcements, however, are needed and should be welcomed. Heads of families who are leaders in our community life will understand where the responsibility lies and will select what reenforcements will best suit the occasion.

"Teen-Aged" Girls Form a City Council

BY LEE McCRAE

GIRLS from 15 to 20 years of age lately held a two days' conference in Birmingham, Alabama, discussing their own interests in church and Sunday school progress. The purpose of it all was to combine their energies, develop their talent for leadership and study ways and means of training themselves for duties already undertaken.

In this conference of three sessions 397 girls were registered, each of whom had been duly elected by her own school. They represented every denomination and nearly all of the separate churches of the city. Only these delegates were admitted to the floor or to take any part in the deliberations, although teachers and others specially interested were in the gallery.

The whole undertaking had been planned and was carried out by the girls themselves. They wrote personal letters to every one of the 116 superintendents urging the proper election of delegates, formed their committees, arranged their program and telephoned every pastor. Beautiful posters were prepared by the girls and the decorating committee made First Methodist church, which had been chosen for a central meeting place, most attractive.

The conference consisted of an opening session on a Saturday morning, an automobile ride in the afternoon, followed by a banquet and a social hour, with a 4 o'clock meeting on Sunday. In the program three addresses were given by experienced women, but aside from these all the talks were by the girls themselves. There was a deep interest shown from the moment of opening, there was a spirit and life that is not common in like gatherings and the final service was one of earnest consecration.

Half of the girls took voluntary pledges, writing upon cards what they wanted to do and be in church work, signing their names and addresses. The definiteness of these pledges is truly unusual; there were no qualifications, nearly all offering unconditional service and asking for specific work. Some designated the lower grades of the Sunday school, many begged for a chance to help girls of their own age, five volunteered for the missionary field and four decided for Christ for the first time. These pledges, held in sacred secrecy by the leader, will help to place each girl where she belongs.

This necessitated the formation of a permanent council. It was quickly decided upon, its four officers and a district leader for each of the eleven sections of the city were chosen, and lo! the first "teen-aged" girls' council in the world.

Its first efforts as a body will be the organizing of teen-aged classes in their own and neighboring churches, with "100 new ones" as a slogan, while classes that have been ineffective will be revived and inspired with new ideas.

Closely following this will be started a practical plan of social service, utilizing the splendid spirit of home missionary zeal already in evidence. While all these larger plans are in progress, individual girls will find places in their own Sunday schools, going in as assistants in most cases while they study preparation for leadership. For instance, the ones who desire primary work as a life position will be gathered together once a week for regular study under a trained teacher, junior workers taking a similar course under their experts, and material and books will be given those who cannot come to the central meeting places. Large conferences for all the girls of the city will be arranged by this council and in the smaller body every question referring to the welfare of Birmingham girls will be discussed.

There is such an eagerness to be up and doing and such definiteness of purpose that older leaders in church work consider this movement the greatest in influence of any that has ever been started in this southern city.

How a Human Lily Came Up from the Mud

BY NORMAN B. BARR

THERE SAT in the congregation one evening a girl of 14. She was of the race of John Huss, though not of his faith. From Bohemia her parents had brought her, a babe, into that thickest part of Chicago where life has the meagerest portion of air and light, shelter and sustenance. The family was one of many thousands that have come from Europe in recent years to better their condition, only to make it worse. The restraints of religion were left behind. Here there was more opportunity to indulge the appetite for liquor and here it was fostered by the treating custom. The father succumbed to the environment. His descent in the scale of manhood and workmanship carried his wife and children down with him into poverty and squalor.

In a rickety old building on the alley they lived, seven of them, in four little rooms. The house was cluttered and sloppy with the washings which the mother took to help support the family. The necessity of cleaning other people's clothes for pay exhausted time and energy for keeping her own home clean. It was a dismal, stingy place to call home. But it was the best home the family could know under the circumstances.

The 14-year-old girl was the eldest of the children. She was a wage earner. She had been in the tailor shops since she was 12 years of age. Her associations with other girls, in other homes, and what she saw in the store windows as she went to and from work furnished her mind with material out of which to construct a better home than she knew. She longed for a more human environment, for a fuller, richer life.

In the course of the sermon that evening the minister alluded to the lilies that lift themselves out of the mud of the lake bottom and put forth their beauty in pure white. He said there were human lilies that lifted their purity up through the mire of hovels and slums. It was a seed in good soil. That moment she resolved by God's help to be one of his lilies.

With the new vision and the fresh purpose the little girl returned to the unkept home and to the hard work of the shop, passing to and from, day by day, with the vision taking shape and the purpose growing firmer. She brought home the wages for her work, a tiny sum, to add to the small earnings of the overworked mother and the underworked father. Far into the night she sat up mending and remaking garments for the little ones, or helping her mother with the family washing and scrubbing. She set herself to encourage the mother's waning spirit, and to drive from the father's life and from the home the spirit of rum. She took it upon herself to see that the smaller children had clothes and got into them and off to Bible school on Sunday. She did not relax her own fidelity in worshiping God and hearing his word. In the church she found the dew and the sunshine that caused the lily in her life to flourish.

Increasing age and increasing skill with her kindly spirit and clean way gradually increased her earnings. The persistent purpose to improve the home bore fruit in the father's life. He drank less and earned more. The mother by and by needed to take in no more outside washing. She used her time and strength to keep her own house in order. Two of the younger children came to the income earning age and went into the shops to help earn their daily bread. The young girl's vision saw the possibility of a home of their own. It should have a piano. She was afraid to reveal this part of her dream to her father—who had no use for the beautiful, who cared only for shelter and for food and drink. She bought the piano on the installment plan—storing it at the home of a friend. She took sewing from others and worked upon it far into the night to keep up the payments.

The piano was finally paid for. But there was no home into which to bring it. An opportunity came to purchase a cottage in the neighborhood. She borrowed of her employer enough to make the first payment. The family agreed to the purchase. All began to save to help pay for it. The father, catching the idea of owning his own house, still further reduced his drink bills and increased his earnings. They moved into the home. Then began the battle for the beautiful. The piano was brought home. When the father came home that night the girl was beaten and pulled about the house by the hair of her head. The husband and father had been in the habit of beating his wife and his children. His anger revived the habit. But the piano stayed. It was paid for. One by one, against strong protests and threats, other tasty things were added to the home. Everything she bought was of the best. In time the home was the most comfortable and pleasant in the neighborhood and all of it their own—the house, lot and furnishings.

Meanwhile, what was happening in the shop where she worked? Her employer was an Italian who had lost faith in the church of his fathers and so in his God. The whole family was alienated from the church. Her companions in toil were Jew and gentile, Romanist and Protestant. At lunch time they sang the catchy songs of the street and the theater. Their conversation was the chaffy talk of the world they knew. By and by they were singing hymns. "Where He Leads Me I Will Follow" became a favorite with everybody. She taught them the ten commandments and the principal points of the life of Jesus. Her employer and fellow employees at her invitation accompanied her to her church. Her employer returned finally with his family to his own church. Some of the employees united with other churches. Though she is forewoman, her girls say to her, "You are no forelady; you are just one of us."

Through her home she has influenced many friends of her social world. She invites them to her home that they and her brothers and sisters may have clean and helpful associations. She is so religion-full that it overflows on occasion in kindly rebukes for wrongdoing and encouragement in right living. On one of these overflowing occasions the mother remarked, "You better get a pulpit and put it up in front and preach." The young people sometimes remark, "We will not need to go to hear the minister preach, now that you have preached to us." But she sees to it that they go.

It must not be supposed that all of this zeal was without periods of darkness and discouragement, that this young girl was never tempted, and never felt like giving over her ambition to become a lily. All heroic as well as unheroic souls have periods of doubt and despair. She was no exception. But in the Bible, in prayer and in the church she found encouragement and strength.

She now has the inclination to be a missionary among her own people who grope after a better life without the light of him who is "the Light of the world." Her earnings now at the shop are twice a missionary's salary. The home still has need of part of her income. But sometime she hopes to put her life among the Bohemians of her city. She is not idle in missionary work. She has a class in one of the schools of her church. She sings in the choir. On days when work is slack at the shop she takes a list of names and goes from house to house looking up straying lives and bringing gospel cheer to the homes. She helps overworked mothers with their sewing and assists younger girls to make their own dresses. She is now, indeed, has long been, a "home" missionary.

The lily has lifted itself up through the mud of its environment not only physically but spiritually also. It took years to rise and unfold its whiteness and give forth its fragrance. But all through the years of its unflowered beauty its green foliage has been an inspiration to others, an influence for righteousness and godliness. She is yet on the threshold of life. What the fruitage of this life shall be through the years that remain to her on earth, who can estimate? Who shall say what one such life is worth to this world? Who would not gladly spend and be spent in giving lily life in the mud the dew and the sunshine necessary to liberate it into the fullness of life eternal?

Building Upon Fourteen Dollars and Faith

How "The Little Missionary" of New York Began and Developed Her Work

BY ADA PATTERSON

Miss Sara Curry

She helps to give life and strength to East side babies

ESCAPE from the roar and clatter of a Second Avenue elevated train at 8th street, walk a block and turn into a side street in New York and you will, if you are sensitive to your surroundings, involuntarily stop before a house that does not seem to belong in that crowded East side quarter, a four-storied, capacious brownstone that looks as though it might have housed a leisurely living family that lived gently and was true always to the fine purposes of life.

"An old family mansion" will be your conjecture, and you will walk on in the full belief in this illusion unless there issues from the house as you stand there a short, slight briskly moving figure, its mistress. The house shelters 150 babies, and is one of the famous institutions of New York—"The Little Missionary's Day Nursery." The tiny woman in plain black frock, her brown hair brushed smoothly back because there is not time to spare to arrange it in the loose, becoming ripples that are the prevailing fashion, and with gray eyes set far apart that look kindly at you from established habit, even though you arrest her swift progress around the corner, is "the little missionary." Fate or circumstances have named her Sara Curry, but to the loyal East sider she is, and sufficiently, "the little missionary."

The four-storied place of peace is unique. No metropolitan skyscraper is of such origin, it being the only pretentious structure on Manhattan island built on a foundation of $14 and faith.

To explain the structure one must explain Miss Curry. Twenty years ago she came to New York City from Utica, where she had for many years worked in a factory to support herself and younger brothers, but where vision had come to her of the needs of other lives, and a burning purpose to minister to those needs. She allied herself with the Mariners' temple at Chatham square on the border of Chinatown. The work assigned her was to rescue the white girls who had drifted upon the maelstrom of the city's manifold temptations and their own weaknesses into that menacing bit of the Orient. It was one of these girls whom she rescued from the slow death of the soul in that infamous region who affectionately bestowed upon her the title that has endured for twenty years, and that doubtless will be the line that will be her epitaph. There had been ten years of this labor and it had borne good fruits in the renewed and redeemed lives of many of that class of women who some sociologists think should be eliminated as the least worthy of the unfit, but of whom Alice C. Smith and other workers in that harrowing portion of the vineyard assert one-half of their number is yearly being saved, and in defense of one of whom the Master employed a satire unusual to his gentle tongue. But one morning while she was returning from one of her ministering errands there befell a tragedy which turned the course of her work into different channels.

On a scorching mid-August day she made her way through a swarming human mass gasping for a saving current of fresh air, when there was a feeble, gasping sound and something small and helpless, wrapped in rags, fell into the mass and struck the sidewalk.

A choking, half stifled cry, then silence. The little missionary pressed through the crowd, waved it back and knelt beside the bundle and unwrapped it. The fright-distorted face of a dead babe stared at her from the mass of rags that enveloped it. She lifted the bundle upon her knee, and while the voices of the children were hushed and the hats of men came off and the faces of women were sad under the spell of the majesty of death, the little missionary closed the staring eyes and prayed for the soul that had escaped in those shuddering death gasps.

When she had straightened the little body and covered the pinched little face with a corner of her wrap she carried the dead baby upstairs. She laid it upon the bed in an empty room and turned to one of the women who, with arms red from a washtub, crowded close, and said:

"Is there no one to look after these children?"

"Its mother is cleaning offices. Its father is looking for work. The neighbors have enough to do to keep their own from tumbling under the car wheels. Who was to keep this one from falling off the fire escape? You?" sneered the woman. The little missionary looked at her with her contemplative gray eyes ever veiled by their mist of tenderness.

"Yes," she answered, "God helping me, I will."

On her way home Miss Curry took inventory of her worldly wealth. It consisted of a slight but sufficient wardrobe and the $14. The wardrobe was not of the nature of a cash asset, but the few dollars helped to pay in advance for three rooms in a tenement. In these she placed a table and chairs, a few cots and set out to tell mothers that there was an isle of safety in the big ocean of the city's dangers for their little ones.

"For 5 cents a day we will take care of your children as long as you are out at work," she said.

Soon the three rooms were crowded. A board of health inspector called to say the department could not countenance a nursery kept among the dubious sanitary conditions of a tenement house. Miss Curry showed him how spotless was the wee nursery, and their chat ended with her ultimatum: "Of course I shall be glad to move to better quarters if the board of health will find them—and pay the rent."

The board of health permitted her to remain as long as she liked, which was until she could move the babies into a vacant store room, she living on the tenement floor above.

The Last Coin—and Prayer

Summer came and she contrived to move her charges to a summer camp at Netherwood, New Jersey. Not having money to pay the rent of a house, she set up a tent, and beneath its canvas roof her wan little charges grew fat and red of cheek. The day came when she was balancing the last coin in her hand and wondering how she could conjure successors for it. She prayed. Miss Curry has the habit of prayer, profound, answer-bringing prayer. This prayer brought a tangible answer the next day.

A little girl had been seized with a fancy to give a bazar. Her rich neighbors at her summer home patronized the bazar. Asking the small hostess why they were paying exorbitant prices for unimportant pieces of fancywork, they received the reply: "The proceeds will go to the little missionary's day nursery." The little girl never told Miss Curry how she had learned of the nursery. The child sent a check for $175, and Miss Curry sent her thanks on high.

Through his little daughter's interest the child's father became interested in the work. He told the story of the nursery and its needs to other rich neighbors, winter residents of Manhattan. He and two other men who believed in giving babies a chance called on Miss Curry and suggested that she needed a house for her work. She suggested the four-storied house at 93 St. Mark's place, whence we just now saw Miss Curry issuing.

The house was purchased subject to a heavy mortgage. The basement and first floor were given to Miss Curry's work. The rooms on the upper floors were rented. Her babies had breathing space and were in no present danger of being dispossessed. Again Miss Curry fell upon her knees and gave thanks for answered prayer.

There grew out of this day nursery a kindergarten where the babies' older brothers and sisters are started toward the goal of self-help through education; a girls' club for reading and debate; a cooking school, where girls are taught to minister to the family's welfare through material means; the Helping Hand, where mothers learn to help each other; the mothers' meeting, where over a hundred women of the East side, anxious to bear the banner of motherhood nobly, but little knowing how, learn from counsel with those wiser than themselves; the men's meetings, where men who have reformed from drunkenness and other means of character undermining meet each week to help each other along the difficult upward road.

The records of the brownstone house with the stained glass window in the wide hospitable door show 16,249 visits made to East side homes for their betterment in one year. In 12,000 of these the sick were helped and cheered by efficient visitors. At Thanksgiving 600 families that would else have been hungry at the festival of the harvest fed from the autumn bounty garnered through the agency of the little missionary. The tent at Netherwood has given way to a thriving little settlement where every summer she gathers all the weak and ailing babies she can find, and their mothers, and maintains them through the hot months amid the healing of the country.

Some Illuminating Incidents of Her Career

Did one choose to toss statistics as jugglers their glittering balls the array of the little missionary's work would seem stupendous. I prefer to cite individual acts, showing with what spirit of helpfulness and gratitude she has imbued the nearly submerged East side.

A monster testimonial meeting was once tendered her. Residents of the East side desired to demonstrate their gratitude for the good works of the little missionary. While speeches and songs were at their height a small, shy boy pushed his way upon the platform and pressed a cheap little gift into her hand.

"Come, Willie! Master William Ponceford is next upon the program. He will tell what Miss Curry did for him while his mother was ill and poor and no organization had room nor time to care for him. Come, Willie!"

The booming tones of the presiding officer disconcerted him. The child cast one glance at the monster audience, turned an embarrassed back upon it, ran to Miss Curry, slipped into her arms and kissed her cheek. The audience became a tumultuous sea of applause. To it came vividly what dimly we all know—the truth that there are maiden mothers whose degree, earned in the College of Life, is Universal Motherhood, the loving, understanding motherhood of all humanity.

The pastor of a struggling, all but starving church told how, inspired by her words and works of faith, "we gained the courage to go ahead and buy a building and reach the hearts of friends to help us pay for it." Said a brother pastor: "She has helped me with many a difficult case in my parish, never saying 'no' to me, though I knew there was waiting for her in her own field more than anyone could do." Still another gladiator in the ecclesiastical arena said: "Miss Curry has helped me many a time when I have not known which way to turn." With tears in eyes and voice the young evangelist drew his worn Bible from his coat pocket and said: "Miss Curry, I have no other gift to bring than this comforting word of God. May it help you to bring light to more souls in darkness and comfort to more of the sorrowing!"

On the occasion of this great mass meeting of tribute to a tiny woman a workman chokingly said, "She sat for four hours one night beside my dying baby's cradle and 'twas she who closed its eyes at last."

How Her Prayer Was Again Answered

A rich, eccentric man of Rochester heard of her work. In the wide hall of the day nursery is a bas relief in granite telling of his deathbed bequest.

"I give and bequeath $225,000 to aid the beautiful work of the most unselfish woman I have ever known." So he devised the bulk of his fortune and so was the little missionary's prayer again answered.

Odd Bits of Humor

TWO "FF'S" IN "GRAPHIC"—Joel Chandler Harris, the author of Uncle Remus, was at his desk one night when an old-time reporter looked over and said: "Joe, how do you spell 'graphic'? With one 'f' or two?"

"Well," said the kindly Uncle Remus, who was too gentle to hurt even a common adjective, "if you are going to use any, Bill, I guess you might as well go the limit."

THE "ZOO" WITH A VARIATION—"What wild beasts are there now?" an eager little lad asked of his father. Before the parent could reply another child made answer:

"The only wild beasts there are now are in the theological gardens."

A BOARDER BY PROXY—"Are you acquainted with Mrs. Hifly, your fashionable neighbor?"

"Only in a roundabout way. Her cat boards at my house."—Louisville Courier-Journal.

THE HOME COUNCIL

"Perfected Through Suffering" By Elizabeth M. Stewart

This little story of one woman who was made "perfect through suffering" was born of a very real experience, and was sent to The Continent in the hope that God might use it to inspire some other grievously tried soul

TO SUFFER is the common lot of man. The Romans thought that the acme of perfection was to have "a sound mind in a sound body," but to become "perfect through suffering" is a more excellent thing.

How many of God's noble men and women there are doing their work in life faithfully, day by day, who never open their eyes in the morning or close them at night without consciousness of pain. Some chronic affliction has branded them for life, making of them almost constant sufferers.

They see acquaintances, afflicted, who have money and leisure, traveling hither and thither in search of comfort and health, but they must work on.

Sometimes, when laid aside because the suffering is too great to be endured, they find it hard to say, "Not as I will, but as thou wilt."

This experience had come to one such sufferer. For many weeks she had kept this quotation pasted upon the mirror of her dressing table, "Earth's sweetest flower—a woman perfected," and as her eyes rested upon it daily she had breathed a prayer to her dear heavenly Father that he, for his honor and glory, would help her to become such a perfected woman.

One day she lay upon her bed, weak and worn, with such intense suffering that she was tempted to pray that death might come to her relief. She was asking her Saviour, "Why must I endure so much pain?" when this answer came to her as plainly as if a voice softly whispered it, "Earth's sweetest flower—a woman perfected"—"made perfect through suffering."

The questioning was over, and such peace immediately filled her heart that she knew at once it was the Saviour speaking to her, as he had done so often before, telling her he had heard her prayer and was helping her to answer it.

Soon she fell into a peaceful sleep. When she awakened a few hours later the dreadful pain was gone and, though still weak, she felt contented and happy.

As she lay there in the quiet of the twilight meditating upon the experiences of the afternoon she realized that though she had suffered in the flesh and was weakened physically she had been quickened in spirit, and could say, with the psalmist of old, "It is good for me that I have been afflicted; that I may learn thy statutes." She knew, too, that when she was again strong enough she would be ready to take up her daily work, however wearisome it might be, more cheerfully than ever, and to say, whenever her spirit flagged—

> "Disappointment—his appointment"—
> Lord, I take it then as such,
> Like the clay in hands of potter,
> Yielding wholly to thy touch.
> All my life's plan is thy molding,
> Not one single choice be mine:
> Let me answer unrepining—
> Father, "Not my will, but thine."

The Domesticating of Tony Martin

THE EASE with which a baby martin may be tamed and made a member of the family is illustrated by a true story in The Spectator, London:

The Sunday school teacher drew a bow at a venture and called out to a group of small boys tremendously busy with something, "Put that poor beetle down, children, and come along; you'll be late." A chorus of voices answered her, "'Tain't a bettle, marm! 'Tis a little bird!" and three excited little boys rushed up with the unfortunate fledgling.

As the teacher took it in her hand she saw that the terrified mite was a baby house martin, and therefore entitled to every consideration. The poor nestling had fallen from the eaves of a four-storied house on to a hard road; it had been man-handled by small boys; and, worst of all, it was old enough to feel that dread of human beings which causes an animal to resist to death every effort to help it. Still the attempt must be made.

The teacher took the baby into the room where her class awaited her. It lay quietly enough in her hand while she endeavored to make Paul's missionary journeys interesting, or at least intelligible, to the bucolic mind, and at the end of the lesson she took "Martin" home and tried to make him comfortable. A small covered basket lined with wadding received him; he was put on the kitchen mantelpiece and left to recover his shattered nerves in quiet and warmth until service was over. Then a mealworm was procured and a valiant effort made to feed him. He could not be induced to open his beak, so it had to be done for him, and only those who have tried know how difficult it is to do this without hurting the bird, and how little beak there is to lay hold of. The struggle was renewed every hour or so—on the whole successfully—but when the teacher laid her head on the pillow that night she had small expectation of finding her charge alive.

About 3:30 in the morning a sound like a miniature watchman's rattle issued from the basket, and when the lid was raised a wide open mouth popped up and mealworms were gulped down as fast as they could be provided. From that time onward "Tony" was always ready for meals, and he speedily made himself the acknowledged master of the family among whom he found himself. He and his mealworm bottle went everywhere—into the garden to pick flowers and fruit, for drives (which he enjoyed), to garden parties (which bored him) and from room to room, wherever his friends happened to be.

Presently he grew adventurous and took to scrambling on to the edge of his basket, and resented having the lid shut; but what he liked best of all was to be nursed. He would lie for an hour or more in the palm of one's hand, snuggling down and occasionaly rubbing his head against one's fingers, twittering contentedly. When disturbed he clung with feet and outstretched wings, scolding and even pecking, for Tony had a temper, and manifested it plainly when matters were not to his liking.

He learned to preen his plumage, and took as much pride in his sprouting tail as a youth in the first growth of his mustache. His great achievement was an unusual one for a martin—his daily bath. A small dish was filled for him every morning, and he splashed with great gusto until he had not a dry feather on his plump little body. Next came the art of flying, in preparation for the great day when he would take flight and join his fellows.

He was inclined to be lazy, preferring "slippered ease" to the strenuous life, but set him on the ground and stand a few yards off and call, and Tony put his best leg and wing forward. At first he pattered along on stumpy legs, then growing excited he would make astonishingly long leaps, aided by his outspread wings, until he reached a friend's hand, where he would nestle with chuckles of self-gratulation and much "kissing."

One day he made a notable discovery. His friends could not always provide a hand for his use, but he found he could scramble up the front of a blouse, squeeze himself in between two buttons and cling as his forebears have done for generations to the front of a house. Once hidden there he was perfectly happy, and he expressed it by low singing. Strangers sometimes found it hard not to show surprise on hearing the "dress front" of the lady with whom they were talking burst into melody, but it soon came to be understood that she was merely wearing Tony.

He was a long time learning to feed himself, and to the end of his stay always gave himself "three cheers" whenever he managed to catch or pick up either fly or mealworm.

The day of parting, however, drew near. It had been agreed that as soon as Tony was capable he should lead the life that nature intended. One fine morning when he was taken into the garden as usual he sprang from his friend's hand into the air, and after a few ever-widening circles he rose higher and higher, until he joined the crowd of martins disporting themselves aloft, mingled with them, and was lost to sight. His going left a sad blank in the family circle, but it was better so, for martins seldom if ever survive the damp and gloom of an English winter, and we prefer to think of him enjoying his life in the sunshine.

It was a geography lesson, and the teacher, according to Harper's Magazine, had been asking what some of the different states were noted for. Looking at one of the little girls, she asked:

"Tell me, Florence, what Rhode Island is celebrated for."

For a moment the child was silent, then an inspiration came to her.

"Rhode Island," replied the little girl, "is celebrated for being the only one of the United States that is the smallest."

Conception of Oasis a Mistaken One

The reading public seems to believe that an oasis necessarily consists of a clump of palm trees beside a brackish well. But E. Alexander Powell says in "The Last Frontier" that many of them are great stretches of well watered and cultivated soil, sometimes many square miles in extent, and rich in fig, pomegranate, orange, apricot and olive trees. The oasis of Kaouer, for example, with its 100,000 date palms, furnishes subsistence for the inhabitants of a score of straggling villages with their camels, flocks and herds.

There are said to be 4,000,000 date palms in the oases of the Algerian Sahara alone, and to cut down one of them is considered as much of a crime as arson is in a great city, for its fruit is a sufficient food, from its leaves a shelter can be made which will keep out sun and wind and rain, and its shade protects life and cultivation.

Many date palms and even vineyards have flourished for several years past in southernmost Algeria by means of water from below the surface, while the chief of the French geodetic survey recently announced that a tract in the very heart of the Sahara, nine degrees in longitude by twelve degrees in latitude, is already sufficiently watered to raise grain.

YOUNG AMERICA

The Girl Who Was Like Jonah

BY ARTHUR CHAMBERLAIN

IT WAS WARM in Sunday school, and Cara Smethurst's gaze wandered inattentively out through the open window. She was very fond of her teacher, Miss Wallerford; but the fact that Miss Wallerford was coming to tea on Monday evening interested her much more than did the lesson.

How lovely it would be to sit beside Miss Wallerford at the table, and to go out into the garden with her after tea, when the flowers were sweetest—— A little stir all over the room and a sudden change of pitch in Miss Wallerford's voice recalled Cara from her day dream.

"So you see how much trouble came to Jonah because he ran away disobediently from his duty; yet he had to do his duty, after all. Even after he'd done his duty and had seen its splendid outcome — a whole city saved through his preaching—it was no joy to him, because he could think of nothing but his own troubles—troubles, too, that had nothing to do with his duty, but only with his disobedience."

The bell rang for the closing exercises, and Cara drew a long breath. Privately, she felt that Jonah was a very selfish and conceited man, and not to be compared with a certain nice little girl in her best Sunday frock standing up to sing the closing hymn.

Cara came through the two school sessions on Monday fairly well, although her attention was not all that could be desired. She rode home on the electric and rushed into the house, to find her mother standing near the telephone, looking somewhat disconcerted.

"You say it's been like this all day, Hannah?" Mrs. Smethurst inquired of the maid, who stood a little apart, her arms akimbo.

"It has, 'm. First you can, and then you can't; and there's no telling when or how long, 'm. I'm fair worn out with the bother of it."

Mrs. Smethurst's look of perplexity deepened. "We simply must have the milk and oysters in season for tea," she said, "and there's no place to get them but Penterby's. I ordered them this morning. Well, Cara! Home from school? It looks as if I'll have to ask you to run across lots to Miss Wallerford's. Give Miss Wallerford my apologies; tell her I'm very sorry, but my arrangements are upset, and ask her if she will kindly postpone her visit. Tell her that we shall be very happy to have her take tea with us tomorrow."

"Oh, mamma!"

"I'm sorry, dear; but it's only a day's wait, and——"

"Can't we get them at Penterby's anyway, mamma?" Cara pleaded.

"Cara," Mrs. Smethurst answered quietly, "I cannot very well ask Hannah to go all the way into town this warm afternoon. Besides, the electrics only run every half hour, and she could scarcely be back in time for tea. Neither do I wish to send you, Cara, and I am sure that Miss Wallerford would feel distressed were I to go myself."

"Couldn't you have her—just as it is, mamma?" fretted Cara.

"Postponement seems the lesser discourtesy, Cara." Cara sullenly put on the hat which she had flung off on entering. It was all so—so horrid! What a nuisance that the telephone should break down when it was most needed! How stupid of Mr. Penterby to have neglected the order! What would Miss Wallerford think? Tomorrow? Why, it might rain, and there would be no going into the garden after tea; Miss Wallerford might have another engagement—who could tell what might happen within twenty-four hours? Waves of disappointment flowed over Cara. Usually it was a joy to call on Miss Wallerford, even on an errand; today——

"I'm just not going!" Cara decided suddenly. "There's time, plenty of time, to go into town and hurry Mr. Penterby out with the milk and the oysters! I can take the electric at the crossroads, and Mr. Penterby 'll let met ride home on his wagon. Miss Wallerford will be at the house when I ride up. Oh, mamma doesn't know how—how capable I am. It's ever so much better than mamma's plan."

Greatly pleased at her superior wisdom, Cara turned around, walking briskly toward the crossroads. What did the heat matter, now? She hurried along, having no watch and being uncertain as to the time. As she neared the crossroads she could hear, far away, the buzz of the approaching car. Her hand dived into her pocket for a nickel. There was no nickel there. Cara gasped as the great electric rushed up, and by, and away.

"Oh, why didn't I stop it, anyhow!" she wailed. "I don't believe they'd have put me off if I'd told them who papa is and—and how important it is for me to do my errand. Well, I'm not going back. I'll just walk!"

The resolution proved a bad one. Ill-temper, self-pity and disgust are very fatiguing companions for a long, hot walk over dusty roads. Finding a bit of shade under a tree by the roadside, Cara flung herself down on it.

"I don't care!" she protested. "Nothing ever goes right, no matter how much I try! Here I've got all hot and tired and used up trying not to have Miss Wallerford disappointed and—and to get mamma out of her—fix—and—and—— I hope Miss Wallerford won't come tomorrow! Maybe she'll be so put out that I'll never see her again! And I never want to see her again!"

Cara, however, did very much want to see Miss Wallerford; and her own disappointment loomed much larger than did Miss Wallerford's.

"Oh, if I'd only gone straight over to Miss Wallerford's!" she sighed. "She'd have invited me in, I know she would; and maybe she'd have had me stay to tea with her! Then I'd have had her for two evenings, and now—oh, dear! What'll she say to me now? And what will mamma say? Maybe she won't let me come down to tea tomorrow at all!"

This added misery sent Cara's head suddenly down upon her arm. And it was all the worse that she felt that it would be no more than she deserved.

"Whoa! Steady there, steady! What in nation——"

Cara peered up through her tears. A wagon, certainly, and—could it be Mr. Penterby who was climbing down? He was bending over her now. It certainly was Mr. Penterby!

"Cara Smethurst, I do declare! And I'm on my way to your ma's! Got kind of het up and tired, I guess. Well, you come right along with me!"

Kind-hearted Mr. Penterby lifted her on to the wagon seat and climbed up beside her.

"Pesky things, telephones," he went on. "Your ma sent in this order this forenoon, when I'd just stepped out, and 'Bijah—well, sometimes I think 'Bijah forgets more things than's ever told him. Then your telephone cutting up, and your ma all put to it, expecting company. Well, she managed to phone me 'bout an hour ago, and I hitched right up and started along. I wouldn't disappoint your ma for a farm down East."

"Singular," went on Mr. Penterby, meditatively, "how most things turn out about right, if you don't get flustered, and give 'em a little time. Gid-ap, Thunderbolt!"

The horse quickened his jog trot and Mr. Penterby fell into a tactful and welcome silence.

"Run upstairs and make yourself presentable for tea, my dear," was Mrs. Smethurst's only comment when Cara, hot and dusty, climbed down shamefacedly from the wagon, stammering out some incoherent explanations.

There were escalloped oysters on the tea

Cloud Magic

BY MARY CAROLYN DAVIES

Beneath the comfortable sky
All afternoon I love to lie,
And think about the books I've read
And all the things I dream in bed,
When I am not quite sleeping yet—
The things that day makes me forget.

The white clouds looked like ships one day,
And then like lambkins strayed away,
And, as I look, I understand
Just where it is that's Fairyland.

It's only lying down, you know,
The clouds make pictures for me, so
When I stand up to see them, why,
There's nothing there but clouds and sky!

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

September 7, 1913—The Ten Commandments

Everyday View of the Lesson

By J. L. Scott

Lesson Text, Exodus 20:1-11. Golden Text, Luke 10:27: Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and with all thy mind.

The ten commandments form the one universal creed of civilization. Jew and Christian alike accept them. Sometimes they are known as the decalogue, or ten words. Under this form, while retaining the original substance, the reasons annexed to the second, third, fourth and fifth commandments are omitted, while number ten stops at the word "house." There is another version given in Deuteronomy 5, in which the reason embraced in the fourth commandment differs from the one ascribed here. The difference is immaterial, however, as the substance lies in the commandment itself.

The ten commandments did not create truth, they only applied it. Moses brought nothing down from the mountain that had not always existed. Man's duty to God and to his fellow man found a new expression in the law, but were not changed by it. There was never a time when there were more Gods than one, and to love him with heart, mind and strength was a duty as old as man. Jesus reduced the ten commandments to two. He knew the Old Testament and stamped his valuation upon it. His summaries of the commandments were simply quotations, one from Deuteronomy 6:5, and the other from Leviticus 19:18.

Giving of Commandments Marks New Era in History of Israel

Inspiration after all is but a transcript of God's mind. God had been revealing himself through all the ages. The ten commandments were simply a compendium of those revelations. A new era had come in the history of his people. They were no longer to serve as colonists in a strange country, but were to be a nation distinct in a thousand things from the other nations of the earth. The ten commandments were to form the one permanent center about which all else should revolve not alone for Israel but for the nations yet to be blessed through it. Progress comes through law. The American revolution was successful not as a protest against law but as an effort to establish it. Moses led the children of Israel out of Egypt not to escape Pharaoh but to find God. They met him at Sinai and there received their national constitution at his hands.

Gathering at Sinai Celebrates Birth of Highest Civilization

The number assembled at Sinai is largely conjecture. Whether millions or thousands it would be idle to ask. But the unseen were far in excess of the others. The gathering marked the birth of our highest civilization. The American constitution became a far-off possibility on that eventful morning. No compendium of law has ever excelled it. Compressed within those ten words may be found the wisdom of the ages. That the supernatural had all to do with its composition has been generally accepted. The value of a book does not lie in the binding but in the book itself. The thunder, lightning and darkness of Sinai are testimonies to its origin, and only that. They are the jots and tittles that passed away, but the law itself remains unchanged.

The first table, or man's duty to his God, forms our present lesson. The conception that one's idea of God is a thing apart from actual life is as fatal to morals as it is to religion. Belief, and the kind of God believed in, are fundamental to manhood. The Almighty is here represented as introducing himself. He was the same God who had led Israel by his presence from Egypt to the desert. His personality was essential to their guidance. God would reveal himself unmistakably to the Israelites. He had brought them out of Egypt. His footsteps were as traceable as those of Moses. One's belief should always be positive. A speculative deity has no force. Israel's strength lay in its certainties. God was positive. The commandments were written by him. He and Moses met face to face, and together they talked as friend talks with friend. He who would come to God must first believe that he is. This we accept as a fact.

Whenever God comes to Sinai he comes alone. As to his identity there could be no mistake. The same God who had led the people into the desert stood ready to lead them on. A clear, spiritual belief concerning God is in itself a creed of no small importance. "I believe in God the Father Almighty." To that tree there are more roots than branches.

The second commandment is simply another blast of the same trumpet. God is not to be represented by likeness or material form. In those days idolatry was a common thing. It stood like a signpost by the highway of the nations, ever pointing the wrong direction. But there are mental images even more fatal than those of wood and stone. These we transmit as legacies to those who come after. The best interests of humanity require obedience to law. Not only the fathers but the unborn children are parts of its benediction.

Irreverence Toward God Becomes Sin Against Self

The sanctity of God in the third commandment extends to his very name. The same reverence that guarded the approaches to the burning bush or Sinai is its constant protection. Profanity is possible in many forms. Flippancy in prayer or sermon strikes this commandment at its very center. For this God cannot hold the offender guiltless. Profanity is a sin against the sinner. There is a reaction that smites the swearer's lips and soul. Petrifaction of feeling is sure to take place.

The fourth commandment touches the question of time. One day out of every seven man owes to God, and also, in the spiritual sense, to himself. The Sabbath as an institution was old and gray, while as yet the commandments were young. The command is not arbitrary but like every other law of God was first written on the parchment of human need. Legislation may abolish the Sabbath, but it cannot abolish man's need of it. Our most vital wants are met by the laws of God.

The Lesson Verse by Verse

By Hermon D. Jenkins

ANALYSIS—The decalogue is the constitution of the church. Its first principle is the sole sovereignty of God, guarded by the banishment of idols from the house of worship, and by reverence for the name of God and regard for his holy Sabbath.

When we enter for the first time a city strange to us, we make up our minds what is the ideal of its citizens by noting what occupies the place of honor. When St. John tells us of his vision of heaven he found in the midst of it a great white throne (Rev. 20:11). In the capital city of our republic the chief building is the more than royal hall in which our laws are made.

The great writer, Richard Hooker, has told us that the throne of law is the bosom of God; that no being is too great to be above her power, none too insignificant to be beyond her protection.

Such a conception of law is derived from a study of the holy Scriptures. Our being's aim and end is not happiness but conformity to the divine ideal. And the sum and substance of character is given in the ten commandments. It is said of a great jurist who had been inclined to skepticism that he was converted by making a study of the decalogue, finding it, as he confessed, perfect in its spirit and form.

If we compare this brief code of laws with any other, we must be struck by the tone of authority, the regular sequence of its requirements and the far-reaching boundaries of the whole. It covers practically all human life, in all ages and under all conditions. It makes no exceptions. In its universality we see the foundations of liberty and equality among men, for before God man is man. The law recognizes neither peer nor plebeian. The decalogue is therefore the foundation not only of our morality but of our government as well. It is its own proof of its divine origin.

Verse 3—The first word of the law places God, without rival or competitor, above all other beings. It is quite idle to claim that he who loves his fellow men "leads all the rest." Not even a parent or a child has the right to the first place in our affections. From the first word to the last the monotheistic principle runs through the whole Bible, and the one God must hold the first place in our reverence, our obedience and our affections. God has done more for us than any other. God will not take a place second to anybody.

> "The dearest idol I have known,
>   Whate'er that idol be,
> Help me to tear it from thy throne,
>   And worship only thee."

Verse 4—The Jews, with that literalism which with the unspiritual mind passes for religion, construed this verse to forbid the making of any picture or image for any purpose. When we cover a wall with graceful lines which never by any means form a picture, we call those lines "arabesques," because the Arabs, being debarred by the Mohammedan religion from using pictures for decorative purposes, used intertwined lines. But the Giver of the decalogue does not devote the first command to religion and then give the second to art.

Protestant Repugnance to Images Justified by History of Religion

Verse 5—The verse which follows makes it sufficiently plain that we are still hearing about our duty Godward. The student of religion knows that it is simply impossible to prevent an image which we pay reverence from taking the place of that God whom alone we ought to worship. Whether our representation of God or the saints be carved ivory or a printed rag, it will eventually stand for God if accepted by us to represent God. No church which bows before the crucifix will fail at last to substitute the crucifix for Christ. The writer once passed through a large hospital in Rome where hundreds of patients lay upon their cots, and, it being a hot summer day, their breasts were all exposed. Every patient wore upon a cord around his neck an image, a medal or a picture, to which apparently he trusted more than to the goodness of God or the skill of the physician. "Idolatries not only fail to develop, they degenerate, and systems, however orthodox they may appear at starting, which connect worship with palpable imagery, are doomed to sink into superstition."—Canon Chadwick. No part of the decalogue has been more strikingly justified in the history of religion than that which banishes images and "holy" pictures from the temple of God.

That Which Makes Light of Sacred Words Degrades Man

Verse 7—There is a strange but real bond between a personal being and his name. It may irritate us—more than we care to confess—to have our name misspelled or mispronounced, but to have it made the subject of a rude jest exasperates even those ordinarily patient. Even a court of law will fail to treat severely the man who resents with violence an insult offered to the names of wife or mother. There are those who hold that this commandment has especial reference to the use of the holy name to back up a false oath (Matt. 5:33). But we believe that the injunction here is rather against that levity which indicates irreverence and increases it. An oath in court is not forbidden, since that adds solemnity to the use of an appeal to God. Anything which makes light of sacred words or of sacred objects is certain to degrade man.

Verse 8—The Sabbath was evidently a day not at this time instituted but now "remembered." So long as we are beings of time we are subject to temporal influences. We cannot be indifferent to time and alive to life's higher interests. The husband and wife who forget the wedding anniversary, the parents who neglect the birthdays of the children, have a good deal to learn of the utmost value to home happiness. No religion has ever kept its force without a Bible and a Sabbath. The mere day in the week counts for little. The method of observance may reasonably change. But the observance will not die out except as the religion itself dies with it. The Sabbath law was especially for the protection of the dependent and the poor; and a wise man has well cautioned the workingmen of our own day not to girdle the tree which heretofore has protected them.

DEVOTIONAL SERVICE

BY EDWARD ARTHUR WICHER

Week Beginning August 31, 1913

HOME MISSION TOPIC—Church and country life.

Let us consider the following points: First, the problem of country life today; second, the possible solution of this problem by the church; third, the authority for this solution in the gospel of our Saviour.

All the eastern states of our country showed a decrease in the acreage in farms between the years 1900 and 1910, and especially in the amount of improved land. The largest proportion of decrease is found along the Atlantic seaboard. But nevertheless as we move away from the coast we find a general decline in the acreage of farm lands among the states east of the Mississippi river and north of the Ohio. In the southern states there has been usually a marked increase in keeping with the general rise of prosperity. West of the Mississippi there has been a steady gain at an accelerating rate until we reach the Pacific slope.

Thus we conclude that the decrease of population in the rural communities of the older settled parts of the country is one of the characteristic social phenomena of the past decade.

Along with this decline in acreage there has been a marked advance in the values of the lands under cultivation. The farms are worth vastly more money in the aggregate, even if there are fewer of them. Nor is this increase in values entirely offset by the increase in general values. To a great extent it represents a higher potentiality than that of a decade ago.

The next point in the problem is the steady drift of the population from the country to the cities. The city is attractive to a young man or woman who has initiative. It is suggestive of achievement, power and rise of personality. Thus the tendency has been to draft the strongest young men from the farms for urban occupations.

In its very nature country life is conservative, and the removal to the city of the more eager children of the family, who would have been a progressive influence at home, tends to accentuate the nonprogressive character of those that remain. Too often the latter take pride in the fact that they are still doing things in the same old way.

Where the whole family moves into town the farm passes into the hands of an overseer, or, more often, of a tenant. The tenant, having no permanent interest in the soil, works it for a few years for a maximum of immediate profit and then leaves it as an exhausted area.

Many of the conditions that have made the country unattractive to the young people are matters of serious social menace. Country homes are often without any proper sanitation. Where there should be health and manly vigor in the open air there may be found tuberculosis, hookworm and dyspepsia, all due to the direct violation of nature's laws for healthful living.

Our church has shown its statesmanship in the establishment by the Home Board of its department of church and country life, which has made valuable surveys, and just begun a work of the largest promise. Dr. Warren H. Wilson, at the head of this department, has recently published a book entitled "The Evolution of a Country Community," which should be in the hands of every rural minister. He has not been afraid to use even the Mormons as an example to Presbyterians of the way in which the rural church can become the center of all the active interests of the community; for he is a wise man who can learn even from his enemies. The stronghold of Mormonism is its control of all the social activities of the rural neighborhood. If we are to overcome this foe, we must understand its strength. While we do not desire to control any community by the forces of priestcraft and superstition, we should be able to exercise better leadership through the forces of larger knowledge and finer sympathy.

In many country districts the minister is the only representative of the higher intellectual and spiritual life. But if he should approach his people with any affectation of superiority, he would soon find that his efforts to help were ineffectual. No one likes to be preached down to. But every man likes to be helped by another man who meets him as a brother.

In some communities the minister must be a missionary who helps his people by teaching them better methods of agriculture. This principle is fully recognized in foreign missions; it needs clearer recognition in home missions. If the capable young men are to be retained on the farm, farming itself must be made interesting. It must be made an occupation that will afford scope to the brain as well as to the hands. No multiplication of outside amusements can ever be a compensation for the dreariness of a daily employment that is distasteful. The modern science of agriculture makes the work of the farm as full of fascination as the laboratory of a chemist. With the application of science the slipshod farming of the tenant will soon give place to the beautifully accurate methods of the new proprietor. And the church will prosper proportionately.

The country church should be clean and beautiful, and set in the midst of trees and flowers. It should be a standing testimony to the gospel, a sacrament, an outward, visible sign of the spiritual beauty of our devotion. And as such it should be the center of all the activities of the higher life of the countryside, a place where lectures are given, and, better still, a place where the people themselves debate national issues under the rules of congressional procedure. The tea meeting, properly conducted, is an immense force for social uplift. It is good for men to meet one another cordially, to shake hands, to laugh over good stories and to eat together.

A true minister is the leader of his people into a larger world of ideas and a finer culture. It ought to be a university education for a rural church to sit under the preaching of the right kind of minister.

The preacher can also do much to improve the health of the community. He can hold classes in sanitation and hygiene. His wife may possibly teach the other housewives how to maintain a variety in the vegetable garden and how to cook the good food so as to preserve its nutritive qualities.

Why should he do these things, and others like them? Because he is the minister of Jesus Christ, who looked upon the multitudes with compassion, who went about doing good, healing the sick and casting out devils. If he will do these things in the spirit of Christ, he will not minister less to souls, or preach Christ less. Rather he will find his way to the depths of many a starved and lonely heart, whom he would never otherwise have touched.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SERVICE

COMMENTS IN BRIEF BY WILLIAM T. ELLIS

Sept. 7, 1913

THE SECRET SPRINGS OF LIFE

TOPIC—The ideal Christian. IX. His faith. I. John 5:1-15.

The town of Bellefonte, in Pennsylvania, takes its name from a wonderful spring which supplies the community with water and pours off in waste enough to meet the needs of tens of thousands more. The great crystal pool is in the center of the town, but its hidden sources are out of sight, somewhere in the hills. No man can tell really whence comes the water which is the luxury and pride of the neighborhood. All refreshing streams, like Bellefonte's spring, rise from hidden sources. Nobody can follow back to its beginnings the power of a life of beauty and blessing. The great wells of being—love, sorrow, hope, faith, gratitude—are all in the recesses of the soul, veiled from human eyes. The life hid with Christ in God is itself sanctuaried from human gaze; but its outflowing streams are for the world's use. The essential thing about any person, be he religious or nonreligious, is the nature of the springs that feed his soul. For the Christian, the principal function is faith in God.

"Oh, Christ, he is the fountain,
The pure, sweet well of love;
The streams on earth I've tasted,
More deep I'll drink above;
There to an ocean fullness
His mercy doth expand,
And glory, glory dwelleth
In Immanuel's land."

Inscrutable, incomprehensible, ever mysterious —such is faith. Yet its victories are the most tangible facts in history. "The things that are seen are temporal; but the things that are not seen are eternal."

Faith works two ways. Man's trust in Christ but proves Christ's trust in man. The mighty battle cry, "Have faith in God!" is reechoed, "God has faith in man." The relationship between God and man is one of mutual trust.

Times without number, and never once too often, it has been said that Christianity is a life and not a mere credal subscription. Faith is not of words but of work. Christian character is God's proof that man's pledge has not been misplaced. The apostolic proof of faith is not profession but performance; not lip-loyalty but loving life.

Nobody who has open eyes can deny that there are within his knowledge men and women who live the heavenly life on the earthly plane. Their characters are lovely. Their objectives are other-worldly. Their life is hid with Christ in God, so that the beholder can attest the truth of their confession, when they say, with Paul, "I have been crucified with Christ; nevertheless, I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me, and that life which I now live in the flesh I live by faith, the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me."

God helps those who cannot help themselves but believe he can help them.

Last night my friend said to me: "It is almost 10 o'clock. Put the receivers of this wireless receiving apparatus on your ears and you will hear Arlington signal the correct time." Then he told me how the sound would come. I did as he instructed, and promptly at five minutes of 10 the prearranged signal began to come from the wireless station and observatory, just outside of Washington, and I set my watch by the government's standard time. By faith I took that message. I could not see the Arlington observatory, hundreds of miles away. No wires connected us. I do not fully understand the scientific process of wireless telegraphy. But I believed my friend, and it all befell as he said, and my watch was correctly regulated. So it is with faith in Christ. When we accept his word, even though we are ignorant of the processes, experience befalls as he promises, and our lives are newly adjusted to his standard.

"Faith comes by hearing, and hearing by the word of God." We get faith from the Bible There is more of the stuff of which faithfu hearts are made in the eleventh chapter o Hebrews than in the longest essay upon th subject. It is well to pray for faith; but it i better to read the Bible for it.

The heart of faith is the secret of the lif of victory. Conquest follows confidence. The greatly triumph who greatly trust. "This i the victory that overcometh the world, eve our faith."

As Browning says, every life has two aspects

"God be thanked!
The meanest of his creatures has two sou sides;
One to front the world with,
The other to show a woman when he loves her.

MISSIONARY WORK

No Cues an Evidence of Christianity

The examination and reception of candidates for baptism is the principal part of the pastoral work of the itinerating missionaries in the country outstations—practically a "spiritual clinic," as one missionary puts it. Rev. W. O. Elterich, writing from Chefoo, China, says of a recent trip that of the first six men he examined he noticed four had their cues cut off, and they mentioned this as a testimony to their desire to become Christians. This seems a rather strange way of evincing Christianity, but throughout this country region all who are without cues are regarded as Christians, for the people have not yet taken to the new regime. In reality the absence of the cue is a political badge showing approval of the new republic, in which the Christians in China have taken such a lead. One of the men examined had his cue removed just after Mr. Elterich left the village, and when the shorn Christian returned to his home his widowed mother broke out upon him in wrath, exclaiming that it was bad enough he had become a Christian, but to cut off his cue and become a foreigner was worse. She would rather he were dead, and she repudiated him as her son. And the helpers and the son had a hard time pacifying her.

Another of the candidates for baptism said that what first impressed him in regard to Christianity being the true religion was the ten commandments. He immediately renounced idol worship and brought his gods to the Christian school teacher to be destroyed. One of the women had heard the truth first from her child, who was attending the mission village school. The little lad would repeat at home the prayers and hymns he had learned, until finally he persuaded his mother to ask the teacher for instruction.

Slight Tokens Betray Great Movement

Rev. James B. Cochran, back at work again in Hwaiyuen station in China, says that his first evangelistic tours following his return to his old field have impressed him as never before with what has actually been accomplished by the ten years of preaching since the Hwaiyuen station was opened. Especially is he encouraged by noting how often apparently ignorant strangers with whom he begins to talk prove to have received already a fairly intelligent impression of who Christ is and what the gospel message signifies.

Crossing the Goa river in a ferry, he showed to two men a picture representing Christ healing the blind man and began to tell the story. Before he had come to name the name of the Lord one of these men spoke up to say: "Oh, that is Jesus, is it? He was a good man and always treated the people well." Mr. Cochran asked, "How did you know about Jesus?" The answer was, "I am in the yamen, and a number of times I have been to the chapel where they tell about him."

Reaching the village, Mr. Cochran sat down at a table in front of the local inn, with a rough awning over his head. As he took out his pictures and began to talk the people crowded around him. A number of his bolder hearers sat down at the table with him, and in this number he soon discovered that there were three teachers of the village schools and a young man who had recently returned from studying in the normal school at Peking. The missionary directed his remarks to emphasize the robberies and thievings that had occurred since the idols had been destroyed and the temples left empty. He told the people that they could not possibly found a great country and a peaceable society without religion. At this one of the most intelligent men in the crowd replied: "Yes, foreign teacher, we know that you have come to help us. You have done us nothing but good with your schools, your hospitals and your famine relief. We change slowly, but we are sure to change. There are still some of the older men in our village who are the old-fashioned kind, and they are men of influence. But before long we will have a school in our temple."

Later, talking to a man on the road, Mr. Cechran received the prompt answer, "Oh, yes, I know about that. I have been several times to chapel." Another responded: "I am much interested in these things. I have talked a good deal with your evangelist Liu, and I have a Testament at home which I am reading."

All of these instances, though comparatively trivial of themselves, count with Mr. Cochran as unmistakable signs of the spread of a knowledge which he trusts to develop into Christian faith. The friendliness of everyone the missionary met was also a great encouragement, and perhaps the most radical change was indicated by these teachers who sat at a public table discussing the religion of Christ in the presence of so large a crowd. No longer than two years ago it would have been unthinkable that any Chinese teacher should have demeaned himself in this degree. As Mr. Cochran writes, "It is the time of all times for China."

Independent Churches in China

The increasing disposition of Chinese Christians to shake themselves loose from missionary domination, and often from missionary influence, has been significantly shown recently by the organization of "independent" Christian churches in Peking, Tientsin and Tsinanfu. In Tsinanfu, which is the capital of the province of Shantung, two rich Christians have just contributed $13,000 jointly to the establishment of an independent congregation in that city. They announced their plan and their own personal gifts at a dinner where they entertained the high officials of the province, and the guests immediately rose to the occasion by donating to the enterprise a tract of three acres in a prominent location near the railroad station and promising the remission of all taxes on the land.

Chapel of the Syrian Protestant College at Beirut

This is one of twenty sightly buildings which stand on the top of the bold promontory jutting out to the right as the traveler sails into the harbor of Beirut, Syria. It is the central assembly hall of the greatest educational center in Western Asia. Mount Lebanon, 9,000 feet high, is visible in the background of the picture.

Whatever may be thought of the wisdom of the Chinese in thus cutting loose from missionary supervision, there can be no doubt about the significance of this gift to Christianity by the Chinese political leaders of Shantung. Nothing but a totally new attitude in high places toward Christianity could account for such generosity. The Chinese argue that a large element of the Chinese nation are already persuaded that Christianity is the religion of the true God, but the sensitiveness of their national pride prevents them from submitting to the oversight and direction of foreigners as they feel that they do when they connect themselves with mission churches.

Personal Work in Africa

Dr. H. L. Weber writes from the school at Efulen: "When this term began there were 125 boarding pupils staying here on the hill. Of these there were forty-six who had not accepted Christ. So as I had to look after all these in their work, it seemed that the Lord had placed them in my way for a reason, and nearly every afternoon while out in the field I called them, one by one, with God as the only witness, and there more than forty accepted him. Then there was a still larger proposition on hand, for there were among those who were not staying on the hill ninety-six who had not accepted Christ. After two weeks of prayer over this matter it came to me that the amount of work was indeed more than I could possibly handle, so why not use the Sunday school teachers in accomplishing this great task of seeing each one of these individually? On the following Friday afternoon I presented the matter to the teachers, together with an outline of the best texts to be used in this sort of work. We prayed over it, and it seemed clear to go ahead, and so we did, and just today at another meeting of the teachers we counted up those that had not accepted Christ, and out of the ninety-six there were left but seventeen. All this was accomplished within a month. The last few days I have seen seven or eight of the hardest of these boys, and under the power of God all but one of these have come out on his side. None has been coerced, but all have been brought face to face with the facts about their relationship with God and his great desire for claim upon them."

School Work in Mexico Suffers

"Just now seems to be a critical time here in northern Mexico," wrote Miss Jennie Wheeler July 15. There is some hope that an end may soon come to active warfare—and yet conditions are just as favorable for prolonging a guerrilla warfare. "The railroad has been repaired and destroyed quickly the past week between here and Laredo. It is very disheartening, for there is little hope of reopening school soon, and while I have great hope that our work will revive and perhaps gain tenfold, just now it is greatly disorganized. I have had to suspend all but one teacher. It is hard on them, but most can find something to do. The teacher remaining is one of our own graduates and has been with us fifteen years. We have five boarders and five day pupils. It seems small compared to our last year's work and our prospects for work last February."

Missionary Brevities

—Dr. Charles E. Lyon, writing from the Shantung mission, says that a recent itinerating trip through the Fenghsien field shows a flourishing condition of the work there. Not only are there more candidates for baptism than ever but country schools for boys and girls are on the increase, and about ten of them, practically all newly opened schools, are entirely self-supporting. In some cases they are taught by non-Christians, but in all of them some Christian instruction is given.

—Urumia station in Persia reports that it has not baptized any Moslems in the past year. The ascendency of Russia, however, emboldened a Mohammedan teacher who had been serving for a number of years in the Russian mission in Urumia to announce his conversion to Christianity and receive baptism. Inasmuch as the man's faith in Christ seems very sincere, the Protestant missionaries rejoice in his action and believe that it will tend to establish religious freedom in that part of the world.

Board Notes and Announcements

—Leading the Friday morning meeting of the Board of the Northwest, Chicago, Mrs. Walter Russell said of Luke 18:1: "We can't do both—if we don't pray we will faint. To pray means to be so in touch with God that we are ever conscious of his presence. 'Prayer at its best is a conversation with God,' but how easy it is to do all the talking ourselves and not wait to listen to his voice." A member from Logansport was heard, also the field secretary, who has been asked to visit Montana and the Dakotas. The Japan secretary told of a note from Miss Lila Garvin of Japan, who hopes to be here the first week in September on her way to sail Sept. 11. Letters read were from Mrs. Alexander Cunningham of China, missionary of Illinois Synodical Society; Dr. Wiley of Ratnagiri, India, and Miss Velma Snook of Korea, missionary of Indiana Synodical Society. Reading that from Pyeng Yang, Mrs. Berry said: "We are glad to call Korea by its new name, Chosen, for it is so called in God's own book, and it is just coming into its own. Never, even during the Boxer outbreak in North China, have we seen greater faith than has been shown by the persecuted Christians in Korea."

NEW BOOKS

State of Christianity in Italy Today

THE STRUGGLE FOR CHRISTIAN TRUTH IN ITALY, by Giovanni Luzzi, professor in the Waldensian Theological Seminary, Florence. A book to be added to the substantial literature of Christian progress. Professor Luzzi's recent visit to America, when most of these lectures were delivered at Princeton Theological Seminary, and some of them in other cities, acquainted the Christian public with the speaker. They found him a man of more than usual intellectual grasp and breadth of vision, and this book sustains the impression which he himself made. The story is told from the dawn of Christianity in Rome to the present time and the growth of modernism. It includes an account of the Waldenses, whom he calls "the Israel of the Alps." Much of the book constitutes an indictment of the Church of Rome, though there are no condemning words said. Professor Luzzi expects the time of such renovation of the Roman Catholic Church as shall do away with the evils. He sees the hope for this in the development of the modernists, who are to become more and more Christocentric. Some of the incidents he tells seem almost incredible. One would suppose that such superstitions had passed away. It is still true, however, that the placard which offers indulgences at the foot of the Scala Sancta, in Rome, has been issued and signed by the present pope! It is also true that the voluntary society, organized to translate and propagate the Scriptures in Italy, records the names of its members in cipher, and the roll of the membership is kept only by the president, because members of the Roman and the Greek Churches would run the risk of censure if it were known that they were engaged in such a society. In spite of all that, the freedom of the gospel is being gained in Italy, and while the struggle is far from being over, it is on the way to success. Professor Luzzi has done a memorable service in the preparation of this volume. [Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. $1.50 net.

The Social Mission of the Church

THE CHURCH AND SOCIAL PROBLEMS, by James R. Howerton, with introduction by Rev. J. Preston Searle. Dr. Howerton believes in the duty of the church to engage in social service. He realizes that the times demand larger attention on the part of ministers and church officers to the outward conditions of humanity, and he presses the duty upon the leaders. At the same time he is not ignorant of the superficial counter plea that the church's primary task is with the individual. But he shows the insufficiency of this consideration against the social mission of the church. There is no necessary contradiction between the individual and the social task; in fact they are mutually helpful and easily blend in a vital unity. Dr. Howerton also, by reason of his identification with the Southern Presbyterian Church, realizes the force of the principle of the pure spirituality of the church. But in this, too, he finds no insuperable barrier to his main contention, which is that the present discontent in society demands immediate socializing work on the part of organized Christianity. [Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. 75 cents net.

THE CHURCH AND THE LABOR CONFLICT, by Parley Paul Womer. The author is full and clear in setting forth economic and industrial conditions as the basis of social distress, but in offering a program for the church in connection with these questions he is no more definite than most of the writers whom he criticises for their vagueness. It is not the business of the church to formulate economic and industrial policies but to inculcate those Christian principles which will lead to a just solution of these problems. No one can commit the church to more. It is for Christian men whom the church inspires to address themselves to the task of promoting justice by seeking wise legislation, by influencing public opinion and by other proper methods. [Macmillan Company, New York. $1.50 net.

THE PLACE OF THE CHURCH IN THE WORK OF SOCIAL BETTERMENT, by Edgar P. Hill. This is Dr. Hill's address at the opening of McCormick Seminary in September, 1912. It is an inspiring and insistent call to the church to do its real work of setting men on fire with social zeal and letting these men work out the details. Dr. Hill is here, as always, sane and strong, and we trust the address will have wide reading. [Presbyterian Board of Publication, Philadelphia. 10 cents.

THE MAKING OF TOMORROW, by Shailer Mathews. During his editorship of The World To-Day Dean Mathews had occasion to express certain convictions regarding current movements. He has gathered forty of these brief expressions under four heads in this little volume: "The Common Lot," "The Church and Society," "The Stirrings of a Nation's Conscience" and "The Extension of Democracy." Almost any one of these essays has in it a fertile sermon or prayer meeting thought. We cannot quite agree with the dean in occasional strictures on the church, but they are the criticisms of a lover. Those who doubt his position will be reassured by much in this book. [Eaton and Mains, New York. $1 net.

For the Missionary

MISSIONARY METHODS—ST. PAUL'S OR OURS, by Roland Allen. This is a study which will provoke much discussion; its subject has already done so on the mission field and among officials of missionary boards. It turns on the duty of the home church with reference to the work which it has established in non-Christian lands. Rev. Mr. Allen has been an English missionary in North China and he states that "where St. Paul conspicuously succeeded, we have conspicuously failed." The protest of the volume is against foreign control of native churches, and in favor of more independence, with assurance that mistakes so made will be better than safety without liberty. The protest is not at all new and it will be felt by many that Mr. Allen hardly does justice to the different conditions under which our missions are now being conducted. The book will be reckoned with by mission leaders. [Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. $1.50 net.

JAPAN: An Attempt at Interpretation, by Lafcadio Hearn. A new and lower priced edition. Mr. Hearn was a severe critic of Christian missions in Oriental countries. Without disparaging the value of this book as a whole, it may be said that the nine years that have elapsed since its first publication have upset many of his predictions and taken much of the force out of his antimissionary arguments. [Macmillan Company, New York. 50 cents.

MISSIONARY EXPLORERS AMONG THE AMERICAN INDIANS, edited by Mary Gay Humphreys. An exceedingly informing book dealing in readable fashion with such missionary heroes as Marcus Whitman, John Eliot, Samson Occum, David Brainerd, Stephen Riggs and John Lewis Dyer. These accounts of brave lives will fire any boy or girl reader. [Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. $1.50 net.

MISSIONS MADE FASCINATING FOR WIDE-AWAKE GIRLS, by Susan T. Durfee. A little book that should be worth its weight in gold to parents who wish to interest their girls in mission work, or to girls who already have the interest but no working plan. [Religious Publishing Company, Chicago. 60 cents net.

THE MODERN CALL OF MISSIONS, by Jame S. Dennis. The subtitle accurately describe this book as "studies in some of the larger aspects of a great enterprise." The fundamenta purpose of Christian missions is indisputably t enlarge the boundaries of the spiritual kingdo of Christ, but in the prosecution of this object the world has been benefited in man way which, if incidental, are nevertheless highl important. It is of these that Dr. Denni writes, and the papers which make up his boo have been brought together from various missionary and religious publications in whic they have appeared in the last few years an revised to make them representative of present missionary progress. In them the missionary is shown to have been the profitabl servant of colonial enterprise, national development, diplomacy and commerce. It is a valuable apologetic for missions as an importan agent of civilization. [Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. $1.50 net.

THE SORROW AND HOPE OF THE EGYPTIA SUDAN, by Charles R. Watson, is a survey o mission conditions and methods of work in th Egyptian Sudan for mission study classes an private reading. A land lost in wonder, sinc the beginning of history, that Herodotus trie to find and could not reach; Isaiah's "lan of the rustling of wings, which is beyon Ethiopia"; a land of fire and sword and horri slavery; now a land of new hope throug Christ! Such is the Sudan. Dr. Watson ha a big story to tell and he tells it well, usin the story of Gordon with great effect. Th book is a good one for a boy who is jus beginning to be a Christian, opening as i does for him new visions of "adventure fo God." And it is equally great for the sam reason for the boy older grown. [Board o Foreign Missions of the U. P. Church, Philadelphia. 50 cents.

PLANTING THE OUTPOSTS, by Robert Frederick Sulzer, district superintendent of Presbyterian Sunday school missions for Minnesot and North Dakota, contains beside a readabl story of personal adventure a capital introductioin by Dr. David James Burrell of Marbl Collegiate church, New York, and abundant illustrations. If anyone thinks the Sunda school missionary has a "snap" let him loo at the picture of the Sulzer prairie home o page 37. Very few realize how important thes "personal documents" will be in the days whe all the social—we hope not all the religious— conditions will have changed. "The Short Course Series"

THE SHORT COURSE SERIES, edited by Jo Adams. This series has been projected wit special view to the needs of ministers desir of giving their congregations brief expo tory courses of sermons. The editor belie that many ministers would find their w facilitated by the adoption of occasional cours of six or eight connected studies on one bibli theme; he has accordingly enlisted a num of scholars in the preparation of small volu which may be used by the busy preacher both as models and as partial sources of material for his sermons. The first of these little books is by the editor himself, entitled "The Lenten Psalms." It contains expositions in very simple terms of Psalms 6, 32, 38, 51, 102, 130 and 143. Another is "The Beatitudes," by Rev. R. H. Fisher, containing eight expository discourses on this fruitful passage in Matthew. "A Cry for Justice," by John Edgar McFadyen, is a study in Amos. "The Higher Powers of the Soul," by Rev. George McHardy—a practical exposition—takes as its theme the group of faculties and functions through which the spiritual life is developed—the conscience, the reason, the memory, the imagination, faith, and hope and the will. "The Psalm of Psalms," by Rev. James Stalker, is an exposition of the twenty-third psalm in Dr. Stalker's familiar devotional and practical method. "The Song and the Soil," by W. G. Jordan, aims to trace the missionary idea in the Old Testament not from the historical and exegetical point of view but rather as a ground for the better appreciation of the rich meaning of Israelite religious thought on the subject. Professor Jordan comes nearer making his little volume a study in the development of religious thought than any other of his predecessors in the series. "The Man Among the Myrtles," by John Adams, is a study of the visions of the prophet Zechariah, which presents both the outward garb and the inner significance of the prophet's highly imaginative conception of Judah's duty and destiny. The exposition is limited to the first eight chapters of the prophecy. In "Jehovah-Jesus," by Thomas Whitelaw, the original feature is the bringing together of the Old Testament passages in which the name of Jehovah appears with some specific connotation such as in the forms "Jehovah-Jireh," "Jehovah-Nissi," etc. In each of these passages Dr. Whitelaw finds a revelation of some practically helpful idea regarding God's grace. And, since each of these revelations reappears more fully in the character of Jesus, not only the title of the volume is justified but the emphasis laid on the Old Testament revelations is increased. "The Sevenfold 'I Am,'" by Thomas Marjoribanks, takes as a theme Christ's several figurative self-designations in the gospel of John. Under the thoughtful treatment of Mr. Marjoribanks this remarkable series of expressions, as reported by the "beloved disciple," yields rich stores of suggestion to the preacher. [Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. Each 60 cents.

Of a Devotional Nature

The Real Imitation of Christ, by J. Sherman Wallace. Professor Wallace has been teaching the life of Christ to students in McMinnville College, Oregon, and in this book seeks to make real the possibility and the method of following Christ. He is right in saying that the matter is vague to many believers; they know the words; they see no definite meaning in them. After dealing with "Christ's Point of View," which we may take, and "His Method and His Purpose," which we may adopt, he outlines certain needed traits which are feasible for us. The whole makes a very helpful book. [Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. 75 cents net.

Devotional Hours with the Bible, by J. R. Miller, is the sixth volume of a series and deals with the psalms. The studies are thirty-four in number, and range from the first to the 145th. Each of them reveals the same gentle spirit and loyalty to the word, and the literary character is of an order higher than some of Dr. Miller's shorter sketches. The illustrations are happily chosen. Not Nut Meats

Though the taste is like toasted nuts.

These are simply whole grains—Rice grains in this case—puffed to eight times normal size.

We sealed the grains up in guns. We kept the grains rolling, for one whole hour, in 550 degrees of heat.

That heat turned the moisture in the grains to steam, and created tremendous pressure. Then we shot the guns.

And these grains came out—steam exploded—filled with a myriad cells. Airy and crisp and nut-like—walls as thin as tissue.

Like fairy wafers with a fascinating flavor.

And millions of dishes are now served mornings, with cream and sugar, or mixed with any fruit.

They Float

Countless homes now serve them also as a dairy dish for suppers. Serve them in bowls of milk.

They get whole grains with every granule exploded, so digestion can instantly act. Toasted, bubble-like wafers, four times as porous as bread. Fragile, crisp and dainty—the most inviting morsels ever made from grain.

And they use them like nut meats—use them in candy, use them to garnish ice cream. Children eat the grains like peanuts in the hungry hours between meals.

These are really food confections.

Tell your grocer to send you a package of each and see how your folks enjoy them.

The Open Hearth

Princeton's "Rebellious" Class

While in Atlanta as a visitor during the sessions of the historic Assemblies lately concluded I met in the lobby of the Piedmont hotel the distinguished pastor of a Philadelphia church whom I had formerly met at Princeton. When, in renewing our acquaintance, I told him that I was of the class of 1910 of Princeton Theological Seminary a change came over his features and with a mournful shake of the head he exclaimed: "Ah, a member of the rebellious class of 1910!"

Yes, it is sadly true that I and others enjoy the unenviable distinction of belonging to that class whose members in conjunction with representatives from the other classes had the temerity to suggest changes in the methods of teaching in vogue in the seminary, and also to ask that there be a different arrangement of subjects in the time-honored curriculum. We were foredoomed to failure. The time that has elapsed since graduation and my experience in the work has given me a new perspective and I am free to confess that I am glad we failed. With other Princeton men I glory in the safe and conservative methods of teaching, and in the unchanging orthodoxy of Princeton Seminary, that grand old fortress of our faith. That I participated at all in the ill-starred movement at Princeton is one of the regrets of my life. Feeling thus, it was with a feeling of sadness that I parted with my friend from Philadelphia. I could not but ask myself the question, "Shall a cloud rest upon the class of 1910 forever—shall the name of our class ever suggest insubordination and rebellion?"

A few hours later my friend, the Philadelphia minister, and I sat down together at the banquet of the Princeton alumni. The toastmaster could select only a few speakers from among so many. As I sat and listened to the happy remarks of those chosen it seemed that the dominant note was the note of loyalty to Princeton Seminary. Dr. Erdman especially struck the keynote when he referred to our alma mater as "the grandest and best of all the seminaries of the Presbyterian or any other church."

If ever rebellious, we of 1910 are so no longer. We have no desire in emulation of the "man without a country" to play the role of "men without a seminary." Heart and soul we are loyal to Princeton, to all her teachings and to all her professors. We are proving our loyalty by our works. Already in the proclamation of the blessed gospel our sound is going out into all the world. F. Z. BROWNE.

The "Unavoidable Question"

The Continent of July 3 gives a pertinent instance under the above heading. The case is of a district with four Protestant churches within a circuit of four miles, including one little village. One of these has twenty-five members, with a pastor, recent graduate of his denominational seminary, who has spent seven years in special preparation for his work. He receives, nominally, $300 salary, $100 granted by the Home Board, which he receives regularly. The other $200 is supposed to come from his parish, but it comes at haphazard, if at all.

The "unavoidable question" is twofold. 1. Has such a church the right to exist and demand his services in such close proximity to three others of the same substantial faith, each of which is in like struggle for existence, each having petty congregations and subsisting largely on mission grants? 2. Has any denomination the right to set a young man needed for the world's evangelization into such a field, or has any young man a right to give his life to such a work, when the wide, unevangelized world needs him?

If this were but an isolated instance! But it is not. The whole land is full of the like. There are too many of these overchurched districts on every hand. There are in the Mississippi river valley and to the east of it and on the Pacific coast duplicated, triplicated and quadruplicated churches where a single Protestant organization would be amply supported and be a powerful social, moral, industrial and spiritual source and center of vital interests, but where these struggling little embittered and embittering rivals are a laughingstock in the communities which will have nothing to do with them. If beneficent tornadoes or lightnings from heaven would destroy one-half of the church buildings in the United States, selecting them from among these supernumeraries, and in such sort that they could not be replaced, it would vastly help the kingdom of God. In the absence of such beneficent catastrophes it is the very first of the sacred duties of home mission boards of all denominations to enter on a thorough joint investigation of these overchurched districts, to find out how many of these organizations are needed in each district and summarily to cut off home mission grants except to that number. Fair notice should be given, time allowed for settlement of the merger on the ground, with the advice and cooperation of the mission boards. Then all aid for any church that refused to come into the "work and worship together" plan should peremptorily cease. Can't "force folks" to combine? Yes! There is enough of Christian grace in the hearts of these people who strain every nerve in support of these supernumerary churches to constrain them to work and worship with their Christian neighbors when they can no longer sustain their own separate services. If not grace enough for that the proof is clear as noonday that their grace is not rich enough to make it worth while to keep up the former means of it!

The writer of this has exercised pastoral and general ministerial functions in many towns and cities from New England to the Pacific coast. Everywhere this "unavoidable question" has been forced upon him. He is absolutely convinced that one-half of all the moneys raised by self-sacrifice for home missions is worse than wasted in support of church organizations which are an actual hindrance to the progress of the kingdom of God. Money enough is wasted and men enough worn out in useless service to man and God to maintain in needed fields great Christian enterprises which would bring to all mankind the glorious gospel in this generation! It is a sin and a shame—this awful waste! Oh, for the superlative Christian grace of common sense! A. S. F.

The Girl Who Was Like Jonah

table, and Miss Wallerford sat by Cara's side. No one remonstrated, nor scolded. It seemed to Cara as if Miss Wallerford had never been more winning, more kind. After tea there was the garden; Miss Wallerford said she had never known that flowers could be so sweet.

Then, almost before she knew it, Cara was telling Miss Wallerford about her afternoon's experience, speaking soberly, but not fearfully, and with a certain comfort because she knew that Miss Wallerford would understand. "It seemed as if everything had gone wrong because I'd had my own way, and yet everything was all right, after all," she ended.

"That was Jonah's experience, you remember, my dear," replied Miss Wallerford, gently.

Jonah! Cara stood busily thinking. She felt a sudden aversion for a certain prim little girl in her Sunday best, standing up with condemnation for Jonah in her heart to sing the closing hymn; and a certain compassion for the prophet himself, disobedient and selfish and conceited as he had seemed.

"I guess Jonah was sorry, when he thought it all over," she burst out suddenly.

"Probably, dear."

"I wonder what he did—afterwards?" hazarded Cara.

"Let us hope that, having learned his lesson, he neither moped nor whined, but was quick to obey—afterwards," replied Miss Wallerford, smiling.

Cara breathed deeply; it did not seem in the least as if long centuries lay between her and the Hebrew prophet of olden times.

"I guess people were just about the same then as they are now," she said.

A Stock That Is at Par

The church expects 100 per cent profit on its investment in the Gospel Ministry. It demands all of its ministers' time and energies. Its demands are reasonable. They must be met. Ministerial stock is often at a premium; sometimes it is at a discount. If the church wants a par value ministry; willing to spend and be spent, a producer of spiritual value; the best moral and religious investment a community can make, it will put its own stock at par by placing a premium upon its ministry in providing a pension for the days of old age and disability.

The stock of the church will never get to par until it ceases to discount its ordained leadership.

Working in "the Regions Beyond"

Sketches by a Sand Hills Sky Pilot

IT WAS an April morning and the first gray intimations of dawn were beginning to appear at 3:30, when there came to the hazy consciousness of the Sand Hills sky pilot a dialogue which took something of the following form:

Small Voice—"The people on the margins of society ought to be reached—the people who have no touch with church or her message."

Waking Sky Pilot—"That is true, but we have in all this western end of the state only two towns of any considerable size. It may be that there are some unreached people around the railroad shops and in the vicinity of the beet sugar factory."

Small Voice—"But there are others—those whose are far-scattered, living in out-of-the-way places—in the Sand Hills, along the edges of the states bordering your panhandle end of the state, and in the 'bad lands.'"

By this time the Sand Hills sky pilot was thoroughly awake, and in imagination he was traveling along the frontier line of states, seeking out the isolated families and communities and trying to make the half dream of a Sabbath morning's dawn a whole reality.

Possibly the surroundings and occupation of the previous days had something to do with the formation of the dream itself, for the bedchamber of the dreamer was in a building which is general store, home and hotel, situated in a little hamlet, the last station in the state and next to the western border—a place without church or religious privileges. Here the homesteaders were unloading their cars and driving stock and goods to their new claims in a neighboring state. Here the pile driver, bridge and railroad construction gangs were at work, and some of these people had been a part of the marginal people in the consciousness of the sky pilot.

Glimpses of Western Life in the Sand Hills Region

The upper picture shows a Sand Hills post office, with the postmistress guarded by her watchdog. At the left is a Sunday school group in front of a sod schoolhouse. At the right is a church congregation and Sunday school. There had been no religious service at or near this point for twelve years

The whole matter became so impressive that the superintendent of the Sabbath School Board was taken into confidence, and he in turn passed the communication on to others. The result was a message to this effect: "Go to it. We want to see what you can do along that line, and we'll back you up." With this hearty assurance the Sand Hills sky pilot determined that the tour of service and investigation should be as thorough as possible. To this end there have been observations concerning soils, topography, crops, moisture and other physical conditions. Dr. Condra of the state university sent a copy of his geography of the state and this has had a place in the preacher's grip along with his Bible and other literature. The inspiration of the Home Board's country church department has been a constant factor, especially in throwing various situations into proper perspective.

The findings of this summer of special service are most interesting. After hundreds of miles of zigzag driving through the Sand Hills and blistering plains here is the report of the important features:

The panhandle end of Nebraska, with a fringe of border land on South Dakota, Wyoming and Colorado, presents a variety of soils and other physical features perhaps not excelled by any other like body of 15,000 square miles in the United States. There are fertile areas under irrigation and other fertile strips of high tableland adapted to dry farming. There are certain well defined sandy, hilly regions, with valleys of hard land, which may be cultivated, and yet other sand hills with never a valley of hard land, where man sins in stirring the sand with a view to cropping it. Again, there are high rolling plains, which, with the Sand Hills, afford grazing lands for cattle. Beyond Pine Ridge there are billowy lower lands of "gumbo" and "bad lands," where the settlers have a saying, "If you stick to the gumbo in dry weather it will stick to you in wet." And then there is that indescribably picturesque Pine Ridge. Viewed from the north, it is like a mountain range sparsely covered with pines. Reach the top and you are on a prairie plateau.

Cactus, Sage Brush, Prairie Dogs, Snakes

In some isolated spots, as the edge of the "Colorado breaks," there are a few settlers who have located on land which produces cactus, sage brush, prairie dogs and rattlesnakes, while others in the same general region have land of which to be proud.

The meteorological conditions seem almost freakish. There are belts of plateau where the rains occur with frequency. In the Sand Hills it is said that some spots have the rains "head up" in them, and hence such localities are more valuable than those where the rains "go around." Be this as it may, the element of uncertainty is so great that, with the exception of the limited irrigable portions, the rural population must be sparse and widely scattered.

A necessity is laid upon us to minister to these marginal people. The church of Christ has not done her full duty as long as it is true that there are many families who have lived for years on their ranches or claims without a single call from a minister of any denomination, and whole communities without any spiritual ministry from either a Sabbath school or church. The fruit of neglect is stolid indifference. If a man lives twelve or twenty-four years without hearing a sermon—and this sky pilot has met such—he is very prone to think he can live twenty-four years longer without the gospel. The man may be granted his doubtful privilege, but what about the children?

Not only is there indifference where communities are neglected but various evils run riot. The Saturday night dance with attendant whisky jugs and beer bottles attract revelers from a distance of many miles, and these hold high carnival till the dawn of the Sabbath. The Lord's day is further broken by the baseball game, accompanied with horse racing and "broncho busting." These things become the common recreational life of the people where there is no continuous religious effort, and one community vies with another in putting up stunts in the way of attractions. Whole families will load up in a lumber wagon and drive ten or fifteen miles over dreary wastes of sand or "bad lands" to spend a few hours where from 100 to 300 persons have congregated. With most of these people the "attractions" are not so much the magnet as the opportunity for welcome, because infrequent, social intercourse—"seeing the folks."

If these limited and isolated families and communities are to be reached it must be in the spirit of the broadest catholicity and altruism. Agriculturally we hear much about the conservation of soils and moisture, and spiritually there must be a conservation of souls without reference to denomination, at the same time recognizing the soul as the whole man. The Sand Hills preacher has been much impressed with the fact that he may travel for weeks and make scores of calls without finding a single Presbyterian—"but we are not heathen."

In ministering to these marginal people we must remember it is not only a ministry of unrestricted giving but the giving of the very best. These people are not inferior to others, they are simply lacking in opportunity. The very intensity of the need, though that need be with the few, demands that when the need is supplied it must be with the best.

When it comes to the agency through which such a ministry can be rendered it lies between the Board of Home Missions and the Board of Publication and Sabbath School Work. The Home Board, with all its splendid effort and service, has its hands more than full without taking on work which does not give promise of coming to large fruitage in the course of a very few years. It is impossible to find either men or means for these far-scattered rural churches and populations. In this immediate region which is being described there are no fewer than eight Presbyterian churches and stations, which would make three large parishes—so far as need and effort are concerned—that are pastorless and probably will remain so. Yet these places are not wholly without religious service, for the Sabbath school is maintained and the Sand Hills preacher, supported by the Sabbath School Board, is able to pay an occasional visit and administer the ordinances.

It is the peculiar ministry, therefore, of the Sabbath School Board to carry on work here "in the regions beyond." To those who are famishing either from neglect or indifference the board comes with her messengers, who proclaim the old prophetic invitation, "Ho everyone that thirsteth, come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money: come ye, buy, and eat; yea, come, buy wine and milk without money and without price." Not only is the invitation given, but supply of the need is borne to the needy, for we have learned with Sir Launfal that—

"It's not what we give but what we share—
For the gift without the giver is bare."

In the spirit of giving one's self this board sends out her various sky pilots, giving them the largest liberty to serve the greatest needs.

Rev. A. W. Allen, who was pastor in First church, Monroe, Mich., from 1901 to 1905 and now located in Syracuse, N. Y., is spending his vacation in Monroe.

STOPPED SHORT

Taking Tonics, and Built Up on Right Food

The mistake is frequently made of trying to build up a worn out nervous system on so-called tonics—drugs.

New material from which to rebuild wasted nerve cells, is what should be supplied, and this can be obtained only from proper food.

"Two years ago I found myself on the verge of a complete nervous collapse, due to overwork and study, and to illness in the family," writes a Wisconsin young mother.

"My friends became alarmed because I grew pale and thin and could not sleep nights. I took various tonics prescribed by physicians, but their effects wore off shortly after I stopped taking them. My food did not seem to nourish me and I gained no flesh nor blood.

"Reading of Grape-Nuts, I determined to stop the tonics and see what a change of diet would do. I ate Grape-Nuts four times a day with cream and drank milk also, went to bed early after eating a dish of Grape-Nuts before retiring.

"In about two weeks I was sleeping soundly. In a short time I gained 20 lbs. in weight and felt like a different woman. My little daughter, whom I was obliged to keep out of school last spring on account of chronic catarrh, has changed from a thin, pale, nervous child to a rosy, healthy girl and has gone back to school this fall.

"Grape-Nuts and fresh air were the only agents used to accomplish the happy results."

Ways of Working

Printer's Ink Helps Attract Indiana Men to the Bible

That men can be attracted to a church in large numbers to study the Bible has been proved again at First church, Rushville, Ind. Rev. J. D. Meacham, the pastor, has served as leader as well as advertising manager, and the result has been shown in a class with a membership of 150. A few of the men are shown in the accompanying picture, which was taken while a large number were absent last spring assisting in the fight against the high water.

A Portion of the Men's Bible Class, Rushville, Ind.

Many men were attracted by the passes for a free trip abroad issued at the opening of the series of lessons beginning with Genesis. The pass is worth reading:

> The Men's Bible Class is touring through the Bible. We started near the garden of Eden and are due next Sabbath at the home of Abraham, in southern Babylonia. We have picked up seventy-five men along the way; all jolly good fellows. We stop at First Presbyterian church next Sunday at 9:30 a. m., for new passengers. We want you to go with us; hence this free pass, which entitles you to all the privileges of a first-class passenger. Sign your name and show it to the conductor or any member of the party when you get on.
> N. B.—This pass is good for fifty-two Sundays in the year, and in all kinds of weather.

Since this class was organized it has furnished two Sunday school superintendents, one secretary and two teachers of boys' classes, who never taught or held office in Sunday school before.

Mr. Meacham has used the typewriter and printing press to advantage in keeping up the interest of not only the class of men but other departments of the church. Frequent circular letters are issued to absent members or those who are prospective members, in which the idea used in the little card reproduced above is carried out.

The men's Bible class is but one of a number of live organizations which this church is maintaining.

One City's Solution of Summer Evening Services

The brotherhoods of the different churches of Elgin, Ill., are solving in a practical way the problem of summer Sunday evening service.

They got together in May and planned to conduct open air services in Central park each Sunday evening during July and August, and asked Evangelist Frank A. Miller of Elgin to take charge of the services for the two months, uniting the choirs, leading the singing and doing the speaking.

The plan has worked. Each Sunday the audiences increased, and many who never attend church, and others who would have been at the Sunday evening picture shows, which are wide open in Elgin, came to the park services.

The services begin exactly at 6:30 and continue a little over an hour, opening with a cornet solo and earnest singing by the choirs and congregation, interspersed with solos and duets, chains of Scripture read by the audience, and many take part in prayer. It is the people's service and they seem to enjoy taking part in the work. Only once has it been necessary to move to the nearest church on account of rain, and then the audience was very much larger than the usual combined Sunday evening congregations through the summer, even on pleasant nights.

PRESBYTERIAN TRAINING SCHOOL
of Chicago
for Christian Workers
Organized in 1908 by the Board of Church Extension of the Presbytery of Chicago

The demand for people who "know how to do it" is one of the conspicuous signs of the times.

Every trade and line of work is opening schools for training its workers.

It all means that we are awake to the need of people knowing how to do things and learning it in school instead of wasting time, and doing harm, experimenting on the public.

Shall we be less wise in our church affairs?

Don't you think it is time for us to undertake more seriously the training of church workers, other than ministers?

Directors of education, pastors' assistants, church secretaries, deaconesses, visitors—call them what you will or vary the duties as may be required—all should be trained in the School and come to the pastor ready for helpfulness.

That is part of the task of the Presbyterian Training School of Chicago. (Open this year to women only.)

If you are a prospective student, or if you want to help such a School, let us hear from you.

Will Tax the Y. W. C. A. Building

St. Louis Religious Institution Forced to Contribute to City Coffers—Hollister Assembly Self-Supporting Without Admission Charge.

ST. LOUIS—The property of the Y. W. C. A. has never been taxed, but last year it was assessed, and recently the court decided that the association must pay taxes to the amount of more than $2,000. The decision was given on the ground that part of the buildings are rented for business purposes. The defense was that the proceeds of such rentals were used for the work of the association.

Missouri Valley College is included with church property in the Synod of Missouri worth approximately $1,500,000 formerly belonging to the Cumberland church, which was allotted to the Presbyterian Church U. S. A. in the decision by Judge A. S. Van Valkenburg in the United States district court Aug. 16.

Evangelist I. R. Dean, late of Toronto, Canada, conducted services at Ferguson during part of August. The meetings were instituted by Rev. J. E. Talbot, pastor of the Presbyterian church, and were held in a large tent. All Protestant pastors united.

The Presbyterian assembly and chautauqua at Hollister closed Aug. 18. About fifty summer cottages are now owned by regular atendants. This session was attended by representatives of eleven states, and several foreign missionaries. The assembly is self-susaining, and yet makes no charge for admission. Rev. J. T. Bacon of Springfield is the head of the assembly.

Across the street, on Grand avenue, from the old Grand Avenue Presbyterian church (South) tands Third Baptist church. The building was remodeled in 1904 to accommodate the inreased attendance. Since that time new ground adjoining the building has been secured and he church now contemplates the erection of a high office building, with the church auditorium xtending back over the new ground.

Bible classes for street car men have been organized in St. Louis at Hodiamont and DeBaliviere avenues and at the South Broadway eadquarters of the motormen and conductors. The last named organization was formed by the Brotherhood Bible class of Tyler Place church fter a similar class had been organized by the ame brotherhood at South Grand and Vista avenues. All told, it is estimated that several undred street car men are now engaged in a systematic study of the Scriptures.

Will Retire from New Church

r. Goodspeed to Leave Oakland—Six California Presbyterians Leave for Foreign Mission Fields This Month.

SAN FRANCISCO—F. L. Goodspeed, D. D., astor of First church, Oakland, announced ug. 17 that his pastorate would terminate two months after the new $250,000 edifice, into the hapter house of which the congregation has ust moved, is completed and dedicated. Dr. oodspeed proposes travel and study abroad nd has been waiting only for the safe shifting f the large congregation from the old to the ew location to consider his duty done and o take up his long cherished plans.

A notable event took place in First church, erkeley, on Sunday afternoon, Aug. 17, when homas Hannay, Jr., field secretary for Caliornia of the Christian Endeavor society, was rdained to the ministry by Oakland Presbyry and bidden farewell by crowds of local nd state Endeavor leaders. He and his wife o to British East Africa this month under ommission of the Africa Inland mission. Mr. annay's forty years prevented his going under he Presbyterian Board. He was converted in 906 during a state Christian Endeavor conention at the church where his ordination took ace and has since been known up and down e state as the cowboy Endeavor preacher.

The Occidental Board inaugurated its fall ork at an important gathering Aug. 18, when ans for the forthcoming China campaign were ormulated. Miss Donaldina Cameron, superinndent of Sharrock hospital, reported thirty hinese women and girls rescued from slave ens and brothels during the last few months. The appeals for her services from many quarrs make the Chinese rescue work most hazrdous as well as satisfactory. The board is sending back to China this month Dr. Caroline Merwin and to India for the first time Misses Katherine Stewart of San Luis Obispo church, Esther Hessel of Santa Rosa church and Maud Steel of Selma church.

Robert Mackenzie, D. D., secretary of the College Board, so captivated St. John's congregation in Berkeley during his summer supply for the pastor, Rev. G. G. Eldredge, that pastor and people compelled him to remain over an extra Sunday in August and preach.

Oakland Presbytery is to hold its September meeting in the newly completed St. James church and will dedicate the building.

Three changes will be observed at the fall opening of San Francisco Seminary—the absence of Dr. Thomas F. Day, whose future work is still to be determined by his prolonged tour of the Orient; the coming of Dr. W. H. Oxtoby to occupy the chair of Hebrew literature and the departure of Professor William Martin to reenter the pastorate.

Indians Worship in Summer

Chief Crow Replies to Inquiry About Taking a Vacation from Religion—Says God Sends Hot Weather.

PITTSBURG—A rebuke to the palefaces who take a vacation from their religion in summer was administered by Chief Crow, one of the Iroquois braves encamped at Squaw Run, Aspinwall. The Indians hold council every Sunday morning. When asked why they didn't take a rest from their religious exercises in hot weather the chief replied:

"The Great Spirit made the sun. He made the clouds. He made the cool breeze. He made you. He made me. The sun is hot. The clouds come not and there is no shade. The cool breeze comes not and we pant for breath. But the bee is happy. He goes far off because there is sunshine and no rain. The flower in the field and in the wood blooms fair and sweet. It yields honey to the bee. The bee is happy.

"Why should you—why should I—children of the Great Spirit, like the bee, rise and make wrath because the bee is made glad?

"When the flower blooms and fades, when the bee gets his fill of honey, then the Great Spirit calls the cloud and there is shade. He calls the breeze and we pant no more. The flower is gone, the bee sleeps and you are happy. I am happy. We must obey the Great Spirit. He knows best. We obey—he smiles upon us."

A strong sermon upon stewardship was preached by Dr. R. A. Torrey of Los Angeles on a recent Sunday in Second church. He declared that the man who fits up libraries with his name over the door because the money is his is deceiving himself and others. "The money is God's," said Dr. Torrey.

Dr. John Thomas, the Welsh nonconformist preacher of Liverpool; Dr. S. S. Palmer of Columbus, Ohio; Rev. T. Crawford Kirkwood of Kelso, Scotland; Rev. C. E. Alexander of Bartlesville, Okla.; Dr. A. R. VanFossen of Erie, Pa., and Rev. Herbert Hezlep were recent preachers in local pulpits.

James H. Condit, D. D., is succeeded in the Fairbanks, Alaska, district by Rev. George G. Bruce of East St. Louis, Ill., who began his work on Aug. 1. Dr. Condit, after five years spent in interior Alaska, now enters upon a larger work as general missionary for Alaska, with headquarters at Juneau.

Form Portland Chinese Church

Mission Work Among Foreigners Results in Organization—Home Mission Work to Be Pushed—Pastors on Vacations.

PORTLAND—A Presbyterian Chinese church connected with the mission of the Chinese carried on here so long was organized Aug. 10. About fifty people connected themselves with the church as members, while there were others who are adherents. The committee of presbytery was Doctors H. N. Mount, C. W. Hays and W. S. Holt. Dr. J. V. Milligan, who visited the mission the same evening, was invited to share in the organization, and did so. The mission has an assistant in Ng Man Po, a Chinese gentleman who does not speak English yet, but who is a good preacher, a good mixer with his own people and is something of a Chinese scholar.

The committee on church extension for the Presbytery of Portland recently elected Rev. Andrew J. Montgomery of Oak Park, Ill., superintendent of home missions. Mr. Montgomery is expected to come here early in the fall.

Dr. D. L. Kiehle has been obtained for the next six months to care for Calvary church, from which Rev. T. H. Walker recently resigned to go to Los Angeles.

It is vacation time in Portland and the churches are being supplied by visitors. Dr. Johnson of the American Presbyterian church in Montreal is preaching in First church for two Sabbaths. He will be followed by Dr. C. H. French, former president of Huron College. Rev. E. E. Emhoff of Owatonna, Minn., has supplied Third Presbyterian church during the vacation of Dr. A. L. Hutchison. Hardly a resident pastor is now in Portland.

Rev. Hugh R. Fraser, who recently retired from Cornwall (N. Y.) church after twenty-three years there, has been occupying the pulpit of Market Square church, Harrisburg, Pa., during the absence of Rev. J. Ritchie Smith.

Show Work of Bible Schools

Closing Exercises of Vacation Classes Attended by 3,500 Children - Evangelistic Committee Runs Short of Money.

PHILADELPHIA—The sixth annual commencement of the daily vacation Bible schools was held in Bethany church Aug. 15, morning and afternoon, with 3,500 children in attendance. Doctors W. P. Fulton and Robert Hunter presided. William C. Kidd delivered the address of welcome. The room was decorated with displays of work done by the children.

Owing to insufficient funds the summer evangelistic committee closed its work earlier than usual this year.

Rev. J. R. Swain, pastor of Woodland church, preached the sermon at the 199th anniversary of Cold Spring church, Cape May, N. J., Aug. 17.

MRS. W. H. SCOTT DIES

The numerous friends of William H. Scott of Philadelphia, well known to many readers of The Continent, sympathize with him in the death of his wife, which occurred Aug. 20 at his summer cottage at Spring Lake, N. J., after an illness of some months. Mrs. Scott was active in religious and benevolent work. For thirty years she was a manager of the Presbyterian Orphanage and vice-president at the time of her death. Her loss will be deeply felt by her family and a wide circle of friends.

The roll of Philadelphia Presbytery has upon it the names of 146 ministers. Of these 66 are pastors, 3 stated supplies, 7 assistant pastors, 5 pastors emeritus, 6 foreign missionaries, 8 honorably retired, 13 secretaries and 5 teachers. There are also 6 local evangelists, 2 licentiates and 21 candidates for the ministry. On the roll of Philadelphia North are the names of 98 ministers—60 pastors, 2 assistant pastors, 3 stated supplies, 2 pastors emeritus, 3 honorably retired, 2 foreign missionaries, 5 secretaries, 3 teachers, 2 editors and 11 candidates for the ministry.

William Patterson, D. D., pastor of May Street church, Belfast, Ireland, preached in Bethany church, where he was formerly pastor, Aug. 17. He came to this country to attend the recent international Christian Endeavor convention at Los Angeles. On Monday evening, the 18th, he lectured at Bethany on "Home Rule in Ireland."

The Log College assembly at Neshaming is holding its sessions during August and a number of the pastors of the city are spending part of their vacations there.

Dr. A. W. Spooner of Washington, D. C., has joined the evangelistic workers of the city. He is a skillful chalk illustrator of Scripture truth and the forcible application of his picture stories gathers to him in the park and on the plaza an interested crowd.

L. W. Eckard, D. D., secretary of the Pennsylvania branch of the American Bible Society, with office in this city, supplied the pulpit of Woodland church, of which his family are members, on a recent Sunday.

Rev. John T. Faris, who continues to perform temporarily the duties of editorial secretary of the Board of Publication and Sabbath School Work, has been a summer supply of several of the churches of the city.

St. Paul's congregation is looking forward to the presence in the pulpit with its pastor, Dr. Lee, on Welcome Day, Sept. 14, of Dr. W. H. Wray Boyle, pastor of Lake Forest, Ill.

Robert Hunter, D. D., stated clerk of Philadelphia Presbytery and of the synod, and pastor of Union tabernacle, has returned from abroad as a delegate to the Aberdeen council. He finds his church in the hands of workmen. Changes are being made in the choir loft and pulpit platform to adapt them to an enlarged and remodeled organ. Services are being held in the lecture room.

Will Plan Mission Canvass

A conference of Presbyterian leaders of the every-member canvass next March will be held in Chicago Sept. 3-4. Rev. A. F. McGarrah of St. Louis has general charge of this work and will meet with members of the Home and Foreign Boards and others in Chicago to plan the details of the part which Presbyterians will have in this effort to interest everyone in giving something to missions. Mr. McGarrah Aug. 10 preached in First church, Topeka, Kan., and in the evening conducted a union service of all the downtown churches. He has also recently held conferences and made addresses on church finance and business methods in other Kansas towns. He has been receiving reports from Presbyterian churches which have adopted the budget and every-member system to be used as a basis of discussion at the Chicago meeting.

Statistics show that only half of the 20,000,000 Protestant church members in the United States give anything to missions. It has been estimated, however, that it would require only 4 cents a week from each member to provide the budget necessary to send out the missionaries needed to evangelize the world in this generation. Many Presbyterian churches which have analyzed their problem find that only one-third or less of their members give anything to missions.

Union Services Will Continue

Summer Plans of Presbyterians and Methodists Carry Into the Winter — New York Church Calls U. P. Pastor.

NEW YORK—The moderator of the session and the Methodist bishop have approved an arrangement by which the Presbyterian and Methodist churches of Bellport are to continue for the rest of the year the union services held during the summer. The congregation meets in the Presbyterian church in the morning and in the Methodist church in the evening, and the Methodist preacher conducts both services. The parish is a small one and the Presbyterian church is without a pastor. This is the church in which Dr. John Balcom Shaw first made a profession of faith.

Dr. F. E. Smiley of Denver, Colo., is speaking this week and next in one of the tents of the evangelistic committee of New York City. Dr. Smiley has participated nearly every summer in the tent campaigns, and from long association with the work for several summers at Canal and West streets became known in that neighborhood as the "bishop of the docks." Dr. Smiley delights many a western audience during the winter by his lectures on the work of the New York evangelistic committee.

At a special meeting Aug. 18 New York Presbytery acted on the call to be extended by New York church to Dr. Thomas W. Anderson, now pastor of First U. P. church. Dr. Anderson previous to his pastorate in this city was a well known preacher in Baltimore. In the absence of the moderator, Dr. Work, who is still abroad, Dr. George Alexander presided.

GIPSY SMITH TO HOLD MEETINGS

Gipsy Smith, the famous British evangelist, while in attendance at the Stony Brook (Long island) conference last week promised Dr. John F. Carson and Dr. William Hiram Foulkes to put himself in their hands for a five months' American evangelistic campaign in the fall and winter of 1914. Mr. Smith will be present through the whole of the Stony Brook conference next August, and applications for his time and services in the months succeeding that can be sent either to Dr. Carson or Dr. Foulkes.

With keen interest the decision of the state court of appeals in regard to the will of the late Smith Ely is awaited by a number of charitable institutions. Smith Ely, a former mayor of New York, who died July 1, 1911, in a codicil to his will bequeathed $827,000 to church and charitable institutions. Under an opinion handed down a few days ago by the supreme court more than half these bequests will be wiped out. The interests which would lose by final confirmation of this decision are the Board of Church Erection, Children's Aid Society of the City of New York, the New York Society for Improving the Condition of the Poor, the New York City Mission and Tract Society, the Fresh Air Home for Crippled Children and the Ely cemetery in Livingston.

Len G. Broughton, D. D., of Christ church, Westminster, London, following his lectures at Northfield, is speaking in several pulpits in this city. Last Sunday he addressed Fifth Avenue congregation, worshiping temporarily in Madison Avenue Reformed church, and he will be heard there again next Sunday.

Professor G. A. Johnston Ross of Union Theological Seminary was the preacher for Aug. 24 in Brick church. He will be in the same pulpits on Aug. 31. During September President Albert Parker Fitch of Andover Theological Seminary will occupy the pulpit.

Dr. Jesse C. Bruce, the new field secretary of the Board of Church Erection, has established headquarters in the board rooms in the Presbyterian building and has begun work.

After Oct. 1 Charles Stelzle, whose resignation from the Home Board's bureau of social service takes effect on that date, will have his offices in Fifth Avenue building at 23d street. Circulars are already appearing announcing "Charles Stelzle and staff, consulting sociologists." The circulars offer to the churches "expert service with reference to sociological and religious surveys, social service campaigns and conferences, social and religious work among immigrant, industrial and rural populations, publicity, educational and evangelistic campaigns, efficiency methods for local churches and national organizations, general industrial problems." Mr. Stelzle says that he is not yet ready to announce his staff, but it will include men of national reputation in all the lines of interest and service which this program indicates.

At the recent summer term of the Bible Teachers' Training School the attendance was greater than that of the first summer session a year ago, and the work is said to have been marked by great interest and enthusiasm. Eleven denominations have been represented, also eleven states and three foreign countries and some twenty schools and colleges.

Rev. S. Glover Dunseath is conducting all services in Faith church in the absence of Rev. Robert R. White, who will be absent until Sept. 14.

Dr. Agide Pirazzini, director of the Italian department of Bible Teachers' Training School, is supplying the pulpit of Woodlawn Heights church during August.

The congregation of Fifth Avenue church is worshiping during this month in Madison Avenue Reformed church, where services will continue until the completion of repairs on their home church.

Rev. Walter D. Buchanan of Broadway church is taking his first vacation in three years, since the beginning of the building of the new church. George F. Pentecost, D. D. is occupying the pulpit.

The principal of the vacation Bible schoo in "old" First church this summer has bee T. D. Martin, a student of Union Seminar He is a son of Dr. G. W. Martin, who ha been home missionary in Manti, Utah. Th son expects to go to Utah to engage in educational work upon completion of his theological studies.

Memorial services for the late Robert Ogden are to be held in Central church nex October. Mr. Ogden will probably be succeeded as president of the board of truste of Union Theological Seminary by Willia M. Kingsley, now vice-president of the boar There will be memorial services for Mr. Ogde and for Professor Charles A. Briggs short after the seminary opens in the autumn.

Northwest Churches Are Activ

Sunday Schools Organized by Pastor at Lar — New Pastors in St. Paul — New Buildi Partly Completed.

ST. PAUL-MINNEAPOLIS — Notwithstan ing the vacation season, church activity in t Northwest is much in evidence. Docto Kearns and Adams are constantly afield the interests of home missions. Dr. D. S. M Caslin, joint representative of the Presbyter of Minneapolis and St. Paul, has recently ganized a number of new Sabbath schoo among them being that of Bryn Mawr in W Minneapolis.

East church, St. Paul, is rejoicing in the m istrations of Dr. W. L. Porter, who con with ripened experience and tempered thusiam to this field of great demands.

Westminster church, St. Paul, is ministe to by N. K. Tulley, director of religious w in the Y. M. C. A.

Dr. Stanley Roberts and wife, sent to Ab deen by their appreciative parishioners Bethlehem church, have returned with new thusiasm for the large work before them.

House of Hope church recently enjoye Sabbath's visit from Rev. C. M. d'Aubigne France.

Merriam Park congregation having sold th old church to the Baptists will move into ground floor department of the new church first Sabbath of September.

Will Build Hotel to House Men

Chicago Banker Will Help Those Without Large Means—Ministers to Consider Church Problems at Olivet Camp.

CHICAGO—Beds at 5 cents a night and meals at 2 to 5 cents will be provided in a hotel to be built this fall on West Madison street by Charles G. Dawes, president of the Central Trust Company, as a memorial to his son Rufus, who was drowned a year ago. The building and ground will cost $100,000 and will be open to all men who find themselves unable to pay for high-priced accommodations. It will house 300, and 200 more in an emergency.

The program for the meeting of presbytery at Olivet camp, Lake Geneva, Sept. 8-10 has been issued by Dr. James Frothingham. This will take the place of the annual retreat in November. Addresses and conferences will be held each morning and evening on plans of efficiency for the presbytery and individual churches the coming year. Several of the conferences will be led by Rev. J. J. Rae.

Members of the recent graduating class of Moody Bible Institute came from seventeen states and six countries representing seventeen denominations. Of the sixty-five in the class over half earned their expenses by outside work.

In the issuance of an injunction by Judge Sullivan prohibiting the holder of the lease of a building from subleasing it for immoral purposes, the enemies of vice in Chicago see hope for legal relief which was denied them by the legislature. Stopping vice by injunction is the policy of Iowa and other states, but the Illinois legislature failed to pass a similar bill. In a recent case brought by the Chicago Title and Trust Company to protect some of its property the injunction was, however, issued.

Homewood church will build a new edifice this fall. Already $6,000 has been subscribed through the efforts of the pastor, Rev. William Rice. A large chorus of men is attracting splendid attendance to the Sunday evening service.

STRENGTHEN CHURCH EXTENSION BOARD

Rev. W. Clyde Smith of St. Louis will be connected with the Church Extension Board this fall as secretary of immigration and social work. This is a new office with the board, although oversight of the immigration situation in the city has been exercised by Dr. George B. Safford, the retiring assistant secretary, who goes to Minnesota as Anti-Saloon League superintendent. Mr. Smith is a graduate of McCormick Seminary and has spent two years with the local Y. M. C. A. in the immigration department. For three years he has been pastor ot Boyle institutional church of St. Louis. He will come to the board this fall in addition to Rev. W. E. Parker of San Francisco, whose appointment as associate superintendent was seasonably announced by The Continent several weeks ago. He is moderator of San Francisco Presbytery, but comes to Chicago Sept. 1. Both of these appointments have been officially announced by Dr. E. P. Hill, superintendent of the board

For use in correspondence going out from the headquarters of the national brotherhood in this city there has been printed a slip giving the latest figures on the number of communicants of the Presbyterian Church who are not accounted for. There were suspended 50,927 and restored to the rolls 7,206, leaving 43,721 members who disappeared some way during the year ending April 1. The brotherhood offers its assistance in Chicago to pastors and parents to keep track of Presbyterian young men who come here to live.

Rev. F. J. Milner of Evanston is credited with a report of a recent canvass made in twenty-two prominent Protestant churches in which it is claimed that out of a total of 12,840 in attendance only 216 young men were found. He is using this report to stir up activity in the churches to interest young men. But it is said that a canvass of some of the churches not popularly regarded as prominent might have changed the figures so that the young men might appear in a better light. A Presbyterian church on the South side, not scheduled as among the prominent churches, has a young men's class which enrolls over 100. A large percentage of these young men are found in the regular church services.

Dr. Thomas D. Wallace, for nearly twenty-five years identified with Chicago Presbytery, was dismissed to Los Angeles Presbytery at the August meeting. Dr. Wallace will not enter the active pastorate in Los Angeles, but will act in the capacity of supply for vacant churches and visiting pastors.

Rev. G. Campbell Morgan of London will speak at noon at the Central Y. M. C. A. Sept. 1-4, assisted by D. B. Towner and a chorus choir from Moody Institute. Evening meetings will also be held the four days at various churches.

First church, Bloomington, Ind., where Dr. Luccock was one time pastor, loaned its minister, Dr. John E. Ellis, to occupy Oak Park church Sunday.

Boy Scouts Enact Original Foreign Mission Drama

The pastor of Logan Square church, Chicago, Rev. J. Tooker Ford, has prepared a missionary drama, "Darkness and Light," which has been several times successfully enacted, principally by the Boy Scouts of Chicago Troop 84, of which he is scoutmaster. The direct object of this drama was to awaken interest in foreign missions. Some thought this would be a hard proposition with Boy Scouts, but with a little patience and push the drama proved to be a genuine success in every way, and the boys were invited to repeat it the last day of "The World in Chicago" at the Coliseum.

The drama has four sections—American Indians (two acts), Japanese (two acts), Hindu and pageant. The American Indian section is a dramatization of two stories told to the Presbyterian Ministers' Association of Chicago by J. Edgerton Young, D. D., for many years missionary among the Indians of British America. It contrasts the "savage" and "Christian" treatment of mothers. The Japanese section dramatizes the self-destruction of Count and Countess Nogi and also the "translation" of Neesima Shimeta, showing by contrast the difference between a Shintoist's and Christian's view of life and death. The Hindu section, by presenting an old-time native school of India, shows the mental darkness of one of the most intellectual castes of heathendom. The pageant, which takes in all the actors in costume, each one bearing a symbolical standard, shows the various agencies through which Christ has shed his light into the world. The time required for representation is about an hour.

Boy Scouts of Four Faiths in Foreign Mission Play

As originally presented at Logan Square church a Korean section was included which showed "Daybreak in Korea," and this was carried by the Campfire Girls. Doubtless anyone can get this act, as did Mr. Ford, by applying to the Woman's Board of Foreign Missions, 509 South Wabash avenue, Chicago.

It is interesting to see the ecclesiastical variety one meets in a Boy Scout troop. In the cut above the Indian squaw stirring the kettle is a Catholic, the first brave is a Methodist, the second is a Lutheran and the old Nokomis in the tent door is a Hebrew.

Culture and Competency for the Girl

Your daughter need lose nothing in culture because she has learned to be useful. Culture and comfort go together in the home. She may never find it necessary to cook or to do the actual work of a home, but she will always be better off for knowing how. And if she is to know how, she is entitled to the very best training, just as she ought to have the best possible instruction in Latin or in music.

You will not readily discover a better equipment for demonstration of the domestic arts than we have at Ward-Belmont. No expense was spared in making effective most carefully studied plans. The courses are adapted to just the splendid sort of students that come to us.

A thoroughly equipped chemical laboratory provides facilities to study the processes of cooking. Attention is paid to ideal drainage of a modern house. Excursions are made to Nashville markets to obtain practice in actual buying. Instruction is also given in drafting patterns, making dresses, in nursing, management of servants, and related subjects which a mistress of a house ought to know whether or not she actually performs the work. All of this is kept in intimate relation to the theory that the graces of true womanliness must not be marred by insistence on extreme practicality.

The thoroughness of this course is typical of the work throughout the school. The curriculum is broad and the faculty of the highest character. Full college preparatory courses and two years of college work lead to diplomas. The music school is splendidly equipped and its instructors were trained under distinguished masters of Europe. Art in all its departments is given most capable attention. Regular physical exercise is required, according to the need of the pupil. Ward-Belmont has the advantages of a large city, yet it is not far from the open country. The registrar will gladly send catalogue on request, Ward-Belmont, Nashville, Tenn. IRA LANDRITH, D. D., LL. Assemblies and Conferences

Encouraging Season at Stony Brook

Stony Brook assembly, located in a charming old Long island village, fifty miles from New York, has had an encouraging season, adding to the confidence of interested friends in the future usefulness of the institution. Development of the assembly has been hindered somewhat by the long illness of the prime mover in the enterprise—Dr. John F. Carson, former moderator of General Assembly and pastor of Central church, Brooklyn. He was able, however, to take an inspiriting part in the meetings, although he did not preach nor assume the direction of the platform. In the latter responsibility Dr. W. H. Foulkes was the president's efficient substitute.

The program for the summer included three conferences. Two conferences held in previous years—the country church conference under the direction of Dr. Warren H. Wilson and the sociological conference under the management of Professor J. W. Jenks—were not practicable this season. But it is hoped that both—the sociological conference quite certainly—will be resumed next year.

The 1913 features of the assembly began with the prophetic conference over which Dr. Ford C. Ottman of Stamford, Conn., presided. This event brought to Stony Brook a larger number of visitors from a remote distance than have been drawn to it in the four previous years of its history. The attendance included representatives from Canada, the Mississippi valley and the South. The second week was devoted to Sunday schools. This was directed by Dr. E. Van Dyke Wight, pastor at Middleton, N. Y., who had the assistance of a number of professional Sunday school experts. Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman made a particularly deep impression by an impassioned yet very practical address one evening. The Bible conference occupied the third week, including two Sundays, Aug. 17 and 24. The substantial day-by-day features of this program were the devotional addresses of Dr. Thomas Needham, the studies in the gospel of John by Dr. John H. Kerr, pastor of Arlington Avenue church, Brooklyn, and a discussion of Christian fundamentals in a human and nontechnical fashion by Dr. Foulkes, secretary of the Board of Ministerial Relief and Sustentation. The opening sermon on Sunday, the 17th, was delivered by Dr. David G. Wylie of Scotch church, New York. Evening addresses were by Doctors Charles G. Richards of Auburn, N. Y., and Elmer A. Bess and Dwight G. Wylie of Iowa City, Iowa. Dr. Chapman also returned for another evening sermon during this week.

To the whole company present at the conference it was a special privilege to have in attendance two distinguished foreigners—Gipsy Smith, the great English evangelist, and Dr. Charles Merle d'Aubigne, secretary of the Home Mission Society of the Evangelical churches of France. Each delivered two addresses, which were heard with the keenest interest. Dr. d'Aubigne gave an optimistic account of the prospects for spiritual religion in France, and Gipsy Smith, with an appeal characteristically winning, pleaded for the greater faithfulness of the church in evangelism.

Winona Citizenship Conference

Speakers at Winona Lake in the recent Christian citizenship conference were all mustered from the ranks of those who addressed the recent world conference at Portland, Ore. The program for this year, which closed Aug. 21, was pronounced the most successful ever offered by the National Reform Association at Winona.

Dr. Charles Merle d'Aubigne gave to increasing audiences a vivid and comprehensive description of the social and religious conditions in France. A son of the famous historian of the reformation, and himself a noted pastor, scholar and man of letters, Dr. d'Aubigne is a man whose coming to America is an event. Ng Poon Chew, who was the Chinese orator both at Portland and at Winona, is something more than a mere oracle of the new Chinese republic. He is so athrob with the spirit of the present age and with the hope and prophecy of the future of the Far East that he embodies to America the very spirit of the Chinese republic and the genius of the Chinese character.

Another event of national importance was the coming to America of Rev. Robert J. Patterson of Ireland, who is now better known by the sobriquet of "Catch-My-Pal" Patterson. That he also knows how to catch his audiences was proved both at Portland and at Winona.

Dr. James S. Martin of Pittsburg, general superintendent of the association, introduced this year a new series of lectures on the Bible in the public schools. Dr. Lyman Edwyn Davis of The Christian Statesman lectured under the general title of "Literary Forces in Social Progress," the specific subjects including the ethical mission of the drama, the daily newspaper, the great novels and the Bible.

The attendance at the meetings this year exceeded that of any of the eight previous successive institutes held at Winona.

Many at Storm Lake

The Storm Lake summer conference for Presbyterian young people closed its eight-day session Aug. 14. Delegates to the number of 140 were present from Minnesota, Nebraska and Iowa. This represents an increase over the registration of last year. Sixteen class periods were conducted each day. The instructors were Reverends William Ralph Hall, Philadelphia; Jay S. Stowell, New York City; H. W. Reherd, D. D., Waterloo, Iowa; Ralph H. Houseman, Omaha, and S. T. Foster, Cedar Rapids, Iowa; Leonard Paulson, Des Moines, and W. N. Ross, New York City; Mrs. Amanda S. White, Philadelphia; Mrs. R. H. Houseman, Omaha, and Miss Edna M. Brack, St. Paul, Minn. Sunday school interests shared with Christian Endeavor work and missions in the class work this year, one-half of the delegates enrolling in one or more of its classes. Joseph W. Cochran, D. D., of the Board of Education spoke twice each day, giving addresses that gripped strongly both mind and heart.

State Entertains Country Pastors

State and federal government officials cooperated with the home mission departments of several denominations in the rural life conference which was recently held at Ames, Iowa, at the State Agricultural College. About sixty country ministers attended and various problems of country life with relation to the churches were discussed by experts. At the same time classes in domestic economy were provided for the wives of visiting pastors and a model school was conducted for the children.

Many Ministers at Chautauqua

Church militant week at Chautauqua, N. Y., attracted many ministers from near-by cities of Pennsylvania and New York. Among the speakers of the week were Dr. G. Campbell Morgan, Dr. Shailer Mathews and Rev. Charles Stelzle. Dr. Mathews has been conducting a course in general Bible study at Chautauqua for some time. The music at this place of study and rest has been especially good this year. A choir of 500 voices has led the singing, especially of the Sabbath evening services.

Whole Town at Services

Walkerton, Ind., has a population of 1,003 and at the union open air services held Sunday evenings the attendance is considerably greater than the population of the town. Sunday before last there were nearly 1,300 persons gathered on Main street about the bandstand, from which Rev. William Jobusch, pastor of the Presbyterian church, preached. Simple music and preaching has been used to draw the crowd. The plan was initiated through the efforts of Mr. Jobusch, who learned how to handle large outdoor crowds while a student at Moody Bible Institute.

Aug. 17 over 550 persons were seated on chairs borrowed from two theaters, a load of 2 by 10 planks were hauled from the lumber yard and placed on chairs; forty autos and ninety buggies were used to seat people, while others sat on curbstones, doorsteps, windows and on the housetops. "Main street was crowded as no circus or street fair has ever done," says an eye witness. "People were seated in the street in rows like in an auditorium, with enough room in the street to allow vehicles to pass and enough space on the sidewalk to allow persons to pass. The town marshal assisted in placing autos and keeping order."

Financial Situation

Approach of Fall Stirs Business to Enlarged Activity—Prices Are Slightly Higher—Invest in Land or Mortgage?

Although the passing of summer usually brings with it some increase in buying power of the country on account of requirements of fall trade, there are additional indications in many quarters that business is improving. A large textile mill of New England which was closed last May reopens this week. A number of manufacturers have been forced to take wool out of bond in order to fill the requirements. Although there has been a falling off in crops over the yield of last year, it must be remembered that the season of 1912 was marked by a very large harvest. According to government reports, corn, oats, potatoes, spring wheat and hay show a decrease in volume of 14, 27, 20, 30 and 12 per cent respectively from last year. The winter wheat crop, however, will be large. Commodity prices for August as compiled by Bradstreet's show a slight increase over the figure for July, although the August number is lower than was the June figure.

Buys Land Which May Increase

A friend of The Continent in discussing his modest investment of a few years ago described the burden he was under in paying the taxes on six acres of land in Long island. He obtained this tract, in which he holds an $8,000 equity, shortly before the Pennsylvania tunnel was completed between Long island and Manhattan. He as well as others expected the land promptly to increase in value after the tunnel was completed; but it didn't. He was unable to finance the platting of the tract and provide sewer, water and gas in order that the lots might be sold singly. He is, therefore, holding on to the real estate in spite of the increasing taxes and the burden of interest charges on a mortgage nearly twice as large as his equity, with the hope that in the near future his land will be much more valuable. He has held this for four years, paying interest and taxes. If when he bought this land he had put $8,000 into a farm mortgage at 6 per cent he would have had an income during the entire four years of $40 a month, with no charges against it, with no anxiety and no drain upon his regular earnings. If he each year had invested this interest of $480 he would have had an income on this of $27.20 a year additional.

A Reader's Question

"I am a widow with a house and lot, which I want to sell before removing to California. Real estate agents know I want to leave town and I don't think I am being offered what it is worth. How can I make most from it and where shall I invest the proceeds? I think the property is worth $3,400."

Many people who have no immediate use for a large sum of money sell their property to advantage on monthly payments. Often purchasers do not have $3,400 in ready cash to invest in a home; they can, however, pay a little more than rent each month without trouble. You might be offered $3,200 in cash for your property, but get $3,500 by giving a contract for a deed and taking monthly payments with interest on the balance. This would give you a monthly income and the payments you could invest in a farm mortgage or good bond through your banker or through farm mortgage firms.

Brief Bits of Business News

—The possibility that shoes now costing $2.50 may soon soar to $5 and $7 was suggested recently by J. H. Selz, a prominent shoe manufacturer. He says that unless the government acts quickly there will be a cattle famine and leather prices will soar until they are double and triple the present cost of leather. This warning has been sounded many times by men who are in touch with conditions.

—The government says that it costs a farmer 58 cents a bushel to raise wheat, including labor, interest, marketing and depreciation. It is also figured that there is a loss of soil fertility equivalent to 46½ cents a bushel, so that to the man who owns his farm there is a cost of $1.04½. The introduction of diversified farming whereby the 46 cent loss is offset is the only means by which the farmer can sell wheat for less than $1.05 without loss.

News Notes from Various Fields

California

Riverside has a large colony of Koreans. Their church was recently burned, but the congregation pluckily rented a near-by hall and their worship has not been interrupted. Calvary church assists in the payment of the rent.

Miss Sherman, the daughter of Rev. Warren C. Sherman of Sacramento, is to be student secretary of the Y. W. C. A. at the state university during the coming year. She has completed a course in the Y. W. C. A. training school in New York.

Recent figures show that there are about 36,000 Chinese in the state. All told there are probably forty centers of Christian work, but they do not average over 100 members in their congregations, so that the great mass is left untouched. Dr. Hagar of Claremont travels around the southern part of the state visiting these groups.

Dr. Reed, who for the past two years has been one of the doctors in immigration work at Ellis island, told of the work in an address in First church, Pomona, on a recent Sunday evening, showing the need of the immigrant and the way in which the church may help. With the opening of the Panama canal California expects a great inrush of immigrants from Europe, with some of the problems that eastern states have been called upon to face. Dr. Reed sails from San Francisco Sept. 11 with Mrs. Reed to take up medical work in the Yale mission at Changsha, China. The hospital there, when completed, will be one of the finest in Asia. He is a graduate of Pomona College.

South Dakota

On account of drought the church at Wellsburg lost all its membership. This is the fourth year that the people have had no crops.

Plans have been made for the organization of a Christian institute at Hitchcock. It will be in the form of a club for young men of the town. Rooms for reading and gymnasium will be provided.

Under the leadership of Rev. R. E. L. Hayes Lead church has made good progress. Just before his coming arrangements had been made to unite the Congregational and Presbyterian churches. This arrangement was effected whereby the Congregational people united with the Presbyterians. Last month further union was effected, the Christian church voluntarily uniting with the Presbyterian. The membership is now more than 125 and Sunday school of 175, making Rapid City and Lead the largest churches in the state west of the Missouri river.

Colorado

Valverde church, Denver, Rev. Charles R. Hunt pastor, has experienced a signal refreshing as the result of a tent meeting conducted by F. E. Smiley, D. D. The listeners would not consent to closing when the first two weeks had passed, but gave closest attention throughout the month of July. A large number of people from various parts of the city attended the meetings. The churches will reap good results.

Ohio

The ladies' aid society of Collingwood church, Toledo, is redecorating the auditorium. Preaching services will be adjourned until this work is completed.

Dr. John Clark Hill, formerly pastor of First church, Springfield, has been engaged by First church, Marion, to supply until the arrival of their pastor-elect, Rev. L. L. Strock of Trenton, N. J., some time in October.

Iowa

Alfred Nickles has served Wyoming church very acceptably as student pastor for four years. He has recently graduated from Lenox College and will go to McCormick Seminary in September.

The work at Meriden under the pastorate of Rev. John W. Little is making progress. A number of additions to the membership and to the eldership were recently made.

Trustees of Osceola church have been authorized to sell the present building preparatory to building a new one near by.

During the three years which Rev. William B. Lampe has been at Shelby the manse and the church building have been repaired and redecorated. Contributions to church boards have grown to six times what they were before his coming. A farewell reception was held for him recently before his departure to Winfield, Kan.

New Jersey

First and Trinity churches of South Orange united their services for July and August.

It is expected that the new Forest Hill church, Newark, will be dedicated during the week of Sept. 21-28. A special musical program is being arranged in connection with those services. The church will include a gymnasium in the basement.

When Rev. Linius L. Strock goes in the fall to the pastorate of First church of Marion, Ohio, he will leave in Bethany church at Trenton a vigorous and united congregation of 600 members, of whom 400 have been received to the fellowship of the church in his ten years of ministry there. Last year for the first time in its history the congregation was entirely freed from debt, and expects to continue in the enjoyment of that liberty. Rev. Daniel Requa Foster is pastor emeritus, and among its elders are Judge John Rellstab of the United States district court and Dr. Ebenezer Mackey, state superintendent of public instruction. The type of Mr. Strock's ministry is indicated by the fact that he is at present chairman of the evangelistic committees of both his synod and presbytery.

Rev. L. L. Strock

Michigan

Members of the women's home and foreign mission societies of Grand Rapids church took advantage of the opportunity to thank the city council for their refusal to permit a Mormon missionary to speak on the streets of that city.

Large efforts were made by Battle Creek church to reach former members and invite them to the special home-coming service during the week of Aug. 19-25. The church was open each day and a special service was held for the visitors Aug. 25. Rev. George E. Barnes is pastor.

Illinois

The Presbyterian church at Normal is to be torn down immediately to make way for a new building on the same site, which will be started at once.

The contract for erecting a new church at Watseka has been awarded. It will cost $21,500 and is to be built from money willed for that purpose by the late John Donavan.

Wisconsin

Rev. Paul S. Johnson has been transferred to the Aniwa-Hogarty group of churches.

The new church in Gresham was organized for work and two ruling elders elected recently.

The summer Bible conference and school of methods in Sunday school work Aug. 18 to 24 at Green Lake, near Ripon, attracted attention among the Christian workers of the state. The superintendent of Sunday school work in the state had it in charge, with Dr. Gerrit Verkuyl of Appleton and local pastors.

Rev. Joseph R. Warnick, pastor at Richland Center, with Dr. Verkuyl and other workers, has lately held a series of Sunday school institutes of much interest in the various sections of Richland county.

Indiana

A mission is soon to be built and operated under the auspices of Vincennes church.

There was recently dedicated at Evansville a building for Washington Avenue church, which has been developed from a mission into which many of the Christian people of the town have in the past put a large amount of work.

A corner lot facing the campus has just been purchased for the headquarters of the student work of the Presbyterians at Bloom-

Proof of Satisfaction

Satisfied clients are strong evidence of a financial house's ability and reliability. A few letters from clients of E. J. Lander and Company of Grand Forks, N. D., are quoted here as examples. This firm has been in the farm mortgage business for many years and not only has a large number of clients throughout this country but also in many foreign lands. An investor in Honolulu, Hawaii, writes:

"At your request I inclose coupons. I wish I had a good big sum of money to send you for investment, for I should feel that the placing of it would be in good hands, and hence to my advantage. During the years that I have dealt with you I have realized the fulfillment of your promises."

A man in Denver, Colo., says:

"I have your esteemed favor of the 7th inst., inclosing draft in payment of the Roseberg loan. Please accept thanks. I am sorry I could not reinvest this at present, but require money, and hope to be able in the future to continue our very pleasant relations."

A well pleased Chicago investor sent this letter: "I am in receipt of your letter inclosing the Sherry papers and also a check for $625.10, paying in full the Hagen loan. Please accept my thanks for your prompt attention to same. Of course there is no great incentive to place money away from home now when you can get 6 and 7 per cent for it here, but if I do send any money away it will be to you people, as you have always treated us finely in every way, and every loan, for over eighteen years' experience, has been met on the day. Again thanking you for your promptness and courtesy, I remain," etc.

Full information about our methods, references and loans can be secured by writing E. J. Lander and Company, Frand Forks, N. D.

Arkansas

The church building at Harrison was de-royed by fire July 8. The congregation was le to save the piano, organ and carpeting, nd is now raising funds to build a larger difice. Following recent special evangelistic eetings a large number were received into the urch, most of them from the Sunday school.

Good Things in This Issue

People who are dissuaded from doing good ecause they can get no one to help them and eir own means are small will receive inspiraon from the article on page 1191, "Founded n $14 and Faith." The heroine of this story ot only was alone but was alone in New York ity. She is doing a work which is paying rge dividends.

Dr. Coyle's article on page 1188 anaylzing e elements which are seeking to tear down e home is worth reading when you have isure to ponder what he says and see how uch of the analysis applies to your own home.

An interesting evidence of the advance of eligious comity is noted in the editorial pararaphs on page 1187. Ten years ago it probbly would have been impossible to find a Jewh congregation loaning their synagogue to a entile congregation.

Temperance Topics

The determination of the German kaiser to bstain from all alcoholic drinks, even though is action tends to strike at a large German dustry, has been given large prominence by any American newspapers. On a recent voyge it is said that the kaiser drank only water. is action has had a large influence in German rmy circles.

It has been announced by the Catholic Total bstinence Union that P. A. B. Widener, milionaire traction magnate of Philadelphia, will evote a large portion of his wealth to fight he liquor interests.

Clergy and Laity

Sir William Ramsay, the archæologist, explorer of Bible lands and author, is suffering uch embarrassment in fulfilling engagements or lectures at seats of learning, chautauquas nd before religious organizations owing to he sudden death of President Ketler of Grove ity College, who had charge of his itinerary nd left no list of his dates. Dr. S. Edward oung, pastor of Bedford church, Brooklyn, vill undertake to forward inquiries to Sir Wiliam for the next few weeks. Sir William must ail the last week of November, in order to eliver his lectures at Oxford University.

Nebraska Indians Have Camp Meeting

The annual camp meeting of the Blackbird Hills Indian church ended Aug. 17. In spite of the two long and well attended powwows held by the Omahas and the intense heat the meeting was better attended than usual. Twenty Indian families camped about the church. Three services were held each day for the teaching and preaching of the Bible. The resident missionaries, Rev. George A. Beith and wife, were assisted by the northeast Nebraska district missionary, Rev. Samuel Light. Many Indians expressed the desire and intention of living the Christian life. The voices of many Christian Omahas were heard honoring Christ. Visiting Dakotas, Otoes, Pottawottamies and Ponchas also testified. All sermons and talks were interpreted. Mr. Beith says that in his six years among the Omahas he has never known the spirit of unity so strong both in secular and religious matters.

About 300 participated in the Sabbath's services, and the outlook for the church is considered most encouraging.

LINES TO A NONAGENARIAN

These verses are dedicated to Milton Waldo, D. D., who reaches his ninety-first birthday anniversary on Aug. 28. Dr. Waldo was graduated from Auburn Theological Seminary in his twenties and was a pastor in Illinois fifty years ago, later at St. Augustine, Fla. He knew the father of President Wilson, a Presbyterian minister; the father of Senator Elihu Root, the late Dr. Richard S. Holmes of The Continent when a student for the ministry, and many prominent men of one and two generations ago. He is a brother-in-law of Dr. Herrick Johnson, formerly of McCormick Seminary. His home is with his son, Professor Waldo of the University of Illinois, at Urbana.

The Lord do so to me and more also,
If I remember not my friend Waldo
This day, of all the days, thy natal day—
Remembering, besides, for thee to pray.
So hale, so hearty thou, I grasp thy hand,
Yet feel close drawn to heaven's borderland.
Thy seventy years of faithful ministries
Tell on my soul in deepening mysteries;
Of toil and woe, of struggle and defeat,
Then victories, anon to be complete.
I bless thee, friend, and wish for thee more years
Of life, of love, of grace, devoid of tears.
March on, amidst the glories of thy west,
Dear heart, and brave—thy last days be thy best!
Why! when, for you, the years are ninety-one
The best of life has only just begun.
You mourn you've not accomplished more for God
And for his world whereon you daily trod;
Be still, and know that David's meed is thine,
Approved of God in smiles of endless time,
By this fair word the dear old Book doth tell:
"Whereas 'twas in thine heart to build . . .
thou didst well!"

The home of the foreigner in America needs our support

Children of foreigners contribute more than their share to the criminal class of this country, according to government reports. In 1904 the children of foreign parentage constituted 60 per cent more than their proportion of the prison population of the United States. In this issue of The Continent Professor Robert H. Gault has a suggestion of one way to help this situation. Dubuque College and Seminary for many years has been endeavoring to improve the citizenship of those who have come to this country in recent years by training foreign speaking young men to serve as religious guides for their countrymen in America. The cities produce most of the criminal population, but the country too has its problems which are no less important because they are less frequently brought to public attention. Foreign speaking peoples can be reached best for lives of civic usefulness by men possessing similar racial characteristics. Nearly a score of nationalities are represented in the students at our institution. We shall be glad to tell you more of this work. Address

MATTHEW 4.12—4.23 Jesus calls the Four

12 Now when he heard that John was delivered up, he withdrew into Gal'i-lee; 13 and leaving Naz'a-reth, he came and dwelt in Ca-per'na-um, which is by the sea, in the borders of Zeb-u-lun and Naph'ta-li: 14 that it might be fulfilled which was spoken through I-sa'iah the prophet, saying,

FERRY HALL

Parents interested in selecting a boarding school where Christian ideals prevail should investigate Ferry Hall at Lake Forest, Illinois. In addition to a college preparatory course, which leading colleges of the country accept without examination, a two-year Junior College course for high school graduates is offered, for which credit is given by a number of universities. Thorough courses in Art, Music, Expression and Domestic Science are also maintained.

A Young Women's Christian Association and regular church attendance promote a Christian atmosphere. A glee club, language clubs, state clubs and a current events club form democratic social groups having useful aims. Out-of-door life contributes to good health. Swimming pool.

Around the Shop

In Chicago there is a great merchandising establishment much of whose remarkable prestige has been built on this foundation: Give people what they pay for. "If you make a purchase at Marshall Field's," any well informed Chicagoan will tell you, "you'll get what you want or you'll get your money back, and you'll be treated just as courteously when you ask for your money as when you paid it in." There are loyal Presbyterians members of this firm, or in high position with it, and they have helped to give the company its reputation.

Other firms there are in this class—the Tobey Company is the Field's of Chicago furniture business; and in New York there is the great McCutcheon Company, with another Presbyterian a leader in its management. You're as safe in sending these firms money as you are in handing it across the counter.

No firm could be so ready to "make good" if it did not primarily insure good quality. Back of good quality lie brains and experience. The articles in a "cheap" store may appear just as attractive as those in the other place, but they will not stand the test of use. It is easy enough merely to fill the columns of a religious periodical. Articles are to be had for nothing or for nominal payment. Material for which somebody else has paid can be "clipped." Sometimes there is financial profit in such a method.

But—the religious paper of the future is not to be of that sort. It must be clear-cut and progressive, and what it prints, from beginning to end, must represent a distinctive editorial purpose. It must pay for what it uses, and be self-respecting; and its readers, in respect for themselves, must not begrudge a fair payment for what they receive.

The Continent desires to stand on its merits. If you do not think it good value, you may have your money back.

"The Inside of the Cup"

WINSTON CHURCHILL'S latest novel, "The Inside of the Cup," is a book that the Christian church in America cannot ignore. It is a direct and all but defiant challenge of the church, from one of the most substantial of American literary men—a man who does not speak in a corner.

Yet it is not the production of an enemy of the church. It is written by one of the church's own sons, who protests that the enlargement of the church's power is his dearest hope.

Of criticisms and objections against the book it is easy to enumerate many particulars.

In the literary sense Mr. Churchill has not written a story. The volume is as strictly a piece of polemics as if offered in the form of seminary lectures. Anybody looking for a story might as well save disappointment by not opening its covers.

Nevertheless giving his work the guise of a novel has compelled Mr. Churchill to mass his materials for dramatic effect in a way to overstrain all his points of emphasis. His hero is loaded with all the perplexities encountered by all sorts of men in the ministry; his villain is guilty of all the crimes committed by all the hypocrites in the laity. Distortion is inevitable. The picture is shadowed blacker than any one spot in actual life could possibly be.

It is a feature of this same circumstance that accounts for the author's confusing two unrelated problems in the difficulties of his hero, the troubled young rector. Some ministers struggle with questionings of the creeds; others pass through tribulation on account of the social issues of the hour. But the novelist, just because he has only one hero, must make him—unlucky wight!—go through both battles at once.

This mix of problems works out to the ostensible conclusion that a minister must renounce the ancient historic doctrines of the church, particularly the virgin birth, before he can preach and exemplify the equality of Christ's love for every sort of humanity.

But surely Mr. Churchill himself has before now realized the absurdity of that. Every look around refutes it. Ministers are not rare but common who along with the most steadfast orthodoxy are as intimate with the woes of the poor and the outcast as the rector of Mr. Churchill's fancy could possibly be in his best estate.

Throughout "The Inside of the Cup" the one unaccountable phenomenon is the author's fierce obsession of antipathy to the virgin birth. It is unaccountable from his own standpoint. He insists that physical phenomena cannot affect spiritual realities; yet he is unwilling to accept the spiritual reality of the incarnation of God in Christ until the physical phenomenon of virgin birth disappears.

Perhaps the book is destined, though, to do good at this point. The superfluous vehemence of its assault is well calculated to initiate reaction to the orthodox view.

Mr. Churchill appears generally to lack, in abstract reasoning, the penetration to bore through to ultimate considerations. This is distressingly true as he handles the divorce question, where he reasons from individualistic premises and forgets both home and society. His conclusions in consequence are valueless.

Make every discount, however, and it still remains to be acknowledged that Mr. Churchill has given the church a mighty message. Out of the volume one monumental teaching rises:

The church can have power in the world only when it dares be utterly true to the commands, example and spirit of its Lord.

There is no denying that a thousand temptations to easy adjustment with a constantly more complicated civilization are at work today to entice the church from the strait and narrow path which Jesus bade his disciples walk. A thousand whispering voices tell the twentieth century Christian that literal following of Christ has become impossible.

In contrast, there is something magnificent in the fervent conviction with which this popular novelist retorts that it is possible.

Even though his blows fall painfully on tender sensibilities, the church owes gratitude to the man who smites it awake to realize its absolute and undiminished obligation to live according to every word that has proceeded from the mouth of its Master.

Passing by details subject to controversy, the church ought freely to acknowledge that these principles which Mr. Churchill hammers home are gospel truth:

The life of the church consists not in solidarity of organization nor in regularity of form nor in any aspect of external prosperity, but wholly in the personal spiritual association of its individual members with the living Jesus Christ.

The vital perpetuation of God's eternal truth in the world depends not upon the perfect expression of it in formulated creeds but on the immediate and continuing apprehension of it by souls who inwardly receive the Spirit of God.

Real faith in real truth will never fear rational inquiry nor resent the demand that the doctrines of the church shall be expounded without violence to the powers of reason wherewith God endows the human soul. And whoever supremely loves Jesus loves truth first and creed afterwards.

Giving a reason for the faith that is in it, the church today must give that reason not in the dialects of dead ages and cloistered schools, but in language "understanded of the common people" and vivid with the fire of immediate contemporary conviction.

Those only are truly Christian who care more for the things of the spirit than for any good of material comforts and possessions—who are unhesitatingly prepared to give up any material good whatsoever rather than sacrifice the least possession of the spirit.

No church is a church of Christ which desires to draw into its fellowship the prosperous in preference to the unfortunate.

Wherever the church is incapable of purging away from itself the sins of covetousness, avarice and oppression of the poor, it cannot hope to achieve either favor with God or influence over humanity. Alleged philanthropy apart from love insults earth as well as heaven.

It avails naught to "cleanse the outside of the cup and the platter," while "the inside of the cup" continues "full from extortion and excess."

The recompenses of God against Pharisaism or any other wrong are not completed with the end of the life here seen and known. There is life beyond, and it includes "judgment to come."

Verily, a book that teaches these things heralds the kingdom of God.

The World

President Announces America's Mexican Policy

The notable development in the complicated Mexican situation last week was President Wilson's message to Congress, delivered and received with an earnest seriousness which proved that the President and Congress were at one in appreciating the difficulties confronting both the big northern republic and its distracted southern neighbor. No other President since George Washington has appeared before Congress in person to speak his views on foreign affairs, and the scene is described as the most impressive in recent history. The senators went to the hall of the house of representatives and the entire membership of both bodies stood up and heartily applauded the President. In his two previous appearances at the capitol he had come as the leader of the Democratic party seeking to carry through the party's platform and promises, but this time he was the nonpartisan head of the government speaking for the American people as a whole. Statesmanship, dignity and courage characterized the proceedings and the utterances.

The gist of the President's suggestions to Congress and the country was that the Mexican situation must be given time to work itself out, but there is to be no armed intervention, for the present at least. He declared for strict neutrality, a denial of arms to all factions and urged that all Americans leave Mexico at once, with assistance from this government where needed. Everyone in Mexico who assumes to exercise authority is notified that the United States will "vigilantly watch the fortunes of those Americans who cannot get away, and hold those responsible for their sufferings and losses to a definite reckoning." But with this it was made plain that the door was not closed against resumption of mediation. Through the message, as well as in the communications to Provisional President Huerta presented by President Wilson's confidential agent, John Lind, runs a strong note of friendship to Mexico and to the Mexican people.

Huerta Rejects President Wilson's Overtures

President Wilson's proffer of mediation, extended at the hand of ex-Governor Lind, was on the basis of an immediate armistice throughout Mexico, a free election by which all parties should agree to abide, and Huerta's pledge not to be a candidate. To this was coupled a mild hint that if the "de facto government" accepted the terms, then the government of the United States would use its good offices to facilitate a loan by American bankers large enough to meet the temporary requirements of the Mexican government.

President Huerta has a clever mouthpiece in his foreign minister, Francisco Gamboa, and the latter showed shrewdness in the argumentative end of the correspondence. Senor Gamboa objected to the use of the words "de facto" as applied to the Huerta government, and strongly resented as an "enormity" the idea that the United States should take any sort of hand in the Mexican election. With sarcastic emphasis he pointed out that the constitution of Mexico bars the "ad interim" president from election as either president or vice-president, and therefore Huerta is constitutionally ineligible—and yet at least one Mexican newspaper openly speaks of Huerta's coming election. As to a loan, the minister stoutly asserts that there are not loans enough in existence to permit the dignity of his government to be lessened.

Mr. Lind left the City of Mexico last week when negotiations reached a standstill and proceeded to Vera Cruz to embark for home. President Wilson delayed for twenty-four hours in presenting his message to Congress, and Mr. Lind stopped at the coast to permit Huerta and his advisers to accept the American terms, but the week closed without further incident, except a large exodus of Americans from Mexico, who were driven to leave by the President's warning.

Peace Palace at The Hague Dedicated

The palace of peace, built at The Hague at a cost of $1,500,000, donated by Andrew Carnegie as a home for the permanent court of arbitration, was dedicated last Thursday in the presence of the royal family of Holland, diplomats, representatives of peace societies and visitors. Abraham Van Karnebeck, president of the Carnegie Foundation, placed the palace under the care of the diplomatic corps, of which for the purposes of the gift the Dutch foreign minister is made president. Retiring Minister Van Swinderen accepted the custody of the building and expressed the conviction that the opening of the great structure added an important page to the history of arbitration. He eulogized several deceased members of the court of arbitration, including the late chief justice Melville W. Fuller, and paid tribute to Mr. Carnegie for devoting fruits of his labors to the service of humanity.

Mr. Carnegie was decorated by Queen Wilhelmina with the grand cross of the Order of Nassau. The day after the dedication a bust was unveiled of Sir William Randal Cremer, a pioneer in the cause of international arbitration, and on this occasion Mr. Carnegie was the chief speaker. Mr. Carnegie said the only thing required for a world peace agreement is the cooperation of three or four leading powers against disturbers, and he made a plea to the emperor of Germany to invite the leading nations to move for world peace.

Lord Chancellor Visits American Lawyers

Viscount Haldane, who is said to be the first lord high chancellor of Great Britain to leave his country while in office for four centuries, reached New York Friday for a five days' visit as the guest of the American Bar Association. The lord chancellor came to deliver an address on "Higher Nationality" at the annual meeting of the association, which was held at Montreal on Monday.

Besides the usual business of the lawyers' organization, a conference of federal and state judges was held to formulate plans for reforming the rules of pleading and practice in the United States courts, also possible legislation to give the supreme court supervision of the rules of procedure in all state and federal courts so that uniformity might be secured in every court in the country.

Governors of Several States Meet in Conference

Governors and ex-governors from twenty-five states attended the annual conference of the "house of governors" at Colorado Springs last week. The first conference was called by President Roosevelt in 1908, and was so successful that it has been repeated every year since. Discussion was had of various important state problems, the object being to obtain the friendly cooperation of each state in matters of common concern. While the association is voluntary and its proceedings unauthoritative, the meetings have been both educational and profitable. The experience of one state or one chief executive is of value to every other state, and the conferences afford an opportunity for an exchange of information on subjects lying within state jurisdiction.

Movements for uniform legislation on marriage and divorce, child labor, conservation and social questions have been stimulated by these meetings, as well as a study of the administrative side of state government. Governors McGovern of Wisconsin, O'Neal of Alabama and Ammons of Colorado were the executive committee of the Colorado Springs conference, and were reelected. Franklin K. Lane, secretary of the interior, represented President Wilson. Secretary Lane outlined the policy of his department toward western land settlement. The federal government, he stated, had expended $80,000,000 in reclamation projects, and should expend an equal sum within the next decade.

A preliminary report of the federal rural credits commission from Senator Fletcher, its chairman, was read. The commission made an extensive investigation of the farming and credit systems of eighteen European countries, and has established permanent headquarters in Washington. It will make recommendations for a system of rural banking through which farmers may obtain loans, and finance cooperative buying, selling and producing organizations.

Reforms in School Hygiene Are Proposed

"Social hygiene," a subject unheard of not many years ago, is today recognized as a topic of vital importance. It is now believed that the physical and mental health of pupils in the schools is as worthy of consideration as is the amount of textbook knowledge which they may get inside their heads; consequently pupils' teeth, eyes, breathing, food, home life, all are points of inquiry by educators, physicians, scientists and public-spirited citizens generally. Men and women of these classes gathered last week from nearly every civilized nation on the globe to attend the fourth International Congress of School Hygiene at Buffalo. The United States government was represented by William B. Wilson, secretary of labor, and there were distinguished delegates and guests from at home and abroad, along with experts and lesser lights to the number of 2,000.

Dr. Charles W. Eliot, president emeritus of Harvard, was president of the congress. Some of the practical lines of discussion related to the toothbrush and its efficacy in preventing disease; fresh air schools to correct tuberculosis tendencies; the needs and benefits of medical inspection in the public schools; the school nurse's place in the health campaign; recreation, and effects of food on mind. President Eliot, in common with other speakers, argued for instruction in sex hygiene, using the term in its broadest sense. The silence which in the past was the rule on this theme was declared to be a menace to the future of the race.

A Philadelphia physician told of the success of a local experiment in "vitalizing" school children by making them do their studying and school work in the fresh air, with wide open windows, no matter what the temperature, provision being made for suitable clothing and frequent exercise periods. It was claimed that the fresh air pupils gained more in weight and were freer from disase than a corresponding group of pupils working under the usual conditions, and at the same time scholarship was kept up. Other addresses had to do with the hygiene of school buildings, grounds and equipment; school administration, curriculum, home work and play, and sanitary supervision. Dr. Allan J. McLaughlin of the United States public health service reported that school children of the Philippine islands were educating their parents in hygiene and disease prevention.

Various phases of school management were considered by teachers of the Chicago district last week, and one utterance made at the institute attracted special attention. Dr. G. Stanley Hall, president of Clark University, told the teachers that corporal punishment should not be banished from the schools. President Hall, who is out of step with the antiflogging regulations of the day, is quoted as saying that "the rod does a world of good, especially when used by a teacher in the flush of righteous indignation. A good point is not always to keep pupils too happy. Let them know there is the fear of wrath to come. Pleasure is a wonderful thing, but too much of it deteriorates life."

Three-Cornered Mayoralty Contest in New York

New York City now has two mayoralty candidates in the field in addition to John Purroy Mitchel, nominated by the fusion committee of 107. Edward Everett McCall, chairman of the public service commission and former justice of the supreme court, is the Democratic, or Tammany, nominee. After Tammany had refused to renominate Mayor Gaynor the latter announced his candidacy as an independent. The mayor expects to profit from the dissatisfaction caused by the failure of the fusionists to choose District Attorney Whitman to head the ticket instead of Mr. Mitchel.

On the ticket with Mr. McCall Congressman Metz was nominated for city controller, an office which he formerly held, and Congressman Goulden was named for president of the board of aldermen. Charles S. Whitman, the Republican district attorney, who was renominated by the fusionists, was indorsed by Tammany for reelection, and after some hesitation accepted the indorsement.

No New Evidence Alleged Against Koreans

Transcripts have been received in this country of the proceedings in the retrial of Baron Yun Chi Ho and his five companions in the appellate court of Korea. It will be remembered that the first conviction of these defendants in this court was voided by the supreme court, and when the case was remanded they were tried and convicted again.

The study of this abstract makes it more than ever puzzling how the condemnation of the prisoners can be justified in equity, or even sustained by legal technicalities. The supreme court on review of the original proceedings held that the evidence did not support the verdict against the prisoners. They were charged with conspiracy to assassinate the governor general, but no actual movement to accomplish this purpose was indicated in the testimony. New evidence of overt plans must, according to the higher court, be brought into view in order to make out a punishable case.

But the reports from the new trial clearly show that no new evidence whatever was introduced. The prosecution rested wholly on the same alleged proofs that it presented before, and on these discredited grounds the court reaffirms its former verdict. It would appear therefore that the supreme court, to which appeal has been taken again, has only one escape from stultifying Japanese justice, and that is to set all the prisoners at liberty, since the prosecution has demonstrated that it has nothing against the defendants except what has already been declared inadequate testimony.

In connection with this case there comes to light from another source the significant fact that the Japanese government, through a prominent official in Korea, recently conveyed to Messrs. P. L. Gillett and J. L. Gerdine a specific demand that they must resign from the Seoul Young Men's Christian Association, wherein Mr. Gillett has been executive secretary and Mr. Gerdine a member of the committee of directors. They were told that the Japanese government could not overlook the fact that they had joined to address to the continuation committee of the Edinburgh conference a request for some action that would arouse the sentiment of the world against Japan's effort to convict Korean Christians of attempted assassination. Yet Japan did not wish to go as far as to revoke its annual appropriation of 10,000 yen to the Seoul association or to expel the writers of the letter from Korea. In lieu thereof the government would content itself with their resignation, which they were told would be interpreted to signify that they realized their mistake in writing the letter.

Both refused to comply, but the tension was relieved by Mr. Gerdine's return to America on furlough, and Mr. Gillett's taking leave of absence for a few months to travel in China and Japan. What the outcome may be is not yet apparent. The Japanese official alluded to assumed in this conversation that the release of ninety-nine of the accused prisoners was an administrative act of the Japanese colonial government, and seemed disappointed that the missionaries were not content to regard that as an acceptable compromise.

Publicity and Prayer Win Again in Atlanta

The "executive committee of the Men and Religion Movement" in Atlanta, in which, as The Continent has said, two Presbyterian elders, Messrs. Eagan and Jackson, are the prime movers, has achieved another big moral and philanthropic victory through the medium of appeal by advertising to the consciences of upright citizens—backed by prayerful appeal to God when earthly prospects looked hopeless. The aim of the crusade by these men included three things—the alleviation of cruelties practiced by keepers on convicts in Georgia chain gangs, the legalizing of parole for offenders under first conviction and the establishment of a reformatory home for betrayed girls.

When this program was announced the politicians of the state lined up practically solid against it. Not a single member of either house of the legislature would espouse the bills at the outset of the agitation. But day after day in the advertising columns of Atlanta's daily papers the straightforward and relentless telling of the plain truth about Georgia's damning treatment for young boys and girls who had transgressed its laws drove home the undeniable necessity of the legislation demanded. And day after day awakening manhood or aroused dread brought round the indifferent Georgia legislators.

Opposition intensified, however, as the cause gained recruits, and time and again the crusaders seemed to have arrived at a crisis of inevitable defeat. But the appeal to God, "It is time for thee, O Lord, to work," repeatedly turned to their favor what had appeared to be impossible contingencies. In the last hours of the legislative session all barriers went down and the bills for the girls' reformatory and for parole of first offenders passed with big majorities in both houses. The bill to reform chain-gang practices did not get through, but the exposure of these abuses has revived certain neglected statutes already on the books which will abate such horrors greatly. And under the operation of the parole law no more young prisoners will be sentenced to the gangs. So, all in all, the triumph is very complete and demonstrates with new certainty that the Atlanta method of advertising and prayer is an enormously potent means of war on intrenched wrongs.

Enlargement for Army and Navy Associations

The work which the international committee of Young Men's Christian Associations has been doing in the last fifteen years for the men of both the army and navy of the United States is promised a tremendous development through a bequest in this interest found in the will of Mrs. Julia Lorillard Butterfield, who died recently at her home in the town of Cold Spring-on-the-Hudson. The estate of Mrs. Butterfield is supposed to amount to about $3,000,000, and after specific bequests of three-quarters of a million to members of the family and to various philanthropies, the army and navy department of the Young Men's Christian Association is constituted legatee of all the remainder. With all conceivable shrinkage allowed for, it is regarded as certain that the international committee will have at its disposal $2,000,000 to spend on new buildings and equipment for this work. Mrs. Butterfield was the widow of General Daniel Butterfield, who was wounded at Gettysburg. Among the other legacies of her will was $100,000 to her husband's alma mater—Union College at Schenectady.

The Important Things

HOW utterly impossible it is to know at the time what are the important things! The really weighty actions do not show their weight when we first touch them. Jesus' parable of the judgment, with its record of cups of cold water and visits to the sick, suggests how often the things which were purely incidental and quickly forgotten are the things by which God judges.

Set in contrast with that the other declaration that there will come many at the last declaring they have preached and done many wonderful things in his name, to whom Christ will say that he never knew them. That says nothing against those apparently greater things, for Jesus sent out the disciples to preach and to do great works of healing. But it does suggest how completely he keeps in his own hand the matter of judgment, and how little we know what are the important things.

We should always say that the raising of a dead man in the name of Christ, or the preaching of a great sermon in the name of Christ, is a greater thing than visiting a sick man or a prisoner, though it were in Christ's name. It is not proved that we are not right. It is proved that we do not know anything about it. We talk sometimes about "cardinal points" in life. The word cardinal comes from the Latin "cardo," which means a hinge, and cardinal points are those on which life hinges. We simply do not know when we come to one of those points.

Sometimes looking back, we say that our whole life course was determined by some small act. Someone sneered at a proposal which was made, and that very fact turned us from it, and life has been different since then. The sneer was a cardinal point, though the man who sneered may have had no thought of the importance of it. A well known evangelist has often told that his public decision for Christ came from a touch on the elbow by his Sunday school teacher. He does not pretend that he might not have decided without that touch. He only emphasizes the fact that it was that apparently unimportant thing on which the decision did actually turn.

The suggestion of the two sayings of Jesus which we have quoted would be that the small movement of the Sunday school teacher may have been a greater thing in life than the preaching of a great sermon on that same Sabbath.

In his introduction to the life of Alexander, Plutarch defends his biographies by saying, "I do not write histories, but I write lives; and a slight circumstance, a jest, a word, is often a truer index to a man's character than accounts of his bloody victories and tremendous conquests." Most of us have experiences which prove that Plutarch was right. A man does reveal himself really in small things rather than in large ones.

It is a familiar teaching that what a man does when he is off his guard is more revealing than his most prepared actions. In George Eliot's "Romola" the revealing word of Tito Melema is when Baldassarre seizes his tunic in the crowd, when he is escaping from the French soldier, and without an instant's thought Tito speaks the word which leads finally to his ruin. As he looked back on that scene he often felt that he could have done far more wisely if he had had a chance to think. The trouble was, however, that he revealed his real heart in his rash word. Many a man does that. The important word is not the oration in which the man declares his position but often some chance clause in which he forgets himself, and so most fully asserts himself.

Nowhere in literature is that more clearly stated than in Browning's poem, in which Karshish, the Arab physician, tells of meeting Lazarus after he had been raised from the dead. The trait which Browning points out most clearly is that Lazarus's experience in death seemed to have taught him a new point of view of life. Things which seemed important to men had lost their meaning to him, and what other men had counted unimportant he now saw to be vastly important. He acted like a beggar who had found a treasure in middle life and was getting himself readjusted to the new relationships which it brought.

Lazarus's treasure was knowledge of the future, and so of the meaning of the present. When men talked of what they called great things, like armaments besieging the city, he was indifferent, while in some little thing he seemed to see prodigious importance. He could see his child sicken unto death with far less concern than to see a word, a gesture, a glance from that same child on the playground. That little experience in the future had given him God's point of view, and therefore he knew what was important.

Well, we cannot get that point of view. But we can be assured of the delightful or disconcerting surprises of it. We can be kept from unworthy pride of our high duties, and certainly from complaint at the narrowness of our lot. Everybody has a chance at God's big things. Nobody is kept back by the narrowness of his lot from doing the things which at the end will count most. The only danger in any lot is of a narrow spirit, an un-Christlike mind. Nobody knows what is chiefly important in any life. The only thing that is sure is that we shall be surprised when we find out. All that seems left for us to do is to guard with equal care what we call small and great things, and to live by a spirit which will ennoble both.

No Stuff for Good Statesmen in Bad Men

The general sanity and wholesomeness of the influence which The Outlook exerts on its readers must be acknowledged as a national asset. But unhappily that eminent weekly persists in reiterating one political doctrine which is so demoralizing that consistently it could find a place only in a creed of moral anarchy. This is the theory that if a public officer's policies are wise and right his usefulness to the people is not compromised by delinquencies in his private character. What matter, we understand our contemporary to ask, if a political leader is individually immoral and corrupt, provided he does right for the people?

This argument can be specious only in the shortest perspective. It is possible to imagine some personally bad official doing here and there a good act, but it is impossible to imagine a personally bad official leading the people to a permanently higher plane of civic life. Once let the people suspect that a public character is playing a pretense in championing righteousness and they will speedily make it plain that they propose to have no more of him. And it's not only that they will drop him; they will conceive a cynical distrust of everybody else who professes high principles and are likely to end by plunging back into all their old grossness of frank scorn for honest politics.

That's the ruin of many a once promising reform movement—the leaders distrusted and their following disgusted. Of all conditions for political advancement there is only one that is absolutely indispensable, and that is the honesty of the men who stand for righteous ideals. An old Jewish proverb-maker long ago set forth the conception that no man can rule a city who is not able to rule his own spirit. And no man is fit to be trusted to rule in any state or nation who had not governed his own life with as deep a sense of responsibility as the people expect him to exercise toward the duties of office. To advocate or even intimate that sound statesmanship can proceed without sound personal character is a folly that can be accounted for only in the very short-sighted or the very thoughtless.

Only the Church Hasn't Reached Gettysburg

The outstanding American event of the past summer has been the Gettysburg reunion. It was an occasion quite incomparable with anything gone before. The world has no memory of so complete an extinguishment of old hatreds between former foes. Men have many a time made treaties of peace after conflict and kept amity thereafter. But never before have men who tried to kill one another come back in person to their former battlefield and consorted in comradeship with absolutely no sense of anything to forgive—no consciousness of anything separating them in loyalties, allegiances or affections. The national unity which has succeeded division is unity; there is not even the suggestion in it of fragment or fraction. There is but one grain for the whole piece; the juncture of parts is indiscernible.

But enough has been said already about the patriotic glory of all this. The need for reemphasizing here the miracle of Gettysburg fifty years after is for the lamentable sake of pointing a contrast. Alas, that there should anywhere be found a place of contrast! And thrice alas, that the place of that contrast is in the realm of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, who lived and died to show men how to love one another! How grim and humiliating the fact! Just one field where the marks of old antipathies which brought on America's civil war are still traceable; just one area of human interest where it is not yet possible for men to forget that they are Northern and Southern. And that is the church!

Presbyterians, Methodists, Baptists—these are Northern and Southern yet. Peace and brotherhood everywhere else, but under the banner of the Christ of peace and brotherhood there is—not conflict, thank God, but distrust and separation and holding aloof. In religion alone Americans are afraid to give up the old sectionalsm. The battlements of the warrior are all fallen to the ground; ut among those whose Leader bids them be peacemakers the picket ines still warily pace their intrenchments.

Is there any way of speaking the shame of it all as hotly, burn- ngly, as it ought to be spoken?

he Best National Anthem Already Written

Some Catholics are trying to run down "America" as the national nthem, and while it is exasperating to hear them objecting to it n the ground of its allusion to the Pilgrim fathers, the hymn itself as unfortunately too few affirmative merits to rouse a discrim- nating Protestant to very enthusiastic defense of it. As Dr. van yke pointed out a few years ago, it is too New Englandish to be roadly national. And use and custom have proved too rigid to ac- ept his idea of enlarging its geography by supplementary stanzas.

But why should time be taken to apologize for "America" or ighs be wasted on wishing that somebody would produce a better ational hymn? That better hymn has already been written—a noble omposition in every wise suitable for the national anthem of a hristian country, and as such deserving popular recognition if not fficial adoption. If not vain, it is at least needless, to dream f anything superior. The verses which Katherine Lee Bates wrote 1904, beginning, "O beautiful for spacious skies," constitute the roadest and most adaptable patriotic lyric ever penned in this ountry and one of the most elevated. It is real and pure poetry. nd set to the original American tune prepared for it by William V. Sleeper, the hymn satisfies in every particular the demand for national anthem singable by the multitudes and fitted to thrill reat throngs with sacred impulses. The hymn is found in all ecent hymnals, and those will help most to solve the problem of lofty patriot song for Americans who employ every opportunity introduce it to the appreciation of the people.

ood Recipe for Being Desirable Neighbors

These columns have but recently referred admiringly to the cumen and straightforward candor of Count Okuma, who as he dvances in age looms all the while larger as without comparison e greatest figure of the age in Japan. At our last allusion we uoted from his sage comments on the Japanese issue in California bit of gentle and yet poignant irony for jingo Americans. A ter speech shows that the count is not afraid to speak to his own eople in a manner equally direct and some degrees less deferential. his is what he said to Japanese who were complaining of the rejudice against their race across the Pacific: "Our countrymen annot assimilate with foreign races, and in respect of knowledge r morality you could not regard them as the superiors of Euro- eans and Americans. If they don't wish to be ill-treated by oreigners they must arouse themselves to their shortcomings. It the height of absurdity to talk of war. The elevation of our oral and intellectual status will do more for us than armed orce." Should Japanese in general develop such powers of rational elf-appraisement and such ideals for self-recommendation, they ould not in the long run make bad neighbors to anybody decent.

—Some time ago The Continent expressed the opinion that Dr. . H. Lewis of the Methodist Protestant Church was the most ef- ective advocate of church union in America. But Dr. Lewis has bdicated his crown. He is now fighting the proposed union of his wn church with the United Brethren. He refuses, he says, "to sup- ort a movement that begins with eliminating my church name, y church creed and my church constitution," and protests that he as never "shown a willingness to sacrifice any Methodist Protes- ant principle for sake of union." So, scratched a little, Dr. Lewis roves to be beneath the skin a very ordinary sectarian after all, illing, like many others, to talk church union where the theme rings applause, but not ready to pay for it any price of his pride.

—A Columbus gentleman who describes himself as the minister f a Protestant congregation in the Ohio capital has communicated the public press a statement that following the revival which illy Sunday brought last winter to that city the theater meetings f the Young Men's Christian Association fell off from a thousand verage attendance to, it is estimated, less than 150. But s to this The Continent has direct information that the abbath afternoon theater meetings of the Columbus association ave been in no sense a fixed institution; not more than a half ozen such meetings were held last season prior to Sunday's ap- earance in the city, and only two or three undertaken after his de- arture; the maximum attendance at any of them was less than half the average alleged by this critic and the real average less than one-fifth; and attendance succeeding the campaign was quite equal to attendance beforehand. Moreover, the critic entirely neglects to refer to the upset of all sorts of life in Columbus by last spring's unprecedented flood, which was the direct occasion of the crisis in the association's financial affairs to which he alludes. Telling distorted stories of this kind—especially blaming Sunday for flood results—is a poor way to work out of one's system a dislike for the evangelist's manners and methods. He is not going to be hampered any by that sort of criticism.

—The experiment of maintaining suffragan bishops, which has been tried out in several conspicuous dioceses of the Episcopalian Church in the last three years, has not been working well, we hear. The appointment of such bishops was authorized by the Episcopalian General Convention of 1910 on the idea that overworked diocesans would assign to their suffragans certain groups of parishes or certain special populations for continuous oversight. Such is the system under which suffragans work in the Church of England, and that was the model to which American Episcopalians were then looking. An English suffragan within his prescribed territory is practically as independent as the presiding bishop of the diocese. But it is complained that American bishops do not know how to delegate responsibility. Instead of assigning to their subordinates definite obligations to be taken care of as regular duty, the way of the American prelates is to keep the suffragans on day-by-day orders, sending them hither and thither as passing convenience serves. Sympathetic observers say that their actual position is about equivalent to the status of errand boys. And there are strong intimations that the suffragans are not saintly enough to enjoy it greatly.

—When Kaiser Wilhelm some months ago lectured his naval cadets on the danger of alcohol, it was carefully explained by German bureaucrats that the emperor was denouncing only the excessive use of liquors—that he himself still remained loyal to the fatherland's supposedly harmless beer stein. But late word from Berlin is that Wilhelm has now turned absolute teetotaler. The story is that when his characteristic zeal for German efficiency got really alive to the inroads of alcohol he began to experiment on himself, and soon became convinced that he lost something of his energy and working capacity every time he took a drink of intoxicants. When he drank nothing he worked best. For the thoroughgoing kaiser that was quite sufficient argument. He has "cut out" alcohol utterly, we hear, and partakes of nothing more exhilarating than lemonade and orange juice. It is further stated that just now the emperor's favorite topic of conversation with his intimates is the value of abstinence.

—That aspiration for larger usefulness and a bigger, bolder service which lingers in the soul, pricking it continually with the spur of restless desire—is this from God or is it simply discontented human ambition? Is it vision of divine possibilities or mirage of self-conceit? Thousands of conscientious Christians find themselves tormented with doubts of this sort in their dissatisfaction with the little they seem to accomplish in obscure places of life. But it is part of the discipline of human experience in this present world that there is no sure answer to such questions. For the strengthening of the soul it is required to take its own responsibility in deciding whether the call is from heaven or from its own imagination. Providential indications of many sorts will aid its determination of the matter, but finally the decision to go forward or to stand still must be made in the innermost quiet place of each individual life.

—Dr. Charles Merle d'Aubigne of Paris, though himself so stout a Protestant, cannot resist as a patriotic Frenchman a bit of indignation at the way the Italians who throng the Vatican scorn, flout and misuse France. "France," says he, "gives the papacy most of its scholars and nearly all of its missionaries. But its cardinals are furnished by Italy."

The Church to Her Boys: Greeting!

BY STUART M. CAMPBELL

AND NOW once more comes the end of vacation days. The stream of youth is passing in a torrent of health and happiness up the stairway of school and college, from whence another stream lately passed down to "commence" the serious sharing of the world's work. The church greets youth, and offers both congratulation and good wishes. The chief business of the church is life building. To a degree not always recognized she is succeeding. Occasionally we hear the cry about the youth we lose, and with sorrow we confess the truth. We lose too many, and our hearts are saddened thereby. But on the other hand, the church joyfully presents to the world her youth, consecrated to goodness and dedicated to the service of mankind.

The purpose of the church in relation to the boy is not always clearly defined. Our church workers themselves are somewhat in the dark as to this purpose, and our youth do not always appreciate our efforts to help in the problems of life. It will be good for us both if the intent and desire of the church may be clearly stated, in order that her purpose may be realized with greater success and with mutual joy. I will try to state briefly this purpose.

Helping the Boy to Make a Choice

In the first place the church wishes to help the boy in making the clear distinction between good and evil. She also desires that the boy may choose to serve the one, and avoid the other. The church cannot make a catalogue of the good and the evil. There is no such catalogue. All attempts to make one have failed. But the church meets the boy as he faces the good and evil in the world, and strives to secure his self-dedication to goodness, both for his own sake and for the sake of others. One of the happiest things in the life of our children is early acquaintance with that moral code known as the "ten commandments." It is a remarkable program of duty, arranged in a series of "Thou shalts" and "Thou shalt nots." This arrangement of the commandments may not be quite clear to the growing boy, but a very little help from a teacher will make the arrangement perfectly clear. Even unconsciously, however, the growing boy will come to see through the memorizing of the commandments that some things may be wisely and safely done, and that other things may not be done at all, except at the cost of pain and loss. To learn this beautiful lesson early is to sweeten all one's life. It is the privilege and pleasure of the church to make this general distinction quite clear to the boys under her care. In the way of aids to this, we have our worship, with its sense of God; our preaching, with its high call to life; our hymns, with their refining sentiment; and our Sabbath schools, with their study and fellowship.

It seems to me that every teacher who was privileged to teach the life of Joseph in the international course recently must have rejoiced in the rare chance to present this very point of the difference between good and evil. The fact that Joseph maintained his honor unsullied, and his wholesome view of life, is to be credited to the fact that he had learned at an early age that there were some things he might safely do, and some other things he must not do, except at a high cost to himself and his age. This is exactly the task of the church. In making this appeal the church must exercise wisdom. The appeal for goodness must be made with insistence and with virility. And we must have the accompaniment of noble hymns and great lessons in our Sabbath schools. Mushy hymns and mushy Endeavor topics must be eliminated. Our Sabbath school lessons must be carefully selected. No one surely can question the wisdom of the drift toward graded lessons. In the long run we are bound to come to that.

Making an Appeal for Self-Mastery

In the second place, the church aids the boy by her constant appeal for self-mastery. Sin is very poorly defined in all our catechisms. Sin is really self-defeat—at least this is the definition that should be used in training boys. For help in this important direction the Bible is the most wonderful textbook in the world. The life of Joseph, to which I have referred, is a conspicuous illustration of its value. The life of Daniel is another. These Hebrew youths had a way of making moral distinctions and of registering quick decisions that is most admirable. I think that this is also the phase of Jesus' life that should be used in teaching boys. While there may be some advantages in awakening a respect for Jesus as a miracle worker, or as a divine human personality, there is more to be said about Jesus as a man of choices, as a man who sweetened things for himself and the rest of us by his instant decisions and his conspicuous self-mastery.

It is this sense of mastery that is sorely needed in our world just now. Our mazagines and our newspapers are filled with appeals for the teaching of the mysteries of life to our youth. In view of this appeal, not always delicately made, it is just the time to protest that what is needed is not knowledge but that fine self-respect and self-mastery which is the only sure defense against evil. The church is not so constructed as to be a wise teacher in all the departments of life. Our use of young and untrained teachers makes this impossible. But the church is so constructed as to be the true teacher of youth on the great problem of life itself, and the church may make the appeal for self-respect and self-mastery, and may support this appeal by the use of the finest body of literature in the world. And here again the church must guard her worship and her courses of study. Hymns and lessons in our Sabbath schools must be chosen with a view to strength, and with a view to making the true appeal to life. In his address to Princeton students, just before his retirement, President Wilson said: "Nothing but your own weakness can taint the integrity of manly candor and simple uprightness."

The Obligation to Make Things Better

In the third place, the church aids the boy by her frank insistence upon the boy's duty and respect toward others. The boy is here to make things better. This fine obligation is upon youth, as upon age. Every once in a while in my town there is a spasm over the "boy problem." And after the spasm we all confess that the problem is yet unsolved. I can never quite get away from the conviction that the "boy problem" is to be solved by the boys themselves. While a certain amount of help is to be derived from curfew laws, the main appeal and the main help must be directly from the boys who are trained in our churches. The church must lay upon the boy his obligation to make things better. It is an obligation that meets him in his home. It is on the playground. It goes with him to high school and college. The motive and habit of youth become the achievement of age. What an advantage we have over every other institution in the world in that we may bring our boys into the immediate presence of Jesus in order to make this supreme purpose in life perfectly clear and attractive!

The church heartily greets the hosts of youth passing up the stair way of school and college and wishes them all joy in life. God giv them to see the line that divides the good and the evil, and giv them to make the free choice of the good. God give them self mastery and self-respect! God give them the happiness of sharin the world's problems and of making things better!

Developing the Country Preacher

BY JOHN R. TRETT

WHILE much has been said by pen and voice concerning th rural church, far less has been said about the rura preacher; but to the present writer it seems that we sha speak more to the purpose when we consider them together.

No doubt the problem of the country church is a grave one; an so long as the candidacy for residence and employment in the cit and town is so hotly contested by preachers, the gravity of th problem will increase. But a few plain statements may shed som light on the problem, and a few simple suggestions may point th way to at least a partial solution. We would improve the cond tion of the country church by working on the country preacher.

One great difficulty is in securing the service of ministers wh are willing to devote their time and energies to country work. Fe young men are willing to serve home mission fields either in tow or country; and most preachers of age and experience seek the c to self-supporting churches, much preferring those in the larg towns and cities. Few, indeed, of any age appear to act on t sentiment we used to sing—

> "In a little corner, Lord, in thy vineyard wide,
> Where thou bid'st me work for thee, there I would abide.
> Miracle of saving grace, that thou givest me a place > Anywhere."

Yet there are those who, in the trenches of the hardly contest battlefields, have learned to lean on the great Captain and estima their success by his smile and approval rather than by the applau of the world or the church. To men of this spirit the country church must look in this time of her dire need.

But we think there is a plain and natural reason why men of energy and ambition shrink from the country church. It is largely because the church and the work are considered obscure; and an ambitious preacher does not want to be buried from the notice and appreciation of the church at large. We grant that the rural church does not bury its pastor in obscurity, but church courts and field agents usually recognize as fitted only for that kind of work the man who engages in it. He becomes graded by the obscurity of his field and the smallness of his salary. And being thus graded and classed, he finds it almost impossible to get a call to a church whose pastor is held in higher esteem—unless he proves to be a genius, which few can hope to be.

Nor are the facts overdrawn in these statements. Easy observation shows us that stated clerks, temporary clerks, chairmen of important committees, moderators and commissioners to the higher courts of the church are usually selected from those whose pastoral fields are more conspicuous and whose salaries are larger. To some of these preferences there are exceptions where rotation is observed and members become eligible by lapse of time; but even then, if two or more members are equally eligible, the one holding the more prominent field is generally preferred.

Living thus and working in his rural field, the country preacher is tempted to undertake the almost impossible and seek a change of field in hope of gaining his share of recognition among his fellows; and the country people, seeing that their pastor is kept in the background, suppose him less talented than the town preacher —unless they accidentally obtain a comparison—and so discount and discourage him. With this double discouragement and discount, half the strength is taken from the preacher. This is not "improving the condition of the rural church by working on its preacher."

Another relation in which the country preacher is overlooked is almost humorous. In considering the interests of the country church in the church courts, the city pastor comes forward to lead the discussion. Presbytery and synod are asked to listen to his proposed solution of the weighty problem, while the man who works in and for the country church and people is passed by as not being able to express an opinion concerning his own field. Recently we heard such an address where the only solution offered was that candidates intended for country work should not receive a seminary training. It was claimed that seminaries only fit men for city work. Whether this is complimentary to country people or to seminaries, I express no opinion; nor will I try to say whether any preacher's seminary training really excuses him from the duty of preaching Christ's gospel to the people of the farm, the ranch, the mine or the lumber camp; but we think we can suggest a plan that might help a little if put into practice.

We shall improve the condition of the rural church if we encourage its self-appreciation. This can be done by showing our own appreciation of such church and its pastor. Let the pastor be recognized on an equality with the pastors of more prominent churches. Is not the pastor of the city church, regardless of age or experience, usually chosen before him? Reverse this matter for a while. Let the country church and its pastor have the preference for as long a time as the city church and its pastor have been preferred. In addition to doing simple justice this will be a valuable experiment to watch for results.

Then, too, in discussing the rural church problem, let the rural church be represented by its own pastor or someone who knows by close acquaintance and actual experience what the needs and difficulties are, and who has the best opportunity for judging of its possibilities. Of course let us also have the wisest judgment of the city man, for "in the multitude of counselors there is wisdom."

When the country people see that their church and pastor are ranked as of equal importance with the city church and its pastor, they will take pride in their own, and this will quicken their energies and deepen their devotion. Thus, in large part, will the problem of the country church be solved.

When Preacher Played Chauffeur to Priest

A Little Study of a Pennsylvania Community Where Progressive Ideals Prevail—An Experience in Optimism

BY WILLIAM T. ELLIS, Editor Afield of The Continent

View of One of Wellsboro's Well Kept Streets

"TALKING of tolerance, you should see our little town of Wellsboro. There is such a spirit of tolerance in that place, even among the churches, that when the Roman Catholic priest wanted to go forty miles across the country to a wedding, and could not find a chauffeur for his new automobile, the Presbyterian pastor drove his machine for him. If you want to find the real American spirit, go to Wellsboro."

So spoke E. A. VanValkenberg, editor of The Philadelphia North American. A man is permitted to talk proudly of his old home, and more than once I had heard Mr. VanValkenberg forget matters of public concern while he grew enthusiastic over the remote Pennsylvania community wherein he was reared. Personally, I had never heard of Wellsboro before, even though it is the county seat of Tioga county, along the upper edge of Pennsylvania, where the principal products are lumber and men.

That story seemed to promise well, so I began to look up Wellsboro. When airships get to doing a regular passenger business the town will be easy of access, and even now it is worth the roundabout journey, for Jerusalem, which is "beautiful for situation," is not so highly favored by nature as is this old settlement amid the hills, where nature and man have conspired to produce a typical American community.

Prosperity, order, refinement and progress are written all over Wellsboro. The Wellsboro spirit was well expressed by one resident, who said, "No man has ever gone away from Wellsboro and made a name and a place for himself in the big world who has not wanted to come back to the old town to end his days." The spirit of the place is embodied in the incident related by Mr. VanValkenberg, which turned out to be even better worth the telling than had been intimated.

The pastor of the Presbyterian church is Rev. P. H. Hershey, a jolly, Friar Tuck sort of person, who is "hail fellow well met" with everybody; and who radiates the gospel of good nature seven days a week. He talks with a Pennsylvania German tang, and has the hard-headedness that goes with his birthright.

Hospitably he was driving me about the hills surrounding Wellsboro in the machine of an obliging parishioner when I approached the story of the time he played chauffeur to the Catholic priest. So entirely reasonable and normal and commonplace did the incident appear to him, he seemed puzzled that I should think it worth telling. The noteworthy aspect of the affair, in his mind, was the spirited race he had made with a high-power machine that had tried to block the road of the churchly automobile, which was running to the music of wedding bells.

Father Richard Jordan is priest of a wide parish, of which his Wellsboro church is but a part. One day he had a call to perform a wedding in Corning, New York, forty miles from Wellsboro, over the hills. He had recently secured an automobile, but he had not yet learned to drive it. Casually, he mentioned to his friend Hershey, the Presbyterian pastor, that he would be obliged to secure a chauffeur to take him across the mountains for this wedding. There is nothing doctrinal or ecclesiastical about an automobile, and Mr. Hershey, who knows all about automobiles, but never owned one, volunteered his services as a fraternal courtesy. So before 7 o'clock the next morning they set out across the border, with only two hours in which to make the run, and 460 pounds of preacher aboard, for each man weighs 230 pounds.

Here comes the part of the story that interests Mr. Hershey: "On a narrow highway, such as this, we caught up with a fellow with a six-cylinder machine, who would not give us the road. When once we tried to pass him as the road widened a bit, he put on his power and kept ahead of us until the road narrowed again. I watched my chance and slipped up alongside of that driver so silently that he did not know we were coming, until he saw our front wheels. Then he put on full speed, but it was too late. We had the impetus. Father Jordan says the speedometer registered forty-eight miles an hour for a while. I was too busy to watch the speedometer myself, but I know we got ahead of that fellow, and kept ahead of him, and reached Corning in plenty of time for the wedding.

"While Father Jordan was attending the wedding I ran over to Elmira, which is only eighteen miles away, with a good road. I came back and we had dinner together, and then Father Jordan proposed that we bowl a few games, for he is quite a bowler. He is a strong bowler, but"—and here Hershey shook like the "bowlful of jelly" in the rhyme of Old Saint Nick—"I beat him seven games, and he had to pay for them all!"

Rev. P. H. Hershey

If this were an article about Mr. Hershey, I should tell at some length of his vacation plans, which are to stay at home for a month and build an automobile with his own hands, on entirely new lines. He has some radical ideas about automobile construction, and he drew the plans for me, and explained how a revolutionary automobile, weighing but 500 pounds and costing but $500, could be made. He is what is termed in the shops "a practical man," having made the cabinets for the communion sets which the Presbyterian Board of Publication now sells, and also new designs for hymn boards which the same house now puts out. To him it seems perfectly simple for a man to construct with his own hands, and the help of certain standard parts, a new automobile.

However, this story is not particularly about Pastor Hershey, but rather about Wellsboro, and the American spirit which it embodies. Instead of an overchurched town, filled with sectarianism, I discovered an extraordinary mood of tolerance and cooperation, which is so well established as to be taken for granted. When I visited the beautiful St. Paul's Protestant Episcopal church it was with Mr. Hershey as my guide. Then the Episcopal rector accompanied us on an inspection of the Presbyterian church. By a chance remark let fall it appeared that the rector has at times worshiped with the Presbyterian congregation.

Presbyterian Church at Wellsboro, of Which Mr. Hershey Is Pastor

There are four Protestant churches in town, and these stand together in all civic matters. Last winter the pastors jointly ran a lyceum course. This summer they have stood behind the circuit chautauqua, which visited Wellsboro. In all civic matters the Catholic priest is one with the Protestant pastors. Father Jordan's predecessor, Rev. Joseph O'Toole, was the first priest ever to deliver a baccalaureate address to the graduating class of the Wellsboro high school. There is no parochial school in town. While Father O'Toole was rector of St. Peter's the veteran pastor of the Baptist church, Rev. N. L. Reynolds, and his wife celebrated their golden wedding. The local congregation and the ministers of the town shared in the festivities, and one of the addresses of felicitation was made inside the Baptist church by Father O'Toole.

This may seem incredible to those who know how deep and wide in most communities is the chasm between the Protestant pastors and the Roman Catholic priests, yet I was assured in Wellsboro that Father Jordan even officiated at the funeral of a well known Mason, and had given him burial in consecrated ground. "It's the Wellsboro spirit," was the succinct explanation given by my informant.

Somehow or other, this little town of 3,000 inhabitants has developed a conquering civic spirit which is more than mere provincial pride. They are proud of Wellsboro; of its lines of stately elms, and of its three-mile boulevard of vitrified brick; of its spacious, comfortable homes, and of its good community housekeeping. Their patriotism is real and wide and deeply rooted; during the civil war Tioga county sent a greater proportion of its men to the front than any other county in the union, and more than fifty veterans went from Wellsboro to the jubilee reunion at Gettysburg. Whether it is a heritage from the Morrises and the Baches, who founded the town, or from the New England settlers, or from some dominant personality of the early days, I cannot say; but the fact remains that patriotism and breadth, self-culture and democratic neighborliness, are to a remarkable degree earmarks of this prosperous community.

A dozen or more lawyers have gone out from the shadows of the old courthouse to serve in the state legislature, in the halls of Congress and on the supreme bench of Pennsylvania. One of the Morrises became a bishop. No writer of note has yet been produced, but when he does arise Wellsboro, like Concord, will admirably fill the conception of a literary shrine. I found a new public library under way; an opera house owned by the community—the bequest of a public-spirited citizen, as is also the spacious park, which is Wellsboro's pride. Forty per cent of all the graduates of high school go to college. Mr. Hershey mentioned that at the reception given to Mrs. Hershey and himself, on his first Christmas in Wellsboro, there were present thirty-three college students or recent graduates.

I should like to claim as a cause of the Wellsboro spirit what is only a consequence thereof, namely, the fact that this Presbyterian church of about 300 members has what it calls "The Continent fund," by which a hundred copies of The Continent are supplied every week to the members of the church. This fact, too, Mr. Hershey takes in the most casual fashion, giving the credit to one of his broad-visioned officials. It was desired to widen the horizon of the church members and to interest them in the world work of the kingdom. So the shortest, surest way to effect this, in the judgment of pastor and session, was to indoctrinate the membership with The Continent spirit.

That brains, bigness, breadth and the other great qualities that are regarded as synonymous with Americanism are by no means confined to the cities is attested by this little community amid the hills of Tioga county, which has them in such manifest measure; and whose sons, however far away they may roam, ever regard Wellsboro as their heart's haven and home.

If Pastor Hershey, or any other mechanical genius, ever invents a "seeing America airship," this remote town should find a place on the itinerary; for it represents America at its best. A visit to Wellsboro is an experience in optimism.

Should Protestant Ministers Marry?

BY MARION HARLAND

"Marion Harland" has been observing and writing more years than have most authors, and she has been roused to wrath by noting the comparatively small salaries paid to many ministers of the gospel. Inadequate compensation, she believes, amounts to an indirect prohibition of marriage by ministers. Other articles by Marion Harland will appear in The Continent from time to time

PAUL, the itinerant missionary, contends stoutly for his right to lead about a wife (inferentially, if it should please him so to do), quoting in support of the claim the example of Cephas, etc. That the right was admitted without cavil in the early church we gather from further remarks relative to the wives of bishops and deacons.

Martin Luther gave unequivocal testimony to his views upon the subject of a married clergy by wedding a nun who had, like himself, abjured the conventual life. From that day onward the theory of the protesting church has not wavered with respect to the right and practice. Suggestions from irresponsible sources to the effect that he wars most effectively who carries light impedimenta are frowned down when directed churchward. An unwritten law encourages, if it does not enjoin upon, the young minister to take unto himself a wife betimes as part of his equipment for the home or foreign field.

The consensus of parish or community is that the ministry of reconciliation—the noblest of what are classed as the "learned professions"—is involved with social and domestic obligations that pertain to no other calling. For the right discharge of these, we are informed by the church at large and by individual members, a married man is better fitted than a bachelor. The minister's wife is his helpmeet in an especially sacred sense. The Christian home ruled by the united twain is an object lesson no congregation should lack.

So far, so fair! From the Protestant viewpoint the theory is flawless, the world and human nature being not many degrees from the status of Paul's times. Will the reader who is supposed to be versed in the Scriptures bear with me when I ask him to read as for the first time the advice in detail given by the chiefest of apostles to his "own son in the faith" called through his instrumentality to the bishopric of Ephesus?

"A bishop, then, must be blameless, the husband of one wife, vigilant, sober, of good behavior, given to hospitality, apt to teach; not given to wine; no striker; not greedy of filthy lucre, but patient; not a brawler; not covetous; one that ruleth well his own house, having his children in subjection with all gravity (for if a man know not how to rule his own house, how shall be take care of the house of God?). Not a novice, lest being lifted up with pride he fall into the condemnation of the devil. Moreover, he must have a good report of them which are without, lest he fall into reproach and the snare of the devil."

The whole epistle is a masterpiece of sound common-sensible counsel, informed with paternal tenderness. Student and licentiate of the twentieth century can find nowhere a better manual of faith and practice. Yet we catch ourselves speculating as to the probabilities of Timothy's marriage. There is no fatherly word for the bride among the greetings to Aquila and Priscilla and other friends in the second letter.

However this may have been, the picture of the well ordered parsonage and the portrait of the master thereof have not been improved upon by modern writers upon clerical life and clerical manners. Happy is that parish that hath such!

As to the Cost of Living in Ephesus

We have no allusion to the high price of foodstuffs in Ephesus, yet practical Paul does not omit the truth that human life requires material sustenance.

Harking back, once and again, to the Mosaic injunction, "Thou shalt not muzzle the ox when he treadeth out the corn," he declares plainly: "The laborer is worthy of his hire," and "They which preach the gospel shall live by the gospel." Lest there may be some misapprehension as to the source from whence this same "living" is to come, we are admonished in another epistle:

"Let him that is taught in the word communicate to him that teacheth in all good things."

Why multiply texts to prove what is theoretically a foregone conclusion? The obligation of the church to provide for those who minister unto them in holy things has been recognized in all ages. The right of the minister to marry is as frankly acknowledged. In a majority of churches the expediency of his marriage is openly urged. Almost as binding in civilized communities is the demand that the pastor shall be an educated gentleman, and his wife a woman of culture and refinement. Paul sets the pace here, too. "He must have a good report of them which are without." The parish must never be ashamed of him or of his family. Have you ever thought of the deep meaning wrapped up in the phrase "given to hospitality"? We express it in part when we say that "the minister keeps an open house."

To condense the requisitions: He must live in a house large enough to accommodate wayfaring brethren and their families; to entertain church societies and "delegates." He must set a decent table; his children must be as well clad as their playfellows and attend good schools. The parsonage is a city set on a hill, and the walls might be of glass, so open to the eye of all men and women are the movements and manners of the inmates.

Yet let me quote from a paper issued by the church sustentation society of a leading denomination in America and abroad:

"Every minister who is duly installed over a church and congregation of our communion is promised a 'competent worldly maintenance that he may be free from worldly cares and avocations.'" It is significant, I interject here, that the word "avocations" is used in its legitimate meaning: "The act of calling aside, or diverting from one's proper calling or business."

All the Time and Energies of the Laborer Secured

"The competent worldly maintenance" is to secure all the energies and time of the laborer for the vineyard he is hired to tend. Your mill hand "knocks off" your work at 5 or 6 o'clock, and if he be a wide awake fellow, he turns many an honest penny during the evenings and half holidays. The bookkeeper may, without let or hindrance, write up other ledgers than your own at home. There are scores of ways by which the professed hireling may eke out his wages. Physicians, lawyers and merchants ask nobody's permission as to the employment of their spare hours.

"One man, in his time, plays many parts"—and perchance quadruples his income. Our ordained and installed Ixion is bound to the wheel of his "sacred office" until his "period of usefulness is at an end." (O, familiar and fateful phrase!)

We have, then, a finely tempered instrument of the most approved pattern, which is not to be diverted to any use other than that designated in the contract. The natural sequence would seem to be that a fair and equitable price should be paid for it.

In reply, I append the comment of another writer upon this topic:

"There is bitter humor in the Form of Government just quoted when the 'competent worldly maintenance' is a third less than a mechanic's wage."

The bitterness is made pungent and the humor of the situation lessened by the statement drawn from the circular letter put forth by the secretary of a ministerial relief association connected with an influential and, in the main, wealthy communion:

"The average salary paid to our ministers in the active pastorate is $600 per annum."

Of course he cannot support life upon that unless he be a bachelor and his residence be in a mining camp or a mountain region where the barest necessaries of life must suffice to supply his wants. If a family man must get along upon less than a mechanic's wage, he is helped out by donation parties and occasional boxes of cast-off clothing from richer churches. In plain English, he and his are paupers as essentially as if they were lodged in the almshouse.

Said a rich woman to me with the air of one who, by her deeds of mercy, makes her calling and election sure: "I always give liberally to the church and other worthy charities. You know, 'Whoso giveth to the poor lendeth to the Lord.' As I often say to my husband, 'We can't ask better security.'"

"Church and other charities!" That is oftener the tone of the rank and file of Protestant church members than we are willing to admit. All that they contribute to the pastor's support over and above the meager stipend we have indicated is set down to the Lord's account—and on the debit side of the sheet. Interest is compounded according to a system patented by themselves.

Philanthropists write and declaim from the rostrum against the penuriousness of a government that pays its armed defenders a "beggarly pittance." The soldier grumbles less loudly in the knowledge that half pay awaits him at the close of his term of service and a pension for his family at his death. Our minister may be turned out of office many years earlier than his blue-coated brother, and absolutely penniless so far as any provision made by the church goes.

By sailing closely to the wind, he may have kept his family in food and clothes. He has not been able to save a dollar even from the stray checks and greenbacks doled out to him patronizingly by friend and parishioner. In his most prosperous estate, he and his thrifty helpmeet have achieved only shabby gentility. For the remainder of their days they drop the tattered cloak of gentility and settle down to the unequivocal squalor of confessed poverty.

And this at an age when his college mates are touring the continent in their motor cars and eating the plum cake of carelessness!

Do not plead that the church, as a whole, is ignorant of the enormity of this injustice. The church does not concern itself with improvident families unless they belong to the "interesting poor"—the class for which we build settlement houses and association halls and welfare work homes.

If poor young ministers will marry poor girls they must take what is coming to the educated improvident. After all, the outspoken old minister was not so far wrong as we are inclined to think—or say—who advised the graduating class of theologues to pick out wives who are "pious and have a little property." It is fast becoming fashionable to deprecate the marriage of ministers who have nothing but their salaries to depend upon. Careful students of varied economies do not hesitate to point out the superior efficiency of Roman Catholic missionaries, and to attribute their success to their celibacy. There is no disguising the fact that wives and children are impedimenta that cannot be cast aside when duty calls to another field. These are spokesmen whose deliverances are not indorsed by the church. On the contrary, we still swear audibly by Paul and content our consciences with spasmodic relief of suffering consequent upon ill-advised wedlock.

Is it possible that underlying the apparent apathy lurks the belief that more and better work is accomplished by the celibate than by the married minister? That, instead of overt advocacy of a tenet that might scandalize old-time Christians and cause the enemy to blaspheme, we foresee that the end will be as surely gained by slow starvation?

How Can Ugly Facts Be Explained?

Before I, who write thus, am accused of treason to my faith and church, look the ugly facts square in the face and say upon what other hypothesis they may be explained away. Protestants are not niggardly in other directions. There is hardly a church in any city that does not expend more upon music in one year than it subscribes in three years for "ministerial relief and the ministers' widows' fund." A single memorial window that is criticised as a blotch upon the wall of the sanctuary costs treble the sum asked for by the incumbent who demurs in spirit at the task of soliciting funds for the "sustentation" of his needy brethren. Maybe because an echo of the old epitaph sounds through the chambers of his soul: "As we are now, so must you be!"

Denis Wortman, D. D., the able secretary of the Society for Ministerial Relief of the Reformed (Dutch) Church in America, has a pertinent and feeling word upon the unwillingness of the clergyman to press home upon the hearts of his hearers the plain truth of the attitude of the church upon this subject:

"Do you know that it does grind upon us to be asking help for men in our own profession? It seems to humiliate! It seems to lower the dignity of the ministry! Possibly with some it seems to bring our sacred calling into contempt. We are exposing poverties many of our clergy are painfully endeavoring to conceal for the Master's sake."

From a report compiled by the same writer I extract statistics that should open the eyes of all but the willfully blind:

"The disabled ministers' fund, started in 1854, is for relief of disabled ministers and their widows and orphans in honorable need. Assistance is unfortunately limited, by want of funds, to $200 a year; and may be given only as recommended by classis, and year by year. We seek larger annual offerings and worthier endowment, so we be not limited to such miserly amounts. The annual offering has now increased from $3,900 to $8,535; which we are bound to raise to $10,000, and keep it there, at the least. It has an endowment of $114,000, which we must raise to $250,000 at least, for which we ask and entreat large gifts and legacies from the rich. Twenty-nine ministers and thirty-six widows are now enjoying this relief. Meanwhile the number of annuitants increases from year to year, and will continue to do so with increase of prices of living and the earlier retirement of ministers from active service."

There is pregnant meaning in that last clause. It is set forth, without apology for the bald statement, in a government report issued by the Board of Education. It is headed boldly by the journal copying the report:

"NUMBER WHO SEEK PROTESTANT PULPITS CONSTANTLY DECREASING"

"A remarkable decrease in the number of Protestant ministers graduated from the universities of the country is shown in a current report of the United States bureau of education.

"'It is plain,' says the report, 'that educated men no longer seek the cloth as they did when the nation was younger. It may mean much or little that the percentage of ministers among the graduates of typical colleges has declined from a proportion of 60 or 70 per cent to less than 10 per cent.'

"An examination of the figures collected at the close of the nineteenth century from thirty-seven representative colleges discloses the fact that the ministry takes between 5 and 6 per cent of the university graduates, which marks the lowest point for that profession during the two and one-half centuries of American college history."

Put side by side with the humiliating figures herein tabulated, the certainty that the decrease in the number of candidates for work in a fast widening field, white for the harvest, is as well known to the aforesaid Protestant church as the simplest fact in natural history, and that it does not incite it to amendment of the wrong which has brought it about—and what deduction can be drawn from knowledge and apathy? As a body, the church is determined not to maintain married men in the ministry. Actions, more eloquent than protestations, give the lie to the professed approval of home sketched by Paul and nominally indorsed by professors of the Protestant faith.

"Freezing Out" the Married Clergy

It is a favorite trick of business and political organizations to "freeze out" unpopular members rather than eject them openly. A church that affects to condemn papal principles and usages is quietly freezing out the married clergy of its own faith. Without abating one jot or one tittle of belief in the obligation to spread the gospel of salvation to earth's remotest bounds, we insist, practically, that such work must be done by a man who is willing to resign the joys of home, the companionship of wife and child, and to bring personal requirements down to hermit fare and squatter's hut, while he is adjudged capable of discharging "acceptably" the duties of the sacred office. It has passed into a proverb that the pastor crosses the dead line at 50. His hoary head is disgrace and displacement instead of glory.

"We kinder lost our relish for our preacher," said the deacon of a colored church, "so we done sent in his resignation."

The same is done in effect yearly in hundreds of Protestant churches made up of his superiors in race and education. Freezing him out is equivalent to sending in his resignation. If he be celibate, he may have taken out a "limited insurance policy" upon his life and scraped together the premium year by year. He has timed it to fall due at 50, or thereabouts, and (if he be single) he may have enough to keep the life in him for the rest of his weary, because idle, days.

The tale is trite, but none the less pitiful because it is so often told.

Sensational newspapers set "scareheads" above announcements of the rapidly thinning ranks of the church militant. The church is itself apparently content to let the logic of events demonstrate the necessity of a celibate clergy if the evangelization of the world is to go on.

The Retort Innocent but Cutting

A Scandinavian witness, says The Saturday Evening Post, was being examined in a case in a Minnesota town where the defendant was accused of breaking a plate glass window with a large stone. He was pressed to tell how big the stone was, but he could not explain.

"Was it as big as my fist?" asked the nervous judge, who had taken over the examination from the lawyers in the hope of getting some results.

"It ban bigger," the Swede replied.

"Was it as big as my two fists?"

"It ban bigger."

"Was it as big as my head?"

"It ban about as long, but not so thick," replied the witness, amid the laughter of the court.

Cap'n Quin's Wife Hunt

BY CLARA NEWHALL FOGG

"IF I HAD him here now I most know I'd say yes; 'tis terrible backaching work picking cranb'ries, and he offered so polite Anyway, I've got a good mess and I'll rest me a spell before I jog along." Cynthia Collins straightened her bent form and looked ruefully at her pricked and reddened fingers. Standing there in the cranberry bog, in her black and white calico and dark apron, her brown hair smoothly parted above her flushed face, Cynthia looked like some belated bloom of autumn in the sober glory of a mature blossoming time. Her dark eyes burned inwardly with a happy fervor. She loved the fall with all its wealth of little shy growing things and she liked to feel the cranberries as they slipped, a flame of color, through her fingers. Taking up her linen sunbonnet she tied the strings under her chin.

"'Twill hide my sunburn, but I never could abide anything on my head when I'm working. For the land sakes! Who's that coming full chisel right through the pasture lot?"

She watched the wavering figure that tacked uncertainly toward her. "Why, if 'tain't Cap'n Quin Greenlow! He never could walk on dry land. Always weaves round as if he's on board ship. He'll spoil his grass, but seeing 'tis his, he can take the blame."

Cynthia laughed a little as she walked slowly over to the ledge just beyond the bog where a bunch of sumac shrubs with their brown-red cones looked like ghosts of the summer time drearily rustling their dead leaves. She leaned back against the ledge as the captain came up.

"Set down and cool off," she advised. "You look warm and 'tis pretty hot for September."

"I've had news that sort o' stirred me," panted Cap'n Quin, wiping his face with a handkerchief bordered with red and blue anchors that attracted Cynthia's attention.

"Ain't that something new?" she asked, smiling at the glorified border.

Cap'n Quin looked at her beseechingly. He was a tall, freshcolored man, with honest blue eyes and a trick of blushing. He colored redly.

"Don't laugh. 'Tis a present. She give it to me for my birthday." He waved the handkerchief airily toward the village.

"Who?"

"Marie Lancaster."

"You mean Maria?"

"Marie," corrected Cap'n Quin. "She saw me set sail for the village this morning and hailed me. You forgot I had a birthday," he reproached.

"I ain't saying." Cynthia was noncommittal. "You don't need anything more after that. Hope it won't wash out streaked. 'Twill be a sight if the colors run. Seems to me she's changed dreadful sudden from plain Maria to Marie. Guess she's taking notice. I saw she had red roses on her hat Sunday."

Taking Her Mind Off Her Troubles

"She's got a white dress with red posies on it, a gold watch and di'mond pin and some long pearl earrings. She showed 'em to me and wanted me to call her Marie. Sort o' notional, ain't she? S'pose it takes her mind from her troubles," Cap'n Quin spoke tolerantly.

"Troubles!" sniffed Cynthia indignantly. "Looks all broken up with grief, don't she? The way she shifted from black to lavender and now to white it don't appear she's so terrible broken-hearted."

"She's got another rig, too, all rosy bloom. She's togged up in it today and asked me how I liked it. 'Tis real tasty. Say, Cynthy, what makes her hair so much yellower than 'twas—all afluff and curly? When I spoke of it she allowed 'twas a kind o' slow fever she'd had since Abel died and it made her hair change. It used to be sort o', sort o'——" stammered Cap'n Quin.

"Gray, you mean," stated Cynthia calmly. "Thanks be, I ain't had to think up any fever to excuse mine. It's the same as 'twas years ago."

"'Twas always terrible pretty, your hair was, Cynthy." Cap'n Quin pushed back her sunbonnet and touched the brown locks shyly. Cynthia stirred away from him, but she was not displeased.

"'Twas that and talking with Maria—Marie—that made me late gitting along. She wanted to know about it and I had to stop, when all the time I meant to be on hand to help you pick them cranb'ries. You ain't strong enough to do things like that. Ain't you ever going to marry me, Cynthy?"

"We'd git tired of each other fust ground hop, and seeing you think so well of me now," laughed Cynthia, "I guess I won't risk your changing your opinion."

"I've asked you every month this past year," continued Cap'n Quin, doggedly, "and I ain't one to give up easy. What is it you're so skittish of? I know I've got considerable many outs, but I'd try to be a good husband," he urged.

Not Natural to Have a Man Under Foot

"So you would, Quin, so you would," admitted Cynthia kindly. "Only I ain't ever got the marrying mood and I've lived so long alone 'twouldn't seem natural to have a man round under foot. Now tell me your news."

"You won't feel int'rested, seeing you don't take to the marrying idea," sighed Cap'n Quin. "But 'tis this. My old Uncle Solomon that's lived out in Frisco so long passed sudden with pneumonia and left his all to me. I'm next o' kin and there's a good house, with heaps of furniture and things he collected, knocking about as he did. They want me to come soon, as the lawyer writ that the one in charge ain't very trustworthy and 'twill be be better for me to go.

"I kind o' thought," confessed Cap'n Quin, "that mebbe I could persuade you to take me and we'd go together on our honeymoon v'yage."

"You don't think money and a house would make a mite of difference if so being I hankered to marry, do you, Quin? You ought to know me better. You just go hunt some good woman and tell her how ye feel inclined to marry and you won't have any trouble."

"But I want you," Cap'n Quin persisted. "I don't want to wife hunt any farther. There ain't anybody like you for me, Cynthy."

"You'll find other women enough sight better than me," protested Cynthia, secretly much flattered at this devotion.

"I dunno who to hunt," admitted the captain despondently. "I've had you in mind so long it comes hard to look anywhere else." He thought a moment as he helped Cynthia pick over the cranberries.

"How'd Sarah Anne Titcomb do? She always looks kind o' fixed up, and I've heard say she was a good cook. She don't look over strong, though. She writes pretty poetry stuff."

Cynthia put down the pail of cranberries with a thump.

"She's strong enough to gallivant all over town when there's a moving-picture show to take in or a ball game to tend. As for her cooking, mebbe she can git a meal's vittles, but I have my doubts. Ever been in her kitchen?"

"Can't say I have."

"I ain't one to gossip, but seeing 'tis you, I don't want you to throw yourself away. Last time I called, right after she married 'Bijah, and when he wuz coming down with that cough that proved his come-uppance, she set there with a rose in her hair and a white tucked muslin on, a writing poetry for The Morning Glow. 'Twas early in the forenoon, too, and I wish you could have seen that kitchen table! No oilcloth on, and all covered with dirty dishes, and the spider, all grease, had burned a hole right through. She laughed, not a bit put out, and said she had a pome thought jest as she took up the fried potatoes. No, you don't want her, Quin."

"Guess not, if that's the cut of her jib. What say to 'Nervy Gay? She seems real innocent and childlike. Told me t'other day that she loved cooking better than anything else and did all the housekeeping at home. I'd like to have one o' that kind watching for me when I come home of an afternoon, ready to wait on me and git my supper. Would she do, Cynthy?"

Worse than a Widow That's Taking Notice

"Have you gone plumb out of your senses? Don't you know that one thing wuss than a widow that's taking notice is an old maid that's losing her holt? 'Nervy Gay ain't an ounce of wit to the pound, and cooking, my land! She brought me in some cake once and allowed she made it, but when I asked her for the recipe she'd forgot. I drew it out of her that she got the cooking bowl, her ma beat the eggs and mixed the cake, 'Nervy greased the tin and put in the paper. Then her ma stuck it in the oven and baked it. That's how she cooks. You don't want any 'Nervy Gay waiting to git your supper, now you mark my words."

"There's Susie Patch. She can dressmake. She told me so when I went there for a book she wanted me to read."

"What might that book be?" demanded Cynthia.

"'Sweethearts and Wives.' Cap'n Quin flushed. "I ain't had time to read it yet."

THE HOME COUNCIL

"To Be Perfectly Frank with You"

BY ETHEL COLSON

"SOMETIME when I know you well enough," said one girl to another, with a winning smile, "I'm going to tell you something about that frock you have on."

"You never will know me well enough, my dear," was the quiet answer, accompanied by a corresponding smile that removed from the words all possible sting. "When anyone begins a conversation in that manner I know something disagreeable is promised. And since I've got to wear this frock for some time longer, I don't want to like it less than I do."

Girl No. 1 meant kindly. The frock was not becoming, therefore she wished the wearer, a new but already dear friend, to know it, in order that the offending garment might be laid aside. Girl No. 2, however, was wise in refusing to hear the implied criticism, since the frock must still be worn.

This little incident naturally gives rise to the question, When, where and how should one be "perfectly frank" in regard to such matters? And why has the opening, "To be perfectly frank with you——" come to premise something unpleasant almost as certainly as "To tell you the truth——" or "My dear, I speak for your own good"?

There are times when entire frankness alone can meet the demands of a situation; when, even at the risk of seeming disagreeable, the honest friend must make a virtue of verbal detail. But such times do not come often, and the habit of being "perfectly frank" in the dealing out of unsolicited and irritating facts is one greatly to be deprecated.

All questions of popularity aside, it is not a kindly or courteous thing to go about the world making others sadder; for the trouble or trifle which, since it can't be cured, must be endured with all the courage and serenity possible seldom is lightened by the overfree use of exceedingly "plain" speech. The girl who remarks, "I don't like to tell you, dear, but your complexion is not at its best today," or "It may not seem kind to say it, but I do wonder why you will wear pink!" may be sure that in so remarking she lessens the day's sunshine for the object of her possibly well meant but surely ill-considered audible thought.

If an unpleasant or discouraging or rebuking word is absolutely necessary, say it, by all means, and get the difficulty over. But don't, as you fain would build up rather than destroy, as you fain would rank yourself with the helpful rather than the depressing forces of life, don't indulge in the "To be perfectly frank with you——" excuse for unnecessarily uttering unpleasant things.

Baby Eskimo Defies Mother

Dr. S. K. Hutton declares that there is no such thing as punishment in an Eskimo household, and tells, in illustration, a story of a small boy he saw slipping and climbing down among the rocks along the beach, in open defiance of his mother's commands.

He was a sturdy little fellow, and quite a baby, says Dr. Hutton in "Among the Eskimos of Labrador." I judged him to be about 2 years old, certainly not more than 3, but as he was clad in the dignity of ridiculous little trousers, I must speak of him as a boy. He seemed to have escaped from his mother, and to be making for the beach on an adventure of his own; and when I looked toward the line of houses I saw a young woman standing at one of the doors and calling to him.

"Kaigit! kaigit!" (Come back!) she shouted. The child took no notice at all.

"Kaigit, ernera!" (Come back, my son!) cried the mother.

This time the child looked round, but he went steadily on, barking his little knees against the sharp rock points and tumbling into holes in his hurry. "Nia! nia!" he screamed.

I half expected the mother to come and fetch him after that, for "Nia!" is anything but polite; it was the equal of a very defiant "Shan't" that the child shouted at his mother. She took no notice; she was beaten, and accepted the situation, and turned back into the house to go on with her work.

Meanwhile I was interested in the doings of the small Eskimo boy; there was some grim purpose in his little mind, and I stayed to see the finish of the play. He scrambled on until he came to a dog that lay sunning itself behind a stone. Very likely it was one of his father's sledge dogs against which he had a grievance, for he caught it fearlessly by the scruff of the neck and beat it with his tiny fists. The dog, great, powerful brute, could have eaten the boy whole; but it made no resistance, simply cowering and whining under the little patting blows. Having fulfilled his purpose, the boy administered a last parting smack and started on his journey homeward.

I followed the little fellow to his home and found his mother busily brushing the snow off him and smiling with pride in her hardy little son. He was disobedient, but what cared she? He was growing strong and fearless; some day he would be able to drive a team of dogs and paddle a kaiak, and hunt the deer and seals and walrus. He was a proper Eskimo boy.

BITS BY THE WAY

WON BY GAY RIBBON

If your little girl is unruly, or disobedient, or generally hard to manage, try giving her, instead of more rules of conduct, warning or even loving admonitions, something to live up to. Such a course has wrought one miracle.

The other day I went into a large day nursery just as the kindergarten children were assembling in the dining room for their lunch. In they poured in all degrees of tidiness and untidiness, but with the little nursery costume, slipped on every morning when the children came from home, concealing some of the most painful evidences of poverty. Suddenly a small, curly-headed Italian girl came to an abrupt halt in the middle of the room, drew up her skirt, plunged a brown hand down into a much-darned stocking and hauled out the tattered remains of a once splendid wide, red satin ribbon—a whole yard of it. Balancing on one foot, she lifted a small knee, smoothed out the ribbon lovingly on it, wound her tattered treasure around her neck and marched to her place at the head of one of the low tables, entirely unconscious of my amused observance.

"That?" said the kindergarten teacher in answer to my question. "Oh, that's Annie! Yes, this has been a daily performance ever since the ribbon became too disreputable to wear on her hair. I forbade her to use it that way, and so, as a compromise, she carries it in her stocking and is allowed to adorn herself with it while she has her lunch.

"Talk about the moral influence of dress!" she went on. "I wish you could have met Annie before she owned that ribbon. Naughty! Why, she was about the hardest proposition to manage I have encountered in all my kindergarten experience. She was impudent, defiant and disobedient. I tried every way I knew to win her, but it was no use. And she tormented the children just as much as she did me. More than once I've gone home and cried over my failure with her.

"It must have been a special providence, I think, that sent me into a dry goods store one day when Annie had been especially unruly. There was some bright red ribbon on sale, and something impelled me to buy a yard. 'I'll give it to Annie,' I thought wearily—more, I think, with a sop-to-Cerberus idea than with any notion of reforming her.

"The next day I called Annie to me. She came sullenly, scuffing noisily over the floor in her poor ragged bits of shoes. I wish I had a picture of her face when I produced that ribbon. The sun breaking through a cloud is nothing to the radiance that fairly burst from it. 'For you,' I said, holding it out. She reached eager hands for it, and held it up against her cheek, loving it just as hard as you ever saw any little girl love her doll. 'Now,' I said, 'let me tie it in a beautiful bow on your hair.' I anticipated a battle, but she handed it over to me without a word, and I tied it around her head, making a fine stand-up bow on top. She reached up and felt of it. 'I want to see,' she whispered in an awed little voice. So I took her into a room where there's a mirror and held her up so she could look at herself to her heart's content. Then we joined the others and went on with our games.

"From that moment she was a changed little girl. Sounds like a story book, doesn't it? It's the truth, though. Don't ask me to explain the psychology of it, for I can't, but from that day to this I have never once had to correct Annie for anything. You see, she never in her short life had had a thing that was pretty. She lives with her mother and two other children in a dirty, dark back room, and you can see how it might seem to her that there was nothing worth while being good for. But now she has her ribbon to live up to.

"The experience has made me realize as I never did before that it pays to keep trying. If one thing fails, another is bound to succeed, sometime. Look at Annie now!"

At the head of the table sat Annie, red ribbon and all, absorbed in teaching a new little girl how to help herself to bread. "Not that way," she was saying, gently taking the bread from the little reaching left hand and putting it back on the plate; "always the right hand—so!" guiding the proper hand toward the plate.

Surely it had paid to "keep on trying."

REMEMBERED HER STAMP

The president of a certain state federation of woman's clubs had fallen into conversation on the train with her seatmate, whose destination chanced to be also her own, and it finally developed that they had mutual acquaintances

"Know Mrs. X.!" the president exclaimed in response to an inquiry; "I should think I did—though not personally, I am sorry to say. But I hold her in grateful and undying remembrance because she inclosed a stamp for reply one time when she wrote to me for some information! It was soon after I was elected to office, and letters were pouring in at a rate you can hardly imagine, asking me about this, that and the other thing, and Mrs. X. was the first one who seemed to remember that neither the club nor its president was made of stamps.

"I can't conceive why so many women are guilty of this discourtesy of omitting the stamp to carry back the reply they ask. If they realized the inconvenience to which their forgetfulness—or their indifference, or whatever you have a mind to call it—puts me probabl they would be less careless. But in order to keep the bill for stamps at all within bounds I have found it necessary to append to al printed announcements—'Only those request for information which are accompanied b stamps will receive attention.' I suppose th trouble lies in the fact that lots of wome don't know anything about doing things on business principles," she concluded.

Her neighbor started at the indictment shifted uneasily in her seat, blushed a littl and looked out of the window. The memory o a certain letter containing a request, but n stamp, and posted not an hour before, pricke her conscience.

"I suppose it does," she agreed meekly.

How Mother Enjoyed the Morning

BY FRANCES MARGARET FOX

IT WASN'T that mother was tired. She was not wearily dreading the breakfast dishes, either, nor putting the house in order, nor doing the many Monday morning tasks that usually fell to her lot. Nor were the girls to blame because their mother was left with all the work to do. If mother would insist on gathering the children around the piano before school time to sing college songs, and if her voice was the most joyous in all the chorus of "Hail to the Victors," it was no wonder the happy circle felt that work sat lightly upon her shoulders. Yet mother, when left alone, felt like idling.

The two little children had gone to school, and John had started for high school, while the two big girls with their cousin Flora had gone downtown. To be sure, Flora, being company and on her best behavior, had made a feeble protest about going away without at least washing the dishes, but she didn't offer to stay and do it. The last one gone, mother opened the fall number of a favorite magazine. On the first page the title "Enjoy the September Morning" attracted her attention.

"Well," mother commented, "who wouldn't? I suppose even the mud turtles are enjoying this lovely morning."

"The way to get the benefit of the September morning," declared the article, "is to get out into it and walk and look and listen and sing, or hum, or whistle, or run, or talk, and give the thinking faculties a rest."

Mother wasn't suffering in the least from weariness of "the thinking faculties," but she suddenly longed to get out into that September morning. "I'd like to shake you, sir," she remarked in savage tones to the writer who had dared suggest that the mother of a family could get into the outdoor joy of the September morning. Again turning to the magazine, she continued reading, this time aloud, so that it seemed as if a stranger spoke the words: "And yet, well, of course you are too busy to get out this morning; there are the dishes and the beds, and the other things! Oh, for just this once let routine work go! Get out and enjoy the morning—just this once, at least!"

Mother looked around and smiled; then she laughed aloud. "I'll do it!" she announced, and promised the clock that she would be back at 10; which allowed two hours in the sunshine and two hours to "hustle through the work and get dinner." The family had dinner at noon.

The clock ticked on undisturbed, but the coffee pot on the dining table looked reproachful, and the entire living room preserved a shocked appearance. Mentally shutting her eyes to conditions in the house, mother put on her sun hat, closed the door behind her and stepped outdoors with a spirit care free as a girl's.

"I'll see that mud turtle for myself and congratulate him on knowing how to live!" observed mother aloud, as the gate clicked behind her and she sped down the village street and made straight toward the country.

Two hours passed. The clock ticked on, unnoticed. The living room curtains stirred uneasily in the breeze coming through open windows; perhaps they wondered why mother didn't see that they were trailing snowy lengths against the screens. A pile of books, carelessly placed on the reading table, tumbled over, making a discontented sound as they fell. The canary mentioned his bath in fretful chirps. Four flies that had escaped the little children's traps balanced on the edge of the cream pitcher, risked their liberty on the margin of the uncovered butter dish or dined unheeded in the sugar bowl.

Thirty minutes more passed before the front door opened and three laughing, happy girls trooped into the house, to stand a moment later as if paralyzed by the scene before them. Calls of "Mother, mother!" were unanswered.

"Where is mother?" exclaimed Elizabeth in sharp, excited tones.

"Where can she be?" inquired Barbara.

"Oh, where?" Flora wished to know.

"She can't be far away, because she left the house unlocked!"

"But everything is just as it was when we went away!"

"It isn't like her ever to leave the downstairs work undone!"

"And look at the table! Not even the butter put away, nor the cream!"

"Do you suppose anything has happened?"

"Of course not! She's just stepped out."

"Unless one of the neighbors was dying, mother would have put away the butter."

"And she would have run the carpet sweeper over the floor and straightened the chairs around, no matter what."

"She was well this morning, wasn't she?"

"Yes, and she was happy, too! She couldn't have committed——"

"Oh, hush!"

"Maybe a tramp came and——"

"Instead of standing here talking, girls, let's search the house from top to bottom. If she is in the house, dead or alive, let's find her—quick!"

The girls searched in vain. Almost in tears, they were discussing what to do next, when in walked John.

"Has something happened to mother?" demanded Elizabeth.

"Happened to mother? I should hope not! But how do you expect me to know?"

"Why—because—well, how did you happen to come home so early? You are not usually home until after 1."

"Except when the botany class is to go to the woods at 1. But what about mother?"

John was boyishly comforting when the girls explained. "I should think," he blustered, "that you girls would be ashamed of yourselves, anyway, to go gadding and leaving her with all the work to do!"

"You can't say anything," was Barbara's quick retort. "How about the woodbox? Not a stick in it nor a sign of kindling! Looks as if either she or papa had to get the wood to start the breakfast fire with."

"I'll tell you what!" Elizabeth suggested. "If anything has happened to mother—if she is sick or hurt, or anything, it would just finish her to be brought into such a looking house! Now here is my idea—Barbara and I will make the beds and straighten up the house so it will look decent, while John and Flora go out and see if the neighbors know anything."

Fortunately mother came in at that moment, laden with green boughs and trailing vines. Her cheeks were red and her eyes bright; but she seemed ready to offer an apology to the clock when three girls, laughing and crying for joy, almost smothered her with kisses.

"Well, I'll go fill the woodbox," announced John, "and then I think I'll rake the yard. It looks rotten for a funeral!"

"A funeral!" echoed mother, releasing herself from the embraces of three hysterical girls. "What do you mean?"

"Oh, the girls had you dead and buried because you weren't at home when they came!"

"Oh, I'm so sorry!" mother began. "You see, I expected to get back sooner, but——"

"Now, don't say another word," protested Barbara. "After today every girl and boy in this family is going to do a proper share of the morning work, if we, all but you and papa, have to get up an hour earlier, so our mother can take a walk if she wants to, without scaring us almost to death and——"

"Three cheers for the red, white and blue," interrupted John.

The house was in order and dinner ready at noon—omelet, fried potatoes, fried apples and cottage pudding.

Father didn't notice that there had been any change in the usual program; neither did the little children. But the next morning father smiled and the little children joyfully obeyed John and "stepped lively," doing trifling tasks that saved mother's time.

That day the ordinary housework was finished at 9 o'clock and mother might have gone for another walk in the September sunshine; but she didn't. Instead, she sat by the window beside the mending basket, and as she darned stockings, she smiled, and smiled, and smiled.

Where the Cashmere Shawls Come From

EVERYONE has heard of the Cashmere shawl, but very few Americans have had the good fortune to visit the land from which it comes. Kashmir, to use the revised spelling, is a native state of India, 200 miles from from the railroad, in the heart of the Himalayas. The beautiful eighty-mile vale offers wonderful mountain scenery and beautiful lakes and rivers.

The people are interesting, different in habits from their cousins of the plains. Because the mountain sides afford great pasturing places, the hill men are largely a pastoral people. Sheep and goats abound. At shearing time, when the precious wool is clipped, the bleat of the sheep is heard everywhere in the land. From under the chin of the goat is cut the soft hair from which is woven the wonderful Cashmere shawl. Some of these are so finely woven they may be drawn through a finger ring. In early days when the rulers of the state paid their tribute to the white queen beyond the seas shawls were the currency employed to satisfy the obligation. The demand for them has fallen off in modern times, but the world still wants the embroidery of the country.

Sheep Shearing in Kashmir

As we walked along the road on the heights we passed many shepherds taking their flocks to the summits for the summer pasture. The grass there is tender, for the snow melts late. In each flock there were always some goats. The reason for this is that the sheep is a poor pathfinder. Its intelligence is not keen. When a precipice is encountered the animal loses its head, and when that happens the shepherd loses his sheep. The goat, however, is surefooted, and as long as the sheep follow in his wake they are safe. They trust him and never fear to follow.

At night the shepherds separate the sheep from the goats. Was it not so in Bible times?

A Long Vacation, Perhaps

"Don't fish go about in schools, papa?"

"Yes, Earlie. Why?"

"Oh! I was just wondering what would become of the school if some fisherman happened to catch the teacher."

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

September 14, 1913—The Ten Commandments

Everyday View of the Lesson

By J. L. Scott

Lesson Text, Exodus 20:12-21. Golden Text, Luke 10:27: Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and with all thy mind; and thy neighbor as thyself.

Last week we considered the first four commandments. The remaining six are like unto them. The handwriting is the same. One applies to the top of the mountain, the other to the bottom. Life begins at home. There character receives its first impressions, and the world is only home moved farther on. One's father is his first introduction to God. To childish fancy there is no one so great as he. In this we have an illustration of our relationship to God. Many see in this a reason for the special sanctity that attaches itself to the fifth commandment. It is as if God had said: "Honor thy father and thy mother, for they are types of me." This brings the parents within the circle of obligation. It touches alike father and child. No unworthiness can sever this relation.

Regard for Parental Control Leads to Correct Life

The promise attached to this command was in a measure due to the social fabric of Judaism. The nation rested upon the family. Disobedience to parents was destructive of law. If the nation, as such, was to stand there must be a reverence for the basis on which it was built. Apart from this, regard for parental control naturally leads to a correct life. The laws of health suffer no transgression. Young men sometimes plunge into excesses against their fathers' counsel. The result is early death or, what is worse, an old age embittered by remorse. "The sins and faults of youth" remain in their effects long after God may have forgiven them.

The sixth commandment follows the fifth in close succession. Whoever shortens life, whether his own or that of another, is in a sense guilty of crime. And yet the deadly fruit of murder hangs on almost every bush. The great, feverish public forces an industrial competition that is ever grinding out its grist of death. The sanctity in which life is held is the truest test of civilization. As the age advances men hesitate more and more to kill, even in the name of law. Less than two hundred years ago there were 160 offenses in England punishable by death; gradually, however, the terrible list has been reduced to two. Moses would teach the sanctity of life to a people whose civilization was of the most primitive kind. They had no courts of justice such as we know, and in case of murder the nearest male relative became the avenger of blood. His obligation was to slay the slayer. No modification of punishment was possible. "He shall surely be put to death." In those days such punishment was necessary, and such is the penalty usually attached to murder still. But in some states life imprisonment has come to be recognized as its legal substitute.

Conditions determine punishment. Jesus dealt with causes as well as with effects. He would destroy the gallows by destroying the steps that lead to it. Anger is incipient murder. From Cain down the red line of blood trails the course of hate. Murder is a crime of the heart because it is in the heart that the deed has its birth.

Seventh Commandment Preserves the Sanctity of the Home

The seventh commandment finds its origin in the same source. Moses would deal with the sin. Jesus would deal with the spirit of which the sin was but the expression. Other and deeper reasons than the good of society underlie the moral law. Man was made in the likeness of God. Whatever defaces the picture wrongs the artist. Adultery is an attack upon family life. God in the government of Israel would set forth certain ideas in the relation of man to man, and among these was the ideal of home. Whatever strikes the home strikes him. Jesus also gave this command its rightful interpretation. It might be broken in thought as well as in act. This sin has its origin in the swamp. It is the home of the vampire. The seventh commandment is a tape line by which one measures his distance from the beasts. And on no sin perhaps does the devil bestow greater care. He clothes it in the most fascinating literature and opens a thousand gates to its approach. A single step in that direction is likely to be fatal.

Then follows the law against stealing. The right of property is sacred, but property does not always consist in goods or money. Our most priceless possessions have no quotation in the markets of the world. Society is possible only through exchange, and the one who takes more than he gives is to that extent a thief. He has that for which no equivalent was ever paid. Theft wears a thousand masks; borrowing is one of the most common. The difference between borrowing and stealing is one of method. The thief operates at night, while the borrower prefers the day. Stealing is confined to no occupation. The office and the field afford like facilities. The man who agrees to work seven hours and loiters one is selling calico by a short yardstick. A broken commandment is a poor staff to lean upon. Dishonesty is as fatal to business as it is to morals. Few men have ever stolen themselves rich. A pair of wings sprout on every dishonest dollar. One must be honest in his particular business if he expects to gain success in it.

False Witness Bearer Guilty of Theft of Neighbor's Reputation

False witness bearing presents unbounded opportunity for theft. To bear false witness against one's neighbor does not necessarily imply a court of justice. The most dangerous perjury goes on in the open court of life. Reputation is about all that some people have. Destroy that and they are poor indeed. Character is largely within our own power, but reputation is the creation of others. The two form the man.

At the base of the decalogue lies the command against covetousness. It smites the entire law and breaks all by a single stroke. Theft and murder are but its expression. Trace sin to its source and there covetousness, like a serpent, lurks to destroy.

God had visited the earth. The roar of thunder and the mountain aflame proclaimed his presence. He came again, not amid smoke and fire but surrounded by angels and singing stars. In the one instance he bore the law, in the other the gospel; in the one he spoke to men through Moses, in the other he spoke to them through the Christ.

The Lesson Verse by Verse

By Hermon D. Jenkins

Analysis—Morality the distinctive feature of Bible religion. And Bible morality means filial piety, absence of murderous passion, personal purity, honest dealings, a truthful tongue and content with the station and environment God has given us.

The distinctive feature of Bible religion is that it is a religion with a morality as part of its fundamental law. The two tables were delivered together and form parts of the same revelation. They were not written on different kinds of stone or delivered on separate days, or read from different pulpits, nor did they differ in their origin.

The commandments from the fifth to the tenth inclusive relate to man's duty toward his fellows and constitute a part of God's law as truly as those which relate to his duty toward his Creator.

One should observe that in the second as in the first table man is simply man. The fundamental law does not know such a crime as "lése majesty" or make an offense to an earthly king something entirely different from an offense to a servant. So far as the morality of the Bible is concerned, all men constitute one class. The king has no more right to steal a province than the serf to steal a pig; and as to purity of life, the affirmation that there is only one standard of chastity for man or woman, prince or peasant, is no discovery of the twentieth century. Moses taught it more than three thousand years ago.

Christianity Alone of Religions Exalts and Protects Family Relation

Verse 12—The distinctions which men make are artificial, founded upon wealth or caste. A breath creates them and a breath extinguishes them. But the relation of parent and child has a reality and sacredness all its own. "This commandment," says Prebendary Chadwick, "forms a kind of bridge between the first table and the second. Obedience to parents is not merely a neighborly virtue; we do not honor them simply as our fellow men; they are the vicegerents of God to our childhood." How different this from Plato's philosophical dictum that all children should be turned over to the state. It should be noted that every modern anti-Christian system of ethics or sociology strikes first and hardest at the family relation. Christianity alone exalts and protects the family.

Verse 14—When our forefathers wrote in the declaration of independence that man's inalienable rights are "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness," they placed life first because the Bible placed it first. It is a strange, a dreadful, a significant fact that man is the only creature with a passion to destroy his kind. The battle flags which are hung over Napoleon's sarcophagus tell the same story as the scalps hung in the tepee of a Pawnee chief. The most sacred of man's rights is that which is most persistently violated—his God-given right to live.

Chastity and Honesty Today Beset with Grave Perils

Verse 14—A sure sign of moral degeneracy is found wherever there is a disregard paid personal purity. All the old heathen religions with which Israel had to contend were rotten to the core, as are some of our modern philosophies and "popular" literature and art. To live cleanly, to stand for the purity of the home and the reform of the drama is frequently to be classed as "puritanical." The highest praise that the old puritan ever won was that he has come to be known as a symbol of moral integrity.

Verse 15—The world has a broader understanding of this commandment than it had before so many ways were discovered of seizing the property of others and appropriating it to one's own use under forms of law. The "good old plan" that "he should take who had the power and he should hold who can" has been replaced by the newer and more effective methods by which estates are looted without a blow, banks wrecked and municipalities "bled pale." It is not a simple thing for a man to live honestly and be content with modest returns on his capital in an age which has such dubious standards of honesty and is so honeycombed with peculation.

Wish to Possess Another's Holdings Secret of Most Moral Delinquency

Verse 15—We have lately had in the Roosevelt trial a shameful exhibit of the lengths to which mendacity will go when it attacks official characters. In Tarbell's "Teachers' Guide" we are reminded how when President Washington retired from the presidency a partisan journal of that day said that "the man who is the source of all the misfortunes of our country is this day reduced to the level of a fellow citizen. Washington ceases from this day to give currency to political iniquity and to legalize corruption."

Verse 17—The final commandment, differing from all the rest in this, leads our thought from the overt act to the inner impulse. The root of most moral delinquency lies in the secret wish to possess what somebody else has. Even stories to the prejudice of another often spring from an envious desire to possess his honors. The sins against which the saint most frequently prays for protection are the "hidden" ones: because they can be cherished without disgrace, but never without danger.

We have thus passed in rapid and unsatisfactory review the great principles which underlie all righteous conduct; but even so cursory a study as we have been able to give may serve to put some imperiled soul upon its guard and effect in some measure the purposes for which the whole law was given.

BY EDWARD ARTHUR WICHER

Week Beginning September 7, 1913

Topic—The unjust judge. Luke 18:2-5.

This parable has many point of likeness to that of the friend at midnight. They are companion pictures. Both teach the same broad lesson, namely, that men ought always to pray and not to faint. But while they are alike in their main purpose, there are secondary differences which distinguish them. The parable of the unjust judge is characterized by a greater urgency than the earlier one. That parable taught that great advantages may be won by importunity in prayer. This teaches that prayer is not merely profitable for the life of the soul but is itself the very life breath of the soul. The former parable showed a man asking for a favor; this depicts a suppliant crying for justice. There is an insistence here that goes beyond the importunity of the earlier situation.

This insistence is found in the very circumstances under which the parable is spoken. In the background is the day of vengeance, when the closest intimacies of this world will be cloven by the appearance of the Judge. Old associates will be suddenly separated, as one is found fit to enter the kingdom of God and another is not. In that decisive day the inner characters of men will determine their outer conditions. Faith is the supreme necessity, and faith can be maintained and attested only by an increasing perseverance in prayer. Verse 8 of chapter 18 proves the connection of the parable with the latter part of chapter 17. The terrible danger is that when the Son of man shall come there shall not be found faith upon the earth. Therefore he urges men always to pray and not to faint.

The judge was a typical Oriental magistrate. He was appointed under the supposition that he would award justice, but he was indifferent to justice. He was steadied by no fears of a God to whom he should give an account of his tenure of office. He was held in check by no desire to stand well in the public esteem; for he despised the people and their opinions. He could doubtless be bought with a bribe, or he could be cudgeled into the performance of his duties by the superior officer from whom he held his appointment. These were the usual ways of setting him in motion. For justice he cared nothing.

But the poor widow is utterly unable either to bribe him, or to bring the pressure of a superior authority to bear upon him. A lonely widow, without money, is the very personification of human helplessness and need. What can she do? She can come often to the judge and by repeated entreaties wear him out, until he grants her petition in order to be rid of her. This is the weapon of weakness, and it is characteristically effective. To be saved from the plague of her importunities, the judge does what he had no intention at first of doing—he grants her desire.

"Pray without ceasing." Is our God like the unjust judge, who must be worn out with entreaties in order to be persuaded to do justice? The world has waited long for justice; but still it tarries. From the first age of the Christian church until now the suffering saints have sent up their cry, "O Lord, how long?"

"Pray without ceasing." God is longsuffering over his own; he will avenge them speedily. The mystery of his justice does not concern its possible failure, but only its protraction. His times we cannot know; at least not yet. But his care of his own we may know; and it never fails.

The only danger is that we may fail; that our faith may not be adequate to the long test of the waiting. There is a profound danger that we may gradually come to think that God has established this world in a certain way and will not change it at all in order to meet our petitions. There is a latent materialism in the best of human nature, which finds it easier to walk by sight than by faith, and to trust the evidence of the senses concerning things seen rather than God whom we have not seen. The very movement of the soul toward God is sometimes atrophied by the monotony and continuousness of the earthly conditions amid which the soul must live. The power of prayer will often fluctuate with the variations of the external life we live, with the changes of health, abode and social intercourse. Therefore Jesus urges upon his followers that they are to pray always, and not to faint.

This is a new doctrine. Other religious teachers have fixed the times for prayer; Christ only has taught his followers to pray always. The Jewish doctrine was that God must not be wearied with incessant prayer. According to the Talmud a man should not pray more than three times a day. Hourly prayers were forbidden. "If any man should approach thee every hour for the purpose of saluting thee, thou wouldst say that he held thee in contempt. The same therefore holds good concerning God, whom no man should weary every hour."

The truth is that we cannot pray well at any time unless we pray all the time. Prayer is as wide and deep as the fullness of the life of man. The follower of Jesus whom he himself would fain have lives in prayer. The instinctive movement of his soul is toward God. He cannot make out a bill, or mend a shoe, or turn a spadeful of earth in the garden without the lifting up of his soul to God. He may not be consciously aware of what he is doing. He is simply breathing the air of God.

Though every external sign should fail, this man knows that God has answered his prayers. God has answered all of them, before he has answered any one. Injustice may still sit in the judge's seat, but God is on the throne. Paul may still bear his stake in the flesh, but God's promise of aid stands fast.

With hushed footsteps and lowered voices, let us enter Gethsemane, where the Saviour kneels and prays, and suffers in his agony. "If it be possible, let this cup pass from me." But the cup did not pass; the Saviour had to drink it to the dregs. "Nevertheless, not my will, but thine, be done." These are the greatest words ever uttered by human lips. When the cry of injustice grows fiercer, and threatens to grow more bitter, when God seems to have forgotten his helpless, suffering people, when no audible answer descends through the widening gloom of a disjointed universe, still let us say, "Thy will be done." Far beyond the confusion there is light; and over the suffering son the Father bends in anguish. His care enfolds the universe in an infinite tenderness.

COMMENTS IN BRIEF BY WILLIAM T. ELLIS

WORDS THAT HELP LIVING

Topic—Favorite verses. IV. In the gospels. John 1:1-14.

A small casket may hold great gems. Profound thoughts may be crystallized in a few words. The mighty truths of Scripture are summarized in single flashing sentences, such as the Sunday schools wisely call "golden texts." The mind that is stored with those Bible epigrams is furnished with weapons for the spirit's wars, and with small loaves of the finest bread.

Countless criticisms have been made of the way in which the King James version of the Bible has been chopped up into verses, each of which is sometimes considered as a whole. No other literary work has been subjected to such treatment. Nevertheless, all the harm that has been done by thus slicing into bits a document which was designed to be received as a whole is almost atoned for by the force and beauty of some of the passages so isolated. Thus we have the precious shortest verse in the Bible—"Jesus wept." The verse system also gives us "For God so loved the world." Even little children can memorize the Bible in the form of texts.

The portability of truth is increased by compacting it into sentences. Many persons can quote passages from the gospels who yet cannot tell the main characteristic of the books from which the verses are taken.

The gospels are the richest mine of nuggets of truth, because in them we have the words of Jesus himself. They are all about him. His utterances shine from their pages. To know the gospel is to understand the mind of the Master.

Proverbs have been described as the small coin of truth. They circulate among the plain people. So, in similar fashion, favorite verses from the Scriptures are the peculiar delight and comfort of the average Christian. Many an unlettered saint can quote more favorite verses than the learned theologian.

A mind stored with bits of the choicest literature—passages from the gospels, for instance—is permanently refined and enriched. Parents who watch, without concern, their children memorizing the latest "popular" songs, which are incredibly banal and trivial, are often equally indifferent to the fact that their boys and girls are not memorizing the great words of Scripture, which, in hours of trial, become the spirit's stay and light.

A few favorite verses from the gospels are quoted herewith, as of more worth than any comment upon them:

Repent ye; for the kingdom of heaven is at hand.—Matthew 3:2.

But he answered and said, It is written, Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God.—Matthew 4:4.

Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness: for they shall be filled.—Matthew 5:6.

Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God.—Matthew 5:8.

But I say unto you, Love your enemies, and pray for them that persecute you.—Matthew 5:44.

This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased; hear ye him.—Matthew 17:5.

My Father, it if be possible, let this cup pass away from me: nevertheless, not as I will, but as thou wilt.—Matthew 26:39.

He is not here; for he is risen, even as he said.—Matthew 28:6.

And he took a little child, and set him in the midst of them: and taking him in his arms, he said unto them, Whosoever shall receive one of such little children in my name, receiveth me: and whosoever receiveth me, receiveth not me, but him that sent me.—Mark 9:36-37.

But many that are first shall be last; and the last first.—Mark 10:31.

And the angel said unto them, Be not afraid; for behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy which shall be to all the people: for there is born to you this day in the city of David a Saviour, who is Christ the Lord.—Luke 2:10-11.

For the Son of man came to seek and to save that which was lost.—Luke 19:10.

For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have eternal life.—John 3:16.

God is a spirit: and they that worship him must worship in spirit and truth.—John 4:24.

Jesus said unto them, I am the bread of life: he that cometh to me shall not hunger and he that believeth on me shall never thirst.—John 6:35.

Let not your heart be troubled: believe in God, believe also in me.—John 14:1.

NEW BOOKS

The Autumn's Literary Prospects

The early announcements of the publishers for 1913-1914 show an unusual number of important and worthy books, and The Continent, beginning with this issue and continuing through the autumn months, will give even more than its usual marked attention to the reviewing of them. The Continent's literary staff includes fifteen or more regular reviewers, covering, according to special ability, the various publications.

A very brief resume will give some hint of a few of the good things in store: In the field of biography and reminiscences are Roosevelt's "Fifty Years of My Life" (Macmillan), Mrs. John A. Logan's "Reminiscences of a Soldier's Wife" (Scribner), "Memoirs of Li Hung Chang" (Houghton), H. C. Shelley's "Tragedy of Mary Stuart" (Little, Brown), Martha Foote's "Life of Harriet Beecher Stowe" (Appleton), H. C. Chatfield-Taylor's "Goldini" (Duffield), "Letters, Speeches and Correspondence of Carl Schurz" (Putnam), G. M. Trevelyan's "Life of John Bright" (Houghton), Haultain's "Correspondence of Goldwin Smith" (Duffield), Newell Dwight Hillis's "Henry Ward Beecher" (Revell), H. W. Dickinson's "Robert Fulton" (Lane), "Autobiography of George Dewey" (Scribner), "Reminiscences of Augustus Saint-Gaudens," edited by his son (Century).

Among the travel and descriptive books are Stefansson's "My Life Among the Eskimos" (Macmillan), Price Collier's "Germany and the Germans" (Scribner), A. Henry Savage-Landor's "Across Unknown South Africa" (Little, Brown), H. C. Shelley's "Royal Castles of England" (Page), Arley Munson's "Jungle Days" (Appleton), J. B. Bishop's "Panama Gateway" (Scribner), Earle Harrison's "Panama Canal" (Moffat), Pierre Loti's "India" (Duffield), Lilian Whiting's "Athens the Violet-Crowned" (Little, Brown), Belmore Browne's "Conquest of Mount McKinley" (Putnam), Nathan Haskell Dole's "Spell of Switzerland" (Page), Oliver Huckell's "Through England with Tennyson" (Crowell), Robert Hichens's "The Near East" (Century).

Among the historical works that are worthy of notice are Henry Cabot Lodge's "One Hundred Years of Peace" (Macmillan), James A. Le Roy's "Americans in the Philippines" (Houghton), Frederick S. Dellenbaugh's "Fremont and '49" (Putnam), R. M. Johnston's "Bull Run" (Houghton), H. B. Cotterill's "Ancient Greece" (Stokes).

Fiction is well represented: Kate Douglas Wiggins's "Story of Waitstill River" (Houghton), Mary Johnston's "Hagar" (Houghton), Edith Wharton's "Custom of the Country" (Scribner), Mary Watts's "Van Cleve" (Macmillan), Henry van Dyke's "Unknown Quantity" (Scribner), Galsworthy's "Dark Flower" (Scribner), Eden Phillpotts's "Joy of Youth" (Little, Brown), De Morgan's "When Ghost Meets Ghost" (Holt), Florence Barclay's "Broken Halo" (Putnam), Gene Stratton-Porter's "Laddie" (Doubleday), Robert Herrick's "His Great Adventure" (Macmillan), Jeffery Farnol's "Honorable Mr. Tawnish" (Little, Brown), Robert Hichens's "Way of Ambition" (Stokes), Harold Begbie's "Rising Dawn" (Doran), Hall Caine's "The Woman Thou Gavest Me" (Lippincott), Myrtle Reed's "Threads of Gray and Gold" (Putnam), G. K. Chesterton's "Flying Inn" (Lane), L. M. Montgomery's "Golden Road" (Page).

Besides the important religious, holiday and juvenile books (too numerous to mention individually at this time) there are miscellaneous works of great interest: "Collected Works of Francis Thompson" (Scribner), John La Farge's "Gospel Story in Art" (Macmillan), William Winter's "Wallet of Time" (Moffat), Gallatin's "Portraits and Caricatures of James McNeill Whistler" (Lane), Montessori's "Pedagogical Anthropology" (Stokes), E. C. H. de Ragnau's "Vatican" (Appleton), "Collected Poems of Alice Meynell" (Scribner) and "Collected Poems of Alfred Noyes" (Stokes), John Masefield's "Tragedy of Pompey" (Macmillan), Gifford Pinchot's "Making of a Forester" (Lippincott), William De Witt Hyde's "Quest of the Best" (Crowell), "Lyrics and Dramas of Stephen Phillips" (Lane), Richard Burton's "New American Drama" (Crowell).

MARGARET C. ANDERSON.

The Great French Naturalist, Fabre

FABRE, POET OF SCIENCE, by C. V. Legros. One of the predominant characteristics of the remarkable French naturalist, poet and philosopher to whose classic work this volume is an admirable introduction is his large religious sense. His attitude toward the universe—and this is the core of religion—was not the motive but the result of his long and patient burrowings into the heart of insect life. He followed his lowly little friends to the threshold of the infinite. During the last thirty years, giving himself up to study, Jean-Henri Fabre lived "in the most absolute retirement and the completest silence." This was a period of self-discovery and self-expression, leading inevitably to an emerged personality. The real man has now come into flower, and the world is beginning appreciatively to botanize him. Fabre is perhaps the most beloved man in France, and he is destined to be one of the most significant spiritual forces of the present century.

He was born Dec. 22, 1823, at Saint-Leons, of parents whom he describes as small farmers, cultivating a little unprofitable land; poor "husbandmen, sowers of rye, cowherds." As a child he was ecstatically lost in the brambles that flanked the roads and the bracken that draped the glades of Malaval. "All nature filled him with curiosity and wonder." At 7 years of age he was sent to school at Saint-Leons; and after five years of study in various places he attacked the business of gaining his bread as best he could. He "set out along the wide white roads . . . seeking his living by the sweat of his brow; one day selling lemons at a fair." Once we find him exchanging his last halfpence for a little volume of poems.

Fabre was 19 when he began his career as a primary teacher, receiving a salary of $140 a year, which compelled him to subsist upon "chickpeas and a little wine." He taught laboriously in the College of Carpentras; and he began to study physics, quite alone, "with an impossible laboratory." In one of his letters of this period we find the following passage: "Today is Thursday; nothing calls you out of doors; you choose a thoroughly quiet retreat, where the light is not too strong. There you are, elbows on table, your thumbs to your ears and a book in front of you. The intelligence awakes; the will holds the reins of it; the outer world disappears, the ear no longer hears, the eye no longer sees, the body no longer exists; the mind schools itself, recollects itself; it is finding knowledge, and its insight increases. Then the hours pass quickly, quickly; time has no measure. Now it is evening. What a day, great God!" There is your poet, dreamer, philosopher.

At 32 Fabre was married, and "there were seven at table every day"—his income being $320 a year! He avoided "good society" as much as possible, saying that he preferred his own company. He took his doctor's degree in Paris, and later began a task which took him nearly twenty years to complete; a treatise on a family of fungi which cover fallen leaves and dead twigs. Also he studied the yellow-winged sphex, a wasp that artistically stabs and paralyzes the cricket, and collected data for a memoir of a family of wild bees and of beetles. These two studies "would have sufficed to fill a naturalist's whole lifetime and to make his name illustrious." Darwin's "Origin of Species" appeared at this time, and in it he refers to Fabre as "the inimitable observer."

As a teacher Fabre achieved commanding greatness. As an interpreter of nature he is unmatched. Dr. Legros, acknowledged by Fabre as his "devoted disciple," regards his work as "the richest contribution which has ever been made to the study of these fascinating problems." The naturalist prefaces the volume, and a photo-engraving representing him at 80 years of age forms a frontispiece of remarkable spirituality. The work is translated by Bernard Miall. General Literature

DANTE AND THE MYSTICS, by Edmund G. Gardner. The subtitle of this work, "A Study of the Mystical Aspects of the Divina Commedia and Its Relations with Some of Its Mediæval Sources," explains the scope but does not indicate the charm of the work. From St. Augustine to such men as St. Bernard, John of the Cross, and the other exponents of mysticism in its best forms, Dr. Gardner traces the strands that have been taken up by Dante and woven into his works. Dr. Gardner is entirely sympathetic in his treatment, and he lays stress upon Dante's endeavor to translate his mysticism not only into simple language but into moral canons of action for those still in the world and in the flesh. The book, of course, presupposes knowledge of and sympathy with Dante and his works, but the reader who has these in some measure will find this study clear and definite, illuminative of mysticism as well as of the beauties and profundities of Dante's work. BOHN'S POPULAR LIBRARY: Young's "Travels in France," with introduction by M. Betham Edwards. It is with nothing less than astonishment that one greets the present reissue of the venerable "Bohn's Popular Library," that pioneer series—established in 1847—of the best British and foreign literature. That such a series should be reprinted on thin paper, in limp covers, pocket size, and in a most readable type, and that fresh introductions by noted scholars should be included in each volume, and be offered to the public for the price of a light lunch, is an achievement worth taking advantage of. The present volume is a most sprightly account of the agricultural and general life of France during the years 1787, 1788, 1789. The introduction by Miss M. Betham Edwards and a long biographical sketch reveal to the more modern reader the importance and charm of the work and reveal also in the author a charming and wise personality. THE DRIFT OF ROMANTICISM, by Paul Elmer More. This eighth volume of "Shelburne Essays" contains papers on William Beckford, Newman, Pater, Fiona Macleod, Nietzsche, Huxley, and a final chapter on "Definitions of Dualism." Mr. More must always be ranked as a critic in the highest sense; he has taste, discrimination, background, facility and a wide cultivation. The essay on Pater is the most open to discussion; the one on Nietzsche will force any disciple of the German philosopher to look sharply to his laurels. THE CAMBRIDGE HISTORY OF ENGLISH LITERATURE (Volume IX.), edited by A. W. Ward and A. R. Waller. The gathered treasures of this latest volume of a really great work are representative of an attractive period of English literature—the closing years of the seventeenth and the first half of the eighteenth century—

in which the outstanding names are those of Steele, Addison, Pope and Swift. The period furnished men eminent in almost every department of letters, and none of them has been neglected here. It was the day of The Tatler and of The Spectator; it was a day not undistinguished in philosophy and theology, with the influence of deism felt; it was a day made notable in classical scholarship and criticism by Bentley; it was a day of jealousies, rivalries and contentions; and of the whole this volume gives adequate and satisfying treatment. There is an ample bibliography and a full index. [G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. $2.50 net.

SALVE, by George Moore. In this second volume of his trilogy, "Hail and Farewell," George Moore leaves England with his pictures, a cat and other chattels to live in Dublin, whither he had been mysteriously called to undertake the regeneration of the Irish language and the restoration of the Ireland that he had loved in his boyhood. "Salve" is the discursive record of what happened—a book of vital impressions, set in beautiful English. The Irish poet Yeats and many other artists wander charmingly through the pages; but perhaps the most striking thing in the book is what Moore has to say about dogma and literature. Here he rises to a height of criticism at which masterpieces in English letters are produced. [D. Appleton and Company, New York. $1.75 net.

New Fiction

THE WEAKER VESSEL, by E. F. Benson. This "weaker vessel" is a very weak one indeed, in the shape of a drunkard husband—a genius—whose patient wife tries with superhuman endurance to make a man of him. It is a rather exaggerated tale; the wife appears a little too good to be human, and the husband is so thoroughly weak as to become irritating. [Dodd, Mead and Company, New York. $1.25 net.

THE ABYSMAL BRUTE, by Jack London, is the story of a prize fighter that reads with a thrill. It is virile and artistic—two qualities that are rarely absent from Mr. London's work. [Century Company, New York. $1 net.

A NECESSITY OF LIFE, and Other Stories, by Betty van der Goes. Twelve variations upon the general theme of love, done with a sort of brilliant sketchiness. [Macmillan Company, New York. $1.35 net.

THE FEAR OF LIVING, by Henri Bordeaux. The idea of renunciation, neglected by our latter-day novelists, is revived by M. Bordeaux as a quality that brings the fullness of life. The novel is one of big interest and power. It has been "crowned" by the French Academy and is now in its eighty-third edition. [E. P. Dutton and Company, New York. $1.35 net.

CONCERT PITCH, by Frank Danby, is a novel of big scope written by a woman whose gifts in the field of dramatic fiction are well known. It tells of a young Englishwoman who, despite the protests of her family, marries a musician and then proceeds to be unhappy. "Frank Danby" has never written better. [Macmillan Company, New York. $1.35 net.

THE FRINGE OF THE DESERT, by Rachel Swete Macnamara, describes the effects of an ill-advised marriage with convincing detail. The man and woman lead their own lives, giving their daughter to relatives until she approaches her majority. Then she visits her parents, and these visits make the story. It is well done in detail work, but the plot interests are rather scattered. [G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. $1.35 net.

GETTYSBURG: Stories of the Red Harvest and the Aftermath, by Elsie Singmaster, contains nine stories dealing with the great victory celebrated this year. All of them have been told in various periodicals, but it is splendid to have them, with their choice illustrations, in book form. Wherever there is a grandson of a soldier of Gettysburg, give him this little book. It is tragic, but it will endear the flag to a new generation which may have its own bloody fields to traverse under shot and shell. [Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston. $1.

THE STRANGE CASES OF DR. STANCHON, by Josephine Daskam Bacon, contains ten short stories built around the theme of mental delusions which react on physical well-being. The subjects are chiefly women who have drifted into unnatural states of mind, and who, as a rule, are restored by some species of sane living adapted to their temperaments. The book is not at all depressing, for there is an atmosphere of wholesomeness about it that accords with the treatment advocated for the patients; and it is well written. [D. Appleton and Company, New York. $1.30 net.

THE LONG WAY, by Mary Imlay Taylor, is a story of marriage ties held sacred. Two sisters—one of them fine and strong, the guardian of a frivolous younger one—are involved in a love affair that spells great sacrifices and final happiness. It is a strong and inspiring piece of work very much worth reading. [Little, Brown and Company, Boston. $1.25 net.

Books for Young People

HARPER'S BOOK FOR YOUNG NATURALISTS, by Alpheus H. Verrill. The obligation of American youth to the Harpers for many helpful books is greatly increased by this rather novel "nature" volume. It aims primarily to encourage study of animal life without improper destructiveness. Beginning with plans for the boy's museum, it suggests the best methods of collection and preservation of birds, insects, fish, reptiles, mammals, mauve invertebrates, rocks, minerals, Indian relics, botanical specimens, etc., with a glossary and a classification to guide in the work. [Harper and Brothers, New York. $1.50 net.

LIKE ENGLISH GENTLEMEN. The author of "Where's Master?"—that pathetic story of King Edward's dog—has written a new story to little Peter Scott, whose father died at the south pole. The beautiful, simple little narrative tells Peter how his splendid father met death—"like a very gallant English gentleman"—and is dedicated "to Peter's mother as a little wreath for the snow grave of her hero." [George H. Doran Company, New York. 50 cents net.

DEERING OF DEAL; or, The Spirit of the School, by Latta Griswold. A very excellent school story for boys—one of the best we have read in a long time. The illustrations, too, are of such unusual merit as to deserve special mention. [Macmillan Company, New York. $1.25 net.

A CHILD'S BOOK OF WARRIORS, by William Canton. Charmingly written stories of Charlemagne, Balt the Attacot, Jacobus of Edessa, Herve and Christina, Justinian, Kynewulf, Olaf the Viking, and others. The volume is handsomely illustrated in color and black and white. [E. P. Dutton and Company, New York. $2.

A REGULAR MADAM, by Alice Wilson Fox, is a delightful girls' story about a little girl of the long ago, when Canada was called New France, who first went to boarding school in England and then came across the ocean and had many exciting adventures in this new land, climaxing in her share in the capture of Quebec. [Macmillan Company, New York. $1.35.

THE STARS AND THEIR STORIES, by Alice Mary Matlock Griffith; with pen sketches by Margaret Boroughs. One of the best books we know of in this field. Its appeal to children is irresistible and its facts are supplemented by poetical and mythological excerpts. [Henry Holt and Company, New York. $1.25 net.

A STORY GARDEN FOR LITTLE CHILDREN, by Maud Lindsay, ought to be a great favorite with very small children who love stories dealing in an imaginative way with things real and familiar. Miss Lindsay is an expert at just this sort of story, and her book has been attractively published, with lovely pictures and decorations. [Lothrop, Lee and Shepard Company, Boston. $1 net.

BLUE BONNET'S RANCH PARTY, by Caroline Elliott Jacobs and Edyth Ellerbeck Read. This volume continues the story told in "A Texas Blue Bonnet," and takes the heroine and the "We Are Seven Club" to a Texas ranch, where they spend a joyous summer. [L. C. Page and Company, Boston. $1.50.

Theology from Modern Viewpoints

PRESENT-DAY THEOLOGY, by Washington Gladden. In the days when Horace Bushnell was in theological disfavor and it was not considered just the thing to invite him to church functions, the young Washington Gladden bade him to his own installation, and took his place frankly and fully by his side. It was an act which proved typical of his later ministry. He has always been on what is loosely described as the "liberal" side in all church matters. When the Billy Sunday meetings were held in Columbus Dr. Gladden, though one of the oldest pastors of the city, declined to take part in them or give them any countenance. His main objections were to the methods involved and the teaching of the evangelist, which he felt to be antiquated.

In this volume of lectures Dr. Gladden has gathered into succinct form his theological views. The lectures present in popular form, as does no other book with which we are familiar, the views of the more advanced liberal theology. Agreeing with the writer, as in many points the reviewer does, it is yet not ungracious to say that Dr. Gladden finds it as difficult as most of us to word a belief with which he disagrees so that its holders would accept it. There is a weakness somewhere in the statement of what some Christians are supposed to hold, when the comment speaks of "the immorality" of the theory. Similar to these is the remark that to Dr. Gladden "this idea of the virgin birth [of Christ] tends to throw some discredit upon the sacredness of marriage, which is a tendency to be deprecated." He protests against calling a man a heretic because "he believes that Mary told the truth" in the familiar quotation—as though her truth had ever been questioned. Then it seems belated to repeat the old saying that infant damnation was "most plainly taught in the Westminster Confession" until 1902, when it would have been only fair to let a general audience know that the holders of that confession always repudiated that interpretation of the famous "elect infant" clause. There are several inaccuracies. The gathering of "Pastor" Russell's devotees in Washington which declared against a literal fiery hell caught Dr. Gladden, as it was meant to catch everybody, and he gravely describes it as a company of Sunday school teachers!

We hasten to go on with a word of real appreciation of the purpose and execution of the book. There is need for more such work. Pastors owe it to their people to let them know how the thought of the day is running as it passes through their own studies. There is an element of the controversial in this particular instance, but it is in most cases well subordinated to the fine purpose of the preacher to instruct his people in the subject in which he is expected to be an expert. These lectures give the views of the modern theologians who have taken the "liberal" positions. Ministers often ask where the most advanced views may be found; we venture to say that they are popularly expressed in this book by the veteran Columbus pastor. SOCIAL IDEALISM AND THE CHANGING THEOLOGY, by Gerald Birney Smith. This volume contains the substance of the lectures delivered on the Nathaniel William Taylor foundation before Yale Divinity School in 1912. The theme is the vital question: How shall theology be reconstructed after the clearing of the ground by modern biblical criticism, modern scientific investigation and modern philosophical thought? Professor Smith traces rather extensively the course of religious thought as it has led to the present situation, and makes it clear that finality in theology has been rendered impossible. Accordingly, whatever theological reconstruction is made must be made upon the understanding that it can serve only as a temporary structure presently to be superseded by something quite different and more in harmony with the science and philosophy that may arise in the future. The vital thing in Christian thought is not, according to Professor Smith, an authoritative and unalterable structure, but an attitude of soul. While as a protest against the hard dogmatism of the seventeenth and succeeding centuries the work is of great value, as a proposal for reconstruction it is weak and vague. And its main weakness arises from the author's failure to appreciate the place which the Bible should occupy in any effort to reformulate the Christian doctrines. MISSIONARY WORK

Officially Registers Mission Schools

The educational bureau of the new Chinese republic at Peking has abolished from its records all recognition of mission schools. This fact might be supposed to be unfriendly and disadvantageous to missionary education within the Oriental republic, but missionary educators, on the contrary, regard it as a matter of great advance and benefit from their viewpoint. The significance of the change lies in the fact that all schools are reduced to two classifications—public schools, established by the government and supported by public funds, and private schools, established by private individuals or groups and supported by benevolent donations. The latter group, of course, includes the missionary schools, which are thus put, even when conducted by foreigners, exactly on the same basis as any secular enterprise maintained and financed by Chinamen.

The last vestige of prejudice against religious education is therefore wiped out by this new adjustment, and so long as the government continues friendly to education at all the missionary school will have the prestige of direct governmental registration. For that record of their character all schools that instruct youth are to be recorded in the official educational lists of China. In the province of Kwangtung this arrangement has been developed with especial wisdom, for there W. K. Chung, the dean of Canton Christian College, is the commissioner of education. A circular issued in midsummer announced that in order to secure registration primary schools must have a course of four years in length, grammar schools three years and middle schools four years. The curriculum and hours for primary and grammar schools are prescribed by government edict, but any of these schools may teach additional subjects outside of the hours of their scheduled sessions. Each school is required to prepare a copy of its curriculum in Chinese and file it with the bureau of education in Canton, and it is announced that inspectors will hold each school responsible for giving all the instruction outlined in the curriculum. An odd regulation is that no school shall give instruction in the classics of Confucius within prescribed school hours. Thus the study which, under the ancient regime, was the staple of all education for China, is, by the modern reformers, eliminated entirely from the studies of Chinese youth.

It is another matter of interest to observe that the curriculum prescribed by the new government of Peking compels every school, public or private, to insert "morals" in its list of subjects of instruction. And Commissioner Chung has requested the mission schools in his province, in filling in the blank opposite the word "morals," to employ a form of notation meaning, "We use the Bible as our text." In this way the missionary schools will be held to fulfill the Chinese law for moral instruction.

Physician Likened to His Master

In an obituary notice in The Chinese Recorder commemorating the life of Dr. Francis J. Hall, dean of the Lockhart Union Medical College at Peking, it is told that a Chinese pastor, on hearing of Dr. Hall's death, recounted how the big-hearted missionary physician had attended him in serious illness, and with tears falling from his eyes added this spontaneous tribute: "He took my sickness into his own heart." The likeness of this naive word of memorial to the prophet's foretelling of the Messiah will instantly appeal to every Bible reader, and in itself suggests the Christlikeness of Dr. Hall's nature. He was noted even among missionaries for the fashion in which he combined the most intense scientific enthusiasms with a dominating evangelistic purpose. Always with Dr. Hall the conception of his place in China as an ambassador of Jesus Christ was uppermost, and however proficient his medical students became, he could not be satisfied unless they were imbued likewise with a fervent zeal for the conversion of their patients.

Dr. Hall's career in China was only seven years in all, but his human sympathies, combined with his tremendous capacity for work, had made him already an exceptional master of the Chinese language, and such spare moments as he had just prior to his fatal illness were spent on revising the translation which he had made of Dr. Osler's standard textbook on medicine. Dr. Hall died of typhus fever, which in the last year has taken a terrible toll from the missions of China. Dr. Hall was the fifth missionary physician to die of typhus fever within six months.

Chinese Pastor Serves Without Salary

Pastor Gia Yu Ming, minister of Ichowfu Presbyterian church, Shantung, China, is an intensely spiritual preacher and a faithful pastor of his 450 parishioners. In 1912, finding that some of his people were threatening to refuse to pay his salary because he preached in such a way as to rouse their consciences from formalism, Pastor Gia after much prayer threw himself and all his worldly cares on the Lord. With the consent of the Presbytery of Shankiang he was released from his pastorate, but permitted, on invitation of the session, to continue as pulpit supply of the church. He is receiving no salary, but is trusting God to give him from time to time such free will offerings as are necessary for his support. These have come in slowly; sometimes the consecrated man has suffered privation, yet he still is faithful and cheerful, believing that the Lord will care for him. Already the results on the people are marked. With the continuance of Spirit-filled preaching the session is consecrated and wide awake, many of the church members are living a life of daily dependence on God that was before an unknown thing to them, and the Lord is adding to the church month by month.

Y. W. C. A. Meeting in Persia

From Resht station, near the Caspian sea, opened only nine years ago, Miss Grace J. Murray writes of the Y. W. C. A. in her school: "The girls enjoy their meetings. I never attended a more enjoyable missionary meeting than that of our Y. W. C. A. The last one was led by the chairman of the missionary committee, an Armenian of 14. She gave a map talk on Siam, then called upon one of the other girls to read an article about work in a certain station. After that the leader again turned to the map, explaining details, then called upon a third girl for an article. It was pleasant and restful to see the lack of consciousness with which they took part. Neither Mrs. Schuler nor I had anything to do except offer prayer at the beginning. Our star pupil, a girl of 10, who has studied English nearly two years, translated a difficult article into Armenian. These girls do things which in America we would not consider fitting, such as having Sunday picnics, but they live up to the light they have, and are real Christians."

The Heartache in Polygamous Homes

Those who believe that polygamy is not a domestic evil—and often almost a tragedy—in other countries, should know some of the inside workings of polygamous life in homes where it is practiced. One of the missionaries in Siam was called to attend the first wife of a nobleman. There were two other wives in the house as well, but this first one had no children and was therefore looked down upon by the later comers. The first wife, naturally desirous to still keep her place with her husband, had purchased at great expense from fortune tellers and soothsayers all sorts of magic charms and love prescriptions, some to obtain the husband's affection and some to work evil to the other wives. The oldest daughter of the house, who is highly educated and takes social precedence, discovered these papers during the wife's illness and took them to the missionaries, indignantly declaring that her father's first wife had tried to use one of them on her by blowing in her ear one day, and as a result her father had been greatly changed toward her and had caused her much sorrow. But the poor wife says that "there are not words in any language to express the heartache existing in every home where there is more than one wife, and that this is the one evil that cannot be endured with at least some peace of mind."

African Women Want Food Choppers

The old comic paper portrayal of the missionary to heathen lands armed only with an umbrella, a tall silk hat and a Bible has, of course, always been a purely fictional idea, originating in the mind of some artist who knew little of the real facts. But the practical application of the gospel of helping one's neighbor is daily being exemplified anew on the mission field. Mrs. H. A. Hoisington of the Batanga station in the Kamerun district of West Africa says that since the girls' school closed for its vacation she has been visiting the women in their towns and at their work. One afternoon she spent with the women at their semiweekly work of making mevanda, and as she watched the laborious grinding she asked if they would like a machine that would grind it quickly. To her surprise they thought it might be much better than the old way. So when she went home she carried with her some of the cassava, and after soaking it well, tried it in her food chopper. It came out so satisfactorily that the next week she took the machine with her and worked for three hours, demonstrating to fifty women and innumerable children that the little machine could grind the cassava better and quicker than the old way. So many of the women were anxious to try the machine that she had to order three at once for a trial, and if these are satisfactory more will be sent for.

Missionary Brevities

—In spite of its stormy career en route to the station the saw mill for Elat, in West Africa, is in place and doing excellent work, and seems none the worse for its enforced rest in the bed of the river during the rainy season. Fred Hope, who has charge of the machinery plant, says that in time the whole station will be rebuilt, from the boys' houses to the missionary homes.

—When the college was moved from Tengchou to Weihsien, in the Shantgung province of China, the missionaries remaining at the Tengchou station bewailed the fact that the church building, with the students gone, was far too large. But with only a few years elapsed they are now mourning because they haven't room enough to accommodate the people. One Sabbath recently there were 850 present, and this was no unusual number.

Board Notes and Announcements

—Mrs. E. L. Jayne of Hyde Park church was the leader Friday morning at the Board of the Northwest, Chicago. Most of the hour was given to the map talk, in which the Africa secretary, Mrs. C. W. Egan, told of that which she called "the strangest thing in all the world—making civilization to order from the ground up." Through the eyes of Mrs. Hoisington and Mrs. Senska she showed Batanga, and through the ears of Miss Eick the common request, "Won't you tell us how to walk?" Mrs. L. C. Denton, formerly Korea secretary of this board, now living in Cincinnati, both spoke and looked the joy she felt in being here once more.

—Dr. and Mrs. Ralph G. Mills of Seoul have sailed for Korea from Seattle.

"Ain't that just like Susie Patch? Bound to have a man if there's one left on the face of the earth. 'Sweethearts and Wives,' indeed," sniffed Cynthia. "There's no headpiece to Susie Patch. All for clubs and gadding. Just a flibberty gibbet, that's what she is. You don't want to think of her, Quin."

"Who in time can I think of?" demanded Cap'n Quin resentfully. "I ain't much on a wife hunt, anyway. I've tacked all over the village trying to find someone to suit ye and they've all got their outs. Who'll I take?"

"You take me," cried a laughing voice, and all in her dress of rosy bloom, the pearl earrings dangling, the yellow hair shining redly, the widow Lancaster, Marie of the changeable name, stood before them.

"I don't know what you're talking about, but I hope 'tis something nice. Don't get up, Cap'n Quin. I'll set on that rock, side of you. My, you look warm, Cynthy, and you've got a mosquito bite under your eye. How you pricked your fingers with those cranb'ries, didn't you? Better use some cold cream. How do you like my new dress, Cynthy?"

"Sort o' goes with your hair." Cynthia glanced at the bright curls. "D'ye use cold cream on that?"

"Vaseline," confessed Marie. "It brightens it up. You try it." She leaned forward and pulled a hair from Cynthia's head.

"For all the world, it's a white one! I s'pose it's natural at your age, but don't you hate to see 'em come? All my folks are English, and they got white headed terrible young, but I've escaped so far. I read in my book of ancestors today how one of your great uncles or something killed one of mine who was English. I dote on my English ancestors, they're so noble. Cap'n Quin's way back ones are same as mine. He's English, too."

Thankful to Be a Yankee

"I'm thankful I'm a Yankee. They had spunk enough to lick the English. It's most supper time; I ought to be going." Cynthia looked at the west, a glow of sunset radiance.

"You 'fraid o' getting rheumatism from the marshes?" inquired the widow sweetly. "I s'pose when I get old I'll be more careful, but I do so love this part of the day, don't you, Cap'n? Most likely you'll soon be going out to that house you've inherited. Will you stay long?"

"Live there. Got lots of old friends who cast anchor in Frisco," said the captain. "I most forgot to tell ye, Cynthy, the rooms will have to be fixed over. I'll want your advice."

"Let me help," cried the widow. She glanced at Cynthia, who, taking her pail of cranberries, half rose.

"Must you go? You ought to wear red flannel and rub with sweet oil. That's good for rheumatism."

"Is that what you use on your face?" Cynthia eyed disapprovingly the widow's blooming cheeks. "No, I ain't going just yet. What you planning to do, Quin?"

"Paint the kitchen fust. What's a good color?" Cap'n Quin pulled out an old-fashioned diary with red covers, took his stubby lead pencil and waited, expectant.

"Spruce color is what my English magazine says they use most this fall," smiled Marie. "'Twon't show the dirt, either."

"Better have yellow, 'tis more sightly," declared Cynthia. What Cap'n Quin scrawled in his diary the women could not see.

"Then the dining room I sort o' fancied in greens, with oak furniture like that you and me saw one day, Cynthy. Wouldn't that be about right?"

"Don't you decide in a hurry. You come take supper with me, Cap'n Quin, and we'll look over those English books together. I'll hurry back and make you some cream biscuit while you help Cynthy home. Her rheumatism bothers her."

Springing lightly to her feet the lady of the rosy grown gathered her skirts about her.

"You'll stop in?" she urged, bobbing her yellow curls at the captain.

"Mebbe, guess so," he hesitated.

"We'll hunt up our English kin in that ancestor book. I'll look for you. Now, mind you, come!" With a playful shake of the curls the widow sped fleetly from the cranberry bog.

"What makes you look so mad, Cynthy? She's a real pleasant little creetur to take such interest. You let me take that pail and you rest a minit longer before we start. You ain't sick?"

"Sick!" Cynthia recovered her voice. "No, but she did rile me. Being a man, you can't be expected to understand. You come up to the house while I git your birthday present."

"You did think," exulted the captain. "My, but I'm real pleased."

Through the cranberry bog they loitered into the narrow lane that led to Cynthia's home where, since the old folks had gone, she dauntlessly kept house by herself. It was a dry fall; the lane was parched, even the tansy was dust-covered and the ferns that drooped along the path were ragged and gray. As they emerged from the marsh-bordered road they tasted the saltness of the breeze that blew damp from the water. Cap'n Quin drew a long breath.

"Never git enough of it," he confessed. "I'd be cruising round today if 'twan't for that rheumatic leg o' mine. It's a fiddling kind o' life ashore after sailing the sea so long."

"Must git kind o' tiresome," admitted Cynthia. "Gits lonesome when there's no one but yourself."

At the steps of Cynthia's house they stopped.

"You wait a minit." Cynthia hurried in, soon reappearing with a small package neatly folded in tissue paper.

"'Taint much, but I hope you'll like it."

Delightedly the captain unrolled it. "I'll be whipped if it ain't jest what I wanted, crochet work and light blue, my fav'rite color. How'd you manage and me not see you working?"

He held up the tie in admiration. "Silk, too! My, my! You didn't stint. You're a terrible smart woman, Cynthy, and they don't grow on every bush. Wish I knew another as good. One 'twas a leetle mite more fond o' me. I ain't a master hand on a wife hunt. Can't see anybody but you." He sighed as he folded his birthday gift and carefully tucked it in his pocket.

"Ain't it a pretty night?" Cynthia, flushing at his words, pointed to the western sky, where the splendor of the sunset had faded to soft clouds of gray and purple that brooded winglike over the sea. They heard the insects of the night time as they stirred the air with their crooning chirp. Cap'n Quin rose reluctantly. He was loath to leave this twilight contentment.

"S'pose I ought to be jogging along if I git there to supper. She sez the English are mighty prompt about meals."

"Quin Greenlow, you set right down again," commanded Cynthia. "You ain't a mite o' call to go mooning off to any English widow woman's for your meals. I guess I've got as good and better things than she can cook. You set still and I'll make some biscuit and cranb'ry sauce and have supper ready in a jiffy."

"What'll she think? Then—I didn't know but what she'd do. She kind o' hinted she didn't object to marrying agin. S'pose she'll do?" repeated Cap'n Quin, doubtfully.

"No, she won't, and if she would, she won't have a chance. If you're so bound and determined to git married, Quin, why—you needn't stir a step beyond this house."

Cap'n Quin strode up to Cynthia so quickly that he upset the pail of cranberries that rioted in brilliant globes of crimson against the gray of the piazza floor.

"You mean?" he questioned joyfully, his eyes on the comely face that flushed rosily under his gaze.

She nodded smiling.

"Glory be! We'll have an early wedding. Will next week be too early?"

"We won't waste any time," declared Cynthia practically. "You ain't fit to be trusted alone with all those designing women round and you so soft-hearted. You'll want to fix that house, and most likely I'll have to clean it. They're a shiftless set out there. We'll start tomorrow noon."

Cap'n Quin, beaming happily, held fast to her hands. "What about trains? Can we make one all right?"

"My cousin went on an excursion that way a spell back. I remember about the trains." Cynthia turned a deeper rose under his adoring glance. "There's one starts tomorrow at 12. We'll take that. Go right from the minister's."

"Don't you beat the Dutch for planning!" Cap'n Quin stroked her hair with rough tenderness.

"I don't know about the Dutch," Cynthia laughed contentedly, turning smiling eyes to his. "I ain't familiar with 'em, but I can beat the English."

Crossing the Dead Line

No dead line in war is more disastrous than the dead line in the ministry. It is not so much a matter of age as of efficiency. The interest of the church and of the ministry are one in making the dead line as remote as possible.

Men need not cross the dead line as soon as they do, and when they do they ought not to be slain by poverty. Do you want to help rob the dead line in the ministry of its shame and terror and transform it into the gateway of a well earned rest on the borderland of heaven? Then help the minister to provide a pension for the day when he crosses the dead line, and he will sing, "The dead line has fallen unto me in a pleasant place and I have a goodly heritage."

Ask Women to Help Dependents

Cooperation of Well-to-Do with Poor for Mutual Good—Long Beach Assembly Trains Sunday School Teachers.

LOS ANGELES—Under the provisions of a law recently enacted by the legislature the club women of Los Angeles are making preparation to care for orphan and dependent children. Mrs. Clara Baker, the newly appointed child agent, is asking for volunteers from among the wealthy women of the city who will investigate conditions and help in the care of needy widows and dependent children. Women who apply for pensions under this new law will not only have their cases investigated but will receive the counsel and aid of a friendly visitor.

A pageant entitled "The Ministry of the Gift" introduced the exercises of dedication of the conference grounds of the Y. W. C. A. at Moss Beach recently. The various activities of the association were demonstrated by different divisions from the membership of the college association. The liberation of the child slaves was symbolized in the freeing of some children by a good fairy, who invited them to play upon the green.

The Long Beach assembly and Bible conference was in session from Aug. 10-31. The scope of this conference has been broadened in recent years so as to include all denominations. A prominent feature of the conference is the training school of methods for Sunday school teachers of all grades.

The George Junior Republic at Pomona is making progress. About seventy young citizens are there at present. There is a staff of twenty executives and helpers. The boys are employed in the various shops doing the work of the republic and learning a trade at the same time. A poultry farm, a truck garden and a model dairy furnish supplies for the tables in the various cottages.

Few Churches Open in Pittsburg

Only Six Presbyterian Services on Recent Sunday—All but One of the Six Sermons Are by Strangers on Account of Vacations.

PITTSBURG—The influence of the vacation in religious circles is shown in the fact that there were only six announcements of church services in the secular press last week. These were Second church, Wilkinsburg; Third, East Liberty, Forty-Third Street, First, Shady Side and North Side. Five of these services were conducted by out of town pastors.

Rev. Robert J. Patterson of Belfast, Ireland, founder of the "Catch-My-Pal" Union, besides occupying the pulpit of Shady Side church Aug. 24 spoke to the men's brotherhood Bible class of Emery M. E. church and in the afternoon at 3:30 addressed an open air meeting of the U. P. churches on the North side in West park.

Herron Avenue church, Dr. J. E. Garvin pastor, has been beautifully decorated and renovated. On the first Sabbath of September the pastor and people hope to enter upon a successful year of work.

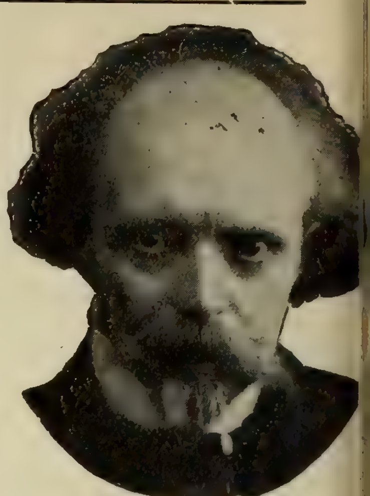
The third of the evangelistic services in Rowland theater, Wilkinsburg, has been held. Rev. W. H. Claggett, pastor of Grace church, preached.

An innovation in church music was the program for a recent morning service in Shady Avenue church. H. A. Schultz, a member of the choir, gave an explanatory address on the music to be sung. A chorus of thirty voices, directed by Mrs. C. H. Bernard, sang a number of anthems.

Evangelist Joseph Owen of Boas, Ala., has charge of a two weeks' revival service which was recently opened in Wilkinsburg. The combined churches have erected a tent which will accommodate 1,500 persons.

Gideons Meet in Maine

A conference of Gideons at Old Orchard, Me., Aug. 11-13 attracted a large number of members of this order to New England. Thousands of Bibles were exhibited which will be placed in the hotels of that part of the country. The Gideons already have put 200,000 Bibles into American hotels and there is no diminution of their efforts to see that each hotel has copies of the Scripture.



Hall Caine's

Masterpiece of Fiction

The Woman Thou Gavest Me

Being the Story of Mary O'Neill

DO you know this powerful story is Hall Caine's first novel in years? It is on the presses in eleven European languages an Japanese. A leading magazine paid $25,000 for the serial rights, have offered the author $100,000 for his next four years' work. offices of the magazine have already received 5,000 applications for the b These facts should convince you of the world-wide interest and discus which the story is arousing.

You have not read recently anything so startling as the revelation Mary O'Neill. Hall Caine's imaginative genius has arranged them into a r of most absorbing interest—the story of a great love, which every one will with deep emotion.

We believe Mary O'Neill is a real woman, but regardless of that there Mary O'Neills in every community, hers is the very heart of every woman is a book that will strike to the core of every heart.

It contains the greatest analysis of the modern marriage ever writ Hall Caine's conclusions, drawn from a close observation of real condit are grippingly convincing.

It is unquestionably Hall Caine's finest achievement, and deals with great everlasting human problem, the greatest of human problems, the pl of woman in the scheme of the world,—the story of a woman's life in its m human, most intimate, most poignant phases.

It is a book you should not miss reading, as it will take its place with great classics in literature.

Big Gift for the Pension Fund

Unnamed Donor Adds $10,000 to Sustentation Endowment—Most Pastors Wear Gowns in Pulpits of Philadelphia.

PHILADELPHIA—A check for $10,000 last week is one of the recent large contributions to the $10,000,000 fund which the Board of Ministerial Relief and Sustentation is raising. Philadelphia is acquiring a fund of $1,000,000 for the pensioning of school teachers of the city. It has already proved its usefulness and its effect has been most beneficial upon the school system. Presbyterians are prophesying that the advantages in the case of the teachers will be shown with the ministers of the church.

Nine churches of the city, including Harper Memorial, were addressed on a recent Sunday by as many representatives of the Anti-Saloon League.

The Drexel Biddle Bible classes continue to grow and attract wide attention. At an open air service, largely attended, on the lawn of the Drexel summer home Sunday afternoon, Aug. 24, those present listened to the story of the conversion of J. Arthur Schlichter from a life of drunkenness and drugs through the instrumentality of Dr. C. A. R. Janvier. He was the son of a clergyman, a graduate of two universities and a member of the state legislature, but had brought disgrace upon his family, squandered a fortune and had become a tramp. He is now devoted to religious work in connection with the Young Men's Christian Association.

A large proportion, if not a majority, of the Presbyterian ministers of the city have adopted the use of the gown in their Sunday services. Organist and choir members of some churches are also robed in vestments. The latest to adopt them is St. Paul church, Dr. J. Beveridge Lee pastor.

By the will of the late Robert C. Ogden Holland Memorial church, of which he was for years an elder, is bequeathed $8,000.

The baptism of an infant presented by a woman of the audience on a recent Sunday afternoon by Evangelist Dr. J. B. Ely at the Lemon Hill nonsectarian evangelistic services was an unusual event, causing a sensation and considerable discussion in religious circles of the city.

FOUR PROMINENT WOMEN DIE

Four eminently useful and well known women have recently died in this city and will be greatly missed on account of their religious and charitable work. They were Mrs. Susan H. Love, widow of Alfred H. Love, president of the Universal Peace Union; Mrs. Fanny Hazard Dickson, wife of former chancellor of the Philadelphia bar, who recently gave $25,000 to the Y. M. C. A. of the University of Pennsylvania; Mrs. Mary Channing Wister, wife of Owen Wister, the author, a descendant of Dr. William Ellery Channing and prominent in civic movements, and Mrs. Albert M. Kruger, known to the Sunday school public as Alice Miller Weeks, a writer of stories and articles for the periodicals of the Presbyterian Board and other denominational agencies. She was the daughter of a Baptist minister.

The project of a new church edifice for the Presbyterian church of Landsdowne gives sure promise of success through the energetic efforts of the pastor, Rev. William Boyd. The most of the money for its erection has already been assured.

Clergy and Laity

President Baer of Occidental College has issued a statement denying rumors that he is considering a call to an eastern institution of learning or an appointment to a diplomatic position.

Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman and party will sail Sept. 24 for Scotland, where they are to conduct a seven months' evangelistic campaign. Charles M. Alexander is to be the singer.

Rev. Nathaniel Miller Pratt of the Men and Religion Movement, who has been supplying the pulpit of the American church in Paris, France, is now in North Craftsbury, Vt.

The announcement that Rev. O. Jones Roberts of Buhl, Idaho, had received the degree of D. D. from the University of Wales was erroneous.

25000 UNDERFEED

Furnaces and Boilers Cutting Coal Bills 1/2 to 2/3

MR. L. GARRICK, Binghamton, N. Y., paid his landlord $5.00 more rent per month to install an Underfeed. Now he says he saves more than the $60 extra each year in coal bills and secures greater comfort. The landlord gets $60 a year — every year — more rent for his house because he has an Underfeed.

MRS. C. G. YAPLES, Susquehanna, Penna. heated her 14 room house with an Underfeed at a cost for fuel of $30 for the year. She says it cost her $60 a year before that to heat six rooms—that now she has a uniform temperature all the time, no gas or smoke, and complete comfort and satisfaction—because she has an Underfeed.

MR. HENRY SCHONEBURG, Ft. Wayne, Ind. has had an Underfeed for five years. He says his coal bills average about $27.50 per year for heating ten rooms, has had no repairs in the five years time and pronounces the Underfeed the best furnace ever made — and he knows the Underfeed.

SUCH experiences with users of Underfeeds are the rule, not the exception. We have thousands of letters from enthusiastic owners to prove it.

Young People Active in Summer

Awaken Interest During Vacation Days by Reports of Lake Geneva Conference—Many Visitors in Cincinnati Pulpits.

CINCINNATI—Echoes of the Lake Geneva missionary conference of young people are still reverberating throughout this city and suburbs. The largest delegation of southern Ohioans ever attending that Wisconsin camp came back with a thrill of inspiration and in numerous meetings word pictures of the work have been given. In midsummer activities everywhere the young are in splendid evidence. At Norwood church last Sabbath night reminiscences of Lake Geneva were given by delegates.

Vacation days are still marked by much interchange of pulpits. Rev. Jesse M. Tidball of Minonk, Ill., a son of Cincinnati's patriarchal elder, V. C. Tidball, occupied the Norwood pulpit last Sabbath. Many knew him as a lad in Sunday school. Rev. Frank Given, formerly of Cincinnati, came from Springfield, Ill., to mingle with old friends. The pulpit of First church on Walnut Hills was filled by Rev. W. H. Crothers of Logan, Utah. At Avondale Dr. Bynan Clark of Salisbury, N. C., has been heard.

Rev. E. M. Bryant of Trinity is at Shelbyville, Tenn., taking part in splendid revival services. Silverton is preparing for autumn evangelistic meetings.

Rev. George Francis Browne, who has just left for China, was heard in a number of churches which held fond memories for him. He preached at Poplar Street and at Pleasant Ridge, the home of his father, Rev. G. S. J. Browne of the American Bible Society.

Dr. David Watson McMillan at a recent open air service of the Church of the Covenant upheld the hands of Governor James M. Cox in a sermon to which he gave the startling label, "Cox, Booze and Cincinnati."

REN MULFORD, JR.

Professor Charles R. Henderson delivered the baccalaureate sermon at the convocation of the University of Chicago Aug. 24. Professor John H. Latane of Washington and Lee University was the speaker at convocation exercises the afternoon of Aug. 29.

Offer Gospel to Parade Spectators

Evangelistic Meetings in Wake of Marchers in Heart of Manhattan on Labor Day—Simultaneous Preaching in Madison Square.

NEW YORK— Following the observance of Labor Sunday by many churches of the city there was a unique religious tone given to Labor Day itself by the evangelistic committee in conducting a chain of simultaneous open air meetings extending from 14th street to 26th street. Speakers and singers were stationed at strategic points along the route of the industrial parade; and as soon as the marchers had passed the throngs on the sidewalk were attracted by the sound of music and fairly scrambled for first places in the crowd that at once surrounded each preacher at the street corner. In Madison square there were four or five meetings going on at once.

An unusual number of churches in this city will begin the season without pastors. Madison Avenue Reformed church is disappointed at the final refusal of Dr. Campbell Morgan to become its pastor. It will reopen, however, Sept. 21, and the acting pastor, Rev. A. B. Churchman, has arranged to have the pulpit supplied. Rev. Robert R. Wicks of Arlington Avenue church, East Orange, has been urged repeatedly to fill the vacancy in Rutgers church, but has not consented.

There have been various reports in the secular papers as to the nomination for the presidency of Princeton Theological Seminary. The committee of directors, however, state emphatically that as yet no one has been chosen to succeed Dr. Patton.

Because of the widening of 5th avenue Old First church will lose seven and a half feet of its front lawn. There is still, however, a garden on both sides of the church extending back more than 200 feet. In this green space open air services are held during the summer.

The final day of Stony Brook Bible conference was marked by a sermon from Dr. Charles L. Thompson, secretary of the Home Board, and an address by H. H. Seldomridge, congressman from Colorado and an elder of First church, Colorado Springs.

The National Bible Institute this summer has been holding fifty-five evangelistic meetings every day on Manhattan island. Many of these are outdoor meetings, some at noon and some at night. There are nightly meetings in the four gospel halls that the institute is now managing—McAuley Cremorne mission on West 29th street, Living Waters mission on lower 3d avenue, Beacon Light mission on upper 3d avenue and Manhattan gospel hall on Manhattan street. The middle of August the institute began a new outdoor meeting held three evenings a week at 29th and Broadway.

LIGHT BREAKS IN Thoughtful Farmer Learns About Coffee

Many people exist in a more or less hazy condition and it often takes years before they realize that tea and coffee are often the cause of the cloudiness, and that there is a simple way to let the light break in.

A worthy farmer had such an experience and tells about it in a letter. He says:

"For about forty years I have had indigestion and stomach trouble in various forms. During the last twenty-five years I would not more than get over one spell of bilious colic until another would be upon me.

"The best doctors I could get and all the medicines I could buy only gave me temporary relief.

"Change of climate was tried without results. I could not sleep nights, had rheumatism and my heart would palpitate at times so that it seemed it would jump out of my body.

"I came to the conclusion that there was no relief for me and that I was about wound up, when I saw a Postum advertisement. I had always been a coffee drinker, and got an idea from the ad that maybe coffee was the cause of my trouble.

"I began to use Postum instead of coffee, and in less than three weeks I felt like a new man. The rheumatism left me, and I have never had a spell of bilious colic since.

"My appetite is good, my digestion never was better and I can do more work than before for forty years.

"I haven't tasted coffee since I began with Postum. My wife makes it according to directions and I relish it as well as I ever did coffee, and I was certainly a slave to coffee."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Write for copy of the little book, "The Road to Wellville."

Postum comes in two forms:

Regular Postum—must be well boiled.

Instant Postum is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water and, with the addition of cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage Instantly

"There's a reason" for Postum.

Will Offer Nonpartisan Ticket

Indianapolis to Have Chance to Break Away from "Interests"—Temperance Victories in Two County Seats.

INDIANAPOLIS—While many have been away on vacations there has been a band of high-minded business and professional men meeting from week to week for the purpose of planning a nonpartisan citizens' ticket for the coming municipal election. Three parties have tickets in the field, but the feeling of these men is that the time is ripe to separate municipal and national politics, especially as there is evidence that all the other candidates are aligned with "the interests."

Among the speakers at the local chautauqua were F. W. Gunsaulus, D. D., and Rev. George L. McNutt. This was an experiment in high-class entertainment and was fairly successful.

Notwithstanding the loopholes in the temperance bulwarks opened by the Proctor law of the last legislature, there have been some signal victories in near-by county seats, notably Labanon, which has clinched her right to a more intensely dry city, and Greencastle, where the wets took advantage of the absence of many university people to call a local option election for midsummer, but this has been postponed until November by prompt and efficient use of legal privileges. With a full vote a dry victory is assured.

This city was the terminus of a relay race in which about 250 boys participated as Knights of the Holy Grail. There were teams from Anderson, Franklin, Terre Haute, Martinsville and Brownsburg. They were met by Governor Ralston with a greeting, after which they were escorted to one of the ball parks to witness games of the Sunday school league.

Capital Avenue Methodist congregation have been the guests of Grace church while their own building was undergoing repairs this summer. This was in part a return of the visit made by the Grace people after their fire a year ago.

Rev. A. R. Miles was the vacation supply at Second church and Rev. James Billington at Seventh. Among the visiting pastors have been W. J. Frazier, D. D., of Oxford, Ohio, at Memorial and Rev. T. R. White of Bloomington at Tabernacle. C. R. S.

To Use Their Own Discretion as to Leaving Mexico

The committee of reference and counsel of the foreign missions conference, after consultation on the situation in Mexico City, wired Saturday that missionaries of all denominations in Mexico should exercise their own discretion about withdrawing, but advised that women and children should be concentrated in safe places or sent to the United States.

Dr. John W. Butler, Methodist, representing a conference of four denominations in Mexico, wired that the missionaries object to Washington's instructions for an American exodus. The Presbyterian college at Coyoacan has been burned, but apparently not from disturbances.

Nashville Property Is Restored

Lawyers for the "anti-unionists" at Nashville having decided not to proceed further with the Cumberland Presbyterian case, recently determined against them, as told by The Continent Aug. 7, the Presbyterian Board of Publication was accordingly notified that the publishing house property would be surrendered. On Aug. 23 William E. Ward, the Presbyterian general manager who was ousted in 1910, returned to take charge.

See Relief from Street Beggars

Plan of the Christian Industrial League Would Give Mendicants Chance to Earn Living—Fourth Church Nearing Completion.

CHICAGO—Business men of the city are seeing the value of the suggestion of Rev. George A. Kilbey of the Christian Industrial League to employ homeless men in collecting waste paper about the city. Recent agitation against begging on the streets has called attention to the necessity of providing apparently helpless men with employment. This will be done through the plan of the league of giving men work of some sort. About sixty men a day are now employed in repairing household goods, gathering old furniture sorting waste paper and similar jobs, according to the skill of the unemployed man. During the past year at a cost of $2,534 in subscriptions 43,989 men were lodged one night, 6,532 given meals and 732 of the attendance of 27,000 men at the rescue mission professed desire to lead a better life.

It is expected that Rev. William E. Parker, Jr., associate superintendent of the Church Extension Board, will arrive from San Francisco this week to take up his work in this city.

The conference of officials and others of the executive commission with regard to the every-member canvass of Presbyterian churches was held in assembly hall beginning Sept. 3 and continuing all day Thursday, Sept. 4.

A deaconess to represent Protestant work will be connected with the juvenile court this fall through the efforts of the Federation of Churches. This is a result of a talk two months ago by Miss Mary M. Bartelme before the union meeting of pastors in Association hall. The federation is also at work in an effort to have the city council adopt an ordinance forbidding the sale of liquor at public dances.

It is expected that the men's clubrooms and the Sunday school quarters of the new Fourth church will be occupied Oct. 1. No promises are made as to the time of completion of the church auditorium, although work is now progressing in a satisfactory manner. Dr. John Timothy Stone, pastor, will return to preach next Sunday. He has been in Europe since the adjournment of the Aberdeen conference. There has been some discussion of changing the name of the church to Northminster to commemorate the churches which combined to form the present one. No action has yet been taken. During the summer all the activities of the church have been carried on.

WILL APPROVE ALL MISSION PLEAS

At the request of the Association of Commerce the Church Federation beginning Oct. 1 will assume responsibility for the investigation of independent missions and churches of Protestant denominations which appeal generally for contributions. Cards will be issued by the federation to all such solicitors. The Association of Commerce, which hitherto has done this work, will confine itself to the investigation of charities which are undenominational.

Tending to show the adaptability of foreigners to American standards is the recent election of Miss Elfriede V. Nerica to the Phi Beta Kappa of the University of Chicago. Seven years ago she landed in New York from Russia and entered the third grade in Chicago schools. In eleven months she knew enough English to enter high school. She has finished the university with highest honors.

An organization of charity workers has been formed under the lead of Professor C. R. Henderson to give publicity to the humanitarian work being done by the many agencies in this city. The commission, yet unnamed, will outline a comprehensive educational plan to inform the public how the relief of the city is administered.

Sunday school superintendents and teachers are preparing to begin vigorous work in the educational department of the local churches at once, following the lessened activity in most schools on account of the hot weather.

The Presbyterian Training School is offering sixty-eight courses to students this fall. The school opens Sept. 9.

Hyde Park church pulpit was occupied by the pastor, Rev. Alexander Alison, Jr., last Sunday, who has returned from his vacation. His father, pastor at Cold Spring, N. Y., has been preaching in Hyde Park on recent Sundays.

Good Record for Bible Schools

Cleveland Vacation Work Shows Advance Over Other Years—Two Mass Meetings in Parks on Labor Sunday.

CLEVELAND—Woodland Avenue church was filled to overflowing at the commencement of the daily Bible vacation schools. Special cars brought the little ones from their respective churches and the exercises, in which the children participated, were of great interest. There was an industrial exhibit of craft work, and prizes were distributed. South church school, of which Mr. Cornelius was principal, received a flag for the best attendance record. If every year brings the advance shown this summer over the first year's work this effort in behalf of the young, especially of the foreign districts, will become exceedingly important.

The recent death of Elder C. H. Randall of Second church removes another faithful office bearer and one long in the service of church, presbytery and Presbyterian union. Funeral services were conducted by Rev. E. C. Young, assistant pastor of Second church.

Arrangements are being perfected for a service in memory of Dr. H. C. Haydn, to be held the latter part of September, in Old Stone church.

Through the federated churches of the city arrangements were made for mass meetings in Gordon and Edgewater parks the afternoon of Labor Sunday, while the theme, "Modern Tendencies in the Labor Movement," was taken by many pastors at the Sunday morning service.

For five Sunday evenings in August Miles Park Presbyterian and Miles Avenue Christian churches held union services. The last Sunday evening of this series of fellowship meetings was an inspiring climax, the two congregations joining in a communion service.

Omaha Churches Lose Members

Decrease of Both Communicants and Sunday School Pupils—Large Per Capita Benevolent Gifts—Tennis Courts for Meetings.

OMAHA—An examination of the statistical reports of General Assembly reveal the denomination in Omaha proper to have 2,457 communicants and 2,582 in Sunday school members. Both figures represent a decrease over last year—ninety and fifty-four. During a ten-year period two churches report a net loss of over 100 members each. During the year the largest number received by profession of faith was by First church, 40. Lowe Avenue is next with 18 and Dundee and Covenant 14 each. Dundee, Covenant, Fairview and Parkvale show a net increase in the year's membership of 5 per cent or over, while First, Castellar Street, First German and North report decreases. This is accounted for partly by these churches making up large suspended rolls. First, First German, Dundee, Covenant, Lowe Avenue and Parkvale churches report enlarged Sunday schools. As respects benevolences there has been no increase over last year, whereas for a ten-year period a many-fold enlargement of gifts is evident. The year's benevolent gifts of North church have approximated $3 per member, Lowe Avenue and Westminster $4, First $6 and Dundee $9. The churches show decreased offerings. During a ten-year period Dundee church shows the most consistent advance, having increased its membership fourfold, its Sunday school threefold and its benevolent gifts eighteenfold. Of the stronger churches in the same period Lowe Avenue shows the second greatest advance in offerings to the boards.

Forest Grove Semicentennial

Forest Grove church, Pittsburg Presbytery, celebrated its fiftieth anniversary Thursday, Aug. 28. Rev. D. L. Dickson is the present pastor. Robert H. Gibson, a former elder, gave an address on the community before the organization of the church. He was followed by another former elder, James N. Moore, who spoke on the history of the church from its organization. The only living ex-pastor is Rev. John M. Gaston, who spoke on the work of this church during his pastorate. J. J. Beacom, D. D., his predecessor, served this church twenty-five years. Two sons of the church were present and gave addresses—A. W. Verner, D. D., president of Scotia Seminary at Concord, N. C., and Rev. O. N. Verner, pastor of McKees Rock church. George W. Montgomery, D. D., superintendent of missions of presbytery, expressed the greetings of presbytery. A bounteous repast was served by the ladies in the grove.

Union evangelistic services are being conducted at Carnegie and Wilkinsburg.

Endeavor is being made to build a manse at Inter which will facilitate permanent work from that center.

First and Westminster churches, Utica, united for the summer, three services being held in each building. One of the preachers was Rev. Robert W. Wicks, a son of Westminster, now of Orange, N. J.

A chapel for Sunday school and similar purposes is in process of construction in connection with First church, Hornell, and will cost $18,000. Under the leadership of Dr. P. R. Ross this church is being built up. All meetings of the church are well sustained.

Two pastors will be installed by Utica Presbytery at its coming meeting—Rev. W. H. Leach over Cochran Memorial church, Oneida Castle, and Rev. Edward I. Campbell over New Hartford. Mr. Leach comes from the Congregational church, Port Leyden, and Mr. Campbell succeeds Rev. O. A. Kingsbury, who, after a pastorate of twenty-two years, has become pastor emeritus.

Rev. S. X. Cross, formerly of Missouri Valley, has been secured by First church of Woodbine to supply their pulpit until Jan. 1. He has also been engaged to teach in Bellevue College and will reside at Bellevue, Neb.

Lenox church celebrated last week the fortieth anniversary of its organization. Aug. 31, 1873, the church was organized in the depot by Rev. A. F. Randolph of Bedford. Eight persons were received as charter members. During the forty years the church has gathered into its membership 553 with 204 now on the roll. The following ministers have served the church: N. V. Morrow, Edward B. Cousins, Alfred B. DeLong, Calvin E. Laughlin, William H. Ilsley, Edward S. McClure, Frederick Harris, J. F. Hinkhouse, Samuel Alexander, C. W. Weyer, L. R. Smith, Samuel Wiley, P. A. Tinkham, John C. Orth and N. R. Miles. The observance of the anniversary was held Aug. 30-31. On Saturday a basket picnic was held, followed by addresses by Dr. Marshall of Omaha and William F. Mueller. In the evening Rev. M. B. McNutt, field representative of the Home Board, spoke to the farmers and Dr. Magill of Des Moines also spoke. On Sunday former pastors of the church participated and letters of greeting were read from absent ones.

Ohio

The tabernacle under erection at Steubenville preparatory to the meetings by Billy Sunday is nearly completed.

A contribution of $3,000 has recently been made to Zanesfield church by Dr. Earl Sloan of Boston, a former resident, who returned for a homecoming celebration.

Governor Cox in an address at Columbus has indicated that he intends to see that the state liquor license board conforms to the law in regard to the selling of liquor. Every saloon in Ohio is expected to be closed on Sunday.

The centennial celebration of Canal Fulton church held in April has been commemorated by the issuance of a pamphlet giving a history not only of this church but of Presbyterianism in general, together with a list of present members.

Rev. Cyrus A. Price, pastor of First church, Delta, gave an interesting lecture in West Unity church July 27. He showed by means of a large chart, diagramming the history of the world, that Christianity has been a mighty factor in the history of mankind.

Rev. Joseph Andrews has been elected pastor of Volga church for another year.

The church of Wautauga is much helped by its ladies' aid society, which is gathering hundreds of dollars for furnishing the new house of worship soon to be built upon a site already purchased.

The rural church of Goldenrod, near Armour and grouped with another rural church ten miles distant, is building a manse to encourage their minister, Rev. William Mason, just recovered from a disabling siege of inflammatory rheumatism.

The rural church of Pleasant Prairie, twelve miles from Midland, entertains the meeting of Reserve Presbytery Sept. 10, the minister, Rev. William Smiley, and his helpers transporting the guests from the railroad and return.

The annual conference of the Sioux Dakota Indian missions of the Congregational and Presbyterian churches in South Dakota meets Sept. 3-7 with the Presbyterian church of Red Hills, fifteen miles from the nearest railroad town, Kennebec. The transportation arrangements for the hundreds who will make up this encampment are in charge of J. P. Williamson, D. D., of Greenwood.

Kansas

Bucklin church during the past year has raised over $2,000. Rev. E. I. Gilmore, pastor, has removed to Topeka Third church.

Rev. D. H. M. Boyle, pastor of Oak Street church, Wichita, is preaching for Bethel church, five miles north of the city, on Sunday afternoons. The new church building, with commodious basement, costing $3,000, was recently dedicated by Walter M. Irwin, D. D., synodical superintendent.

Wellington people are very happy over their newly renovated church and parsonage. During the vacation period the interior of the church was frescoed, a new system of lighting installed, new carpets laid, new upholstered chairs for the choir loft obtained. The parsonage was painted, papered and repaired within and without. Preparations are being made for the most active fall campaign in the history of the organization.

Wisconsin

President Carrier of Carroll College spoke recently at La Crosse in First church and also in North church at a union meeting.

Rev. D. C. Jones of First church, La Crosse, spent several Sundays of his vacation among the home mission churches of presbytery.

Rev. H. C. Ramsey, who has been laboring in Packwaukee and Abbotsford during the past year, has received an appointment as missionary to China from the Foreign Board and expects to go this fall. Mr. Ramsey went out as mis-

PRESBYTERIAN
SCHOOL
of Chicago
for Christian Workers
Organized in 1908 by the Board of Church Extension of the Presbytery of Chicago

The demand for people who "know how to do it" is one of the conspicuous signs of the times.

Every trade and line of work is opening schools for training its workers.

It all means that we are awake to the need of people knowing how to do things and learning it in school instead of wasting time, and doing harm, experimenting on the public.

Shall we be less wise in our church affairs?

Don't you think it is time for us to undertake more seriously the training of church workers, other than ministers?

Directors of education, pastors' assistants, church secretaries, deaconesses, visitors—call them what you will or vary the duties as may be required—all should be trained in the School and come to the pastor ready for helpfulness.

That is part of the task of the Presbyterian Training School of Chicago. (Open this year to women only.)

If you are a prospective student, or if you want to help such a School, let us hear from you.

Financial Situation

High Water of Last Spring Brings Loss to the Holders of Railway Stock—Government Funds May Be Used in Speculation.

Effect of the damage wrought by the high waters in Ohio and Indiana last spring is still being felt by others than those who were forced to look from their attic windows and see their furniture float away. The Big Four railway company recently "passed" its dividend on preferred stock. The loss to the road in bridges and in freight business was large and had to be paid out of earnings and charged to operation. This expense depleted the surplus which the holders of stock expected as dividend. Nor will the holders of this stock ever receive the dividend just passed. Their income is so much less and the only redress they have is to refuse to hold stock in the road longer, a recourse which may result in further loss in the effort to sell. The owner of $5,000 worth of stock in this case would lose $62.50. If the same amount had been invested in a farm mortgage the land could be taken if payment of the interest was not made, and if the loan was made by careful men the property would be worth double the amount loaned upon it.

Financial papers are pointing out that the promise of abundant cash from the government treasury to help move the crop has had a tendency to encourage speculation. Grain dealers, they say, are ready to hold cereals, and especially corn, on the farms, in the hope of higher prices, rather than try to market the grain now. If they can obtain sufficiently extended credit this will be possible. All of which may show that the best intentions may go astray when the natural laws of business and finance are interfered with in any way.

Express Companies Will Meet Competition

It is rumored that express companies are beginning to see the error of treating the public as a source from which as much money as possible is to be squeezed. Tentative plans have been formed by some companies to have their agents act as middlemen between farmers and consumers, the agents taking orders for produce to be delivered to the city man. Special carriers to hold various sorts of farm produce are being designed to handle this traffic if it is found popular.

With the multitude of opportunities to spend money during the summer, especially in a city, many persons approach the fall months with a flat pocketbook, but a determination to check the outgo and try to save a definite portion of their income during the coming half year. Many men find that membership in a good building and loan association, the holding of life insurance, making payments on a home or putting money regularly into some other form of investment starts them on the road to saving. Others can buy a $100 certificate based on a real estate mortgage every month or two. The saving of something regularly gives one a large amount of satisfaction.

"Nuggets Plentiful as Apples"

Participants in a stock selling scheme, whereby an 82-year-old woman of Syracuse, N. Y., said to be a cousin of the late P. T. Barnum, parted with her fortune of $82,000, have recently been arrested. According to the charges made, a niece of the woman wrote her that she knew of a splendid investment in mining stock in Washington where gold nuggets were said to be as plentiful as apples. The woman sold her house to promoters of the mine. She asked $15,000 for it and the promoter offered to purchase it for $18,000, giving notes secured by stock in the mine and bearing 10 per cent interest. The lesson that people should not invest their savings in unknown mines or other doubtful propositions which are located at a distance, or which promise enormous returns, will probably be learned some day.

sionary to China about sixteen years ago and labored with good results in the Inland mission and for the American Bible Society. He came back to this country a year ago, and while supplying home mission churches he has been visiting the churches and presenting the missionary obligation with his pictures and costumes in a very forcible and interesting way.

California

Dr. John Balcom Shaw is expected to begin his ministry in Immanuel church, Los Angeles, Sept. 14.

Rev. John Van der Las and his bride of two weeks lost their lives in the wrecking of the ship State of California in Gambier Bay. They were on their honeymoon trip and were to have returned to Monrovia to the home of a cousin of the groom, Rev. R. A. Van der Las, pastor of Monrovia church, where they were married.

Miss Matilda L. Allison, a retired missionary, died suddenly while addressing a meeting in Inglewood church Aug. 15. Miss Allison labored in New Mexico for about twenty-four years, helping to build up the school for Mexican girls at Santa Fe which bears her name. For several years past she has resided at Inglewood.

Nebraska

The corner stone of First church, Broadwater, was laid Aug. 24 by the pastor, Rev. W. J. Eby, assisted by Rev. George McDougall of Bridgeport. When completed it will be one of the best churches in Box Butte Presbytery.

Union evangelistic services have been conducted by Frank E. Lindgren of Chicago at Wakefield during three weeks preceding Aug. 24. The services were all profitable and the closing one was really a pentecostal season. More than a hundred professed conversion.

Missouri

Rev. Robert L. Layfield of Kansas City, Kan., has just closed successful union meetings in Morton church, Ray county. The Presbyterian, Methodist and Baptist congregations united. He begins meetings soon at De Soto, Kan.

The golden wedding of Rev. and Mrs. George H. Williamson was celebrated in First church of Joplin Aug. 20. The ceremony was performed by W. M. Cleaveland, D. D. Rev. J. D. McCaughtry of Carthage expressed congratulations and Rev. Elbert Hefner presented the bride a purse containing $50 in gold as a token of the occasion. He then presented a bank book to the groom, announcing that the friends had raised a handsome fund for their needs.

Oklahoma

Dr. R. J. Phipps; who has resigned from Watonga to go to El Paso, leaves a well organized church. A brotherhood of forty members was formed last fall, which has taken a large interest in the civic affairs of the town.

North Dakota

Rev. Ralph T. Fulton of Fargo, who has been superintendent of institutes of the North Dakota Sunday School Association during the past year, has resigned to take up pastoral work at Towner. He previously held pastorates at Oakes and Erie.

Tennessee

During the vacation of pastors of First church (South) and Second church (North), Knoxville, the congregations have joined in a union service. Rev. John T. Thomas of Grand Rapids, Mich., has supplied the pulpit.

Maryland

Illustrated talks on the church lawn Wednesday and Sunday nights are being given by Rev. Edward Niles, pastor of Second church, Baltimore. Club work of the church is attracting many nationalities.

Colorado

The City Christian Endeavor Union of Colorado Springs recently held a missionary pageant, giving the young people of that city a miniature "World in Colorado Springs."

Winona Assembly Pays Expenses for the First Time

The most successful of all Winona conferences closed Aug. 31. From the standpoint of attendance, speakers, interest and financial returns it was notable.

Winona is most widely known on account of its annual Bible conference, the largest and best known summer assembly west of the Allegheny mountains. Since 1895 these conferences have been growing in patronage and power. Bishop Hughes, Billy Sunday, Evangelists Biederwolf, Munhall and Gipsy Smith addressed the throngs gathered at the various services in the closing day. Besides these the program included Dr. G. Campbell Morgan, Dan Crawford, the famous African missionary; Dr. Chapman, Mrs. Catherine Booth-Clibborn, Dr. George R. Stuart and fifteen other prominent workers. It was therefore scarcely extravagant for one, during the conference, to say, "I never expected to see on this continent such an aggregation of religious leaders as appear on this program."

No wonder several tens of thousands passed through the turnstiles during the ten days. At least 8,000 people were on the grounds the first Sunday. The attractions of this Northfield of the Central West are not confined to the array of talent that characterizes its programs. The scenic beauty of Winona is famous. Almost every form of recreation is also provided.

The moral and religious influence of this conference surpasses measurement. Who that have heard them would venture an estimate of the good imparted to the multitudes by Dr. Morgan, perhaps the greatest living expository preacher; Gipsy Smith, perhaps the world's most winsome evangelist, and Dan Crawford, whose twenty-three years of sacrifice in learning to "think black" transformed a portion of the dark continent. A large proportion of the people attending are leaders in hundreds of communities, Bishop Hughes is authority for the statement that 525 Methodist ministers were in attendance. Perhaps 1,000 Presbyterian ministers were on the grounds during the ten days. Winona is not narrowly denominational, but broadly interdenominational. The announcement for denominational meetings was like a roll call of Protestant churches.

At the denominational meetings special attention was given to the study of the problems of men's work, four days being devoted to this work and one day to the study of denominational training schools. Among the speakers on men's work were Dr. John M. Coulter of Chicago, Dr. B. B. Bigger of Cleveland and Secretaries Fox and Henderson. H. B. McAfee of Chicago spoke on training schools. For the first time in its history the conference paid all expenses and probably furnished a balance to reduce the deficit of former years. Presbyterians should not be long in relieving Winona of all financial embarrassment, for Winona has rendered a high service to them in particular, and in welcoming and recognizing sister denominations has rendered a wide service to every Protestant denomination.

Two come every minute

Night and day for the last five years or more there has an immigrant arrived in the United States every thirty seconds. Many of them return to their native land in a few months or after several years, carrying with them their savings and the habits and customs of the people of this country with whom they have come into contact. The newcomers who settle in city and country are separated from the moral forces which steadied them in their old homes. They do not know the language of most American churches. To reach them in a religious way there is needed a man of their race trained in this country. It is to provide such men that Dubuque German College and Seminary exits. Cunningham, Jesse A.—1831-1913.—These dates mark the period of a noble career. Mr. Cunningham was the highest type of Christian manhood. He began life in Blairsville, Pa. He was for some years engaged in business in Pennsylvania, California and Indiana. In 1870 he married Miss Nannie McFarren, daughter of Samuel McFarren, D. D., then prominent in the Presbyterian ministry of western Pennsylvania. The last quarter of a century of his life was spent in New Jersey. In all his relations, business, social and religious, Mr. Cunningham held to high ideals. His life was free from the stain of vice of any kind—even such as Christian people sometimes indulge in, and his conduct marked by the strictest integrity.

His was a life singularly useful to the church. He served as superintendent of the Sunday school and filled the office of elder in three different churches—Blairsville, Hammonton and Chelsea, Atlantic City. In the last named he was an elder at the time of his death. Mr. Cunningham was a man intelligent in the great doctrines of the church, loyal to the highest ideals of service, rich in experience and efficient in Christian work. His last two years of life were years of bodily weakness and suffering. Here his Christian faith and fortitude were strikingly manifested, and bore testimony to his fellowship with one "through whom we are more than conquerors."

Such a life, with its varied lines of service, its intelligent grasp of the great truths of our faith and its high standard of Christian manhood, is a priceless heritage to the church and society. "A good name is rather to be chosen than great riches." His record is noble, his memory is sweet, his reward is great. The church needs the service of more like him. He passed to his reward May 22, 1913.

of the modern Church are earnestly and thoroughly considered in these volumes. Startling in presentation of facts and illuminating in suggestion

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL AND THE TEENS
Edited by JOHN L. ALEXANDER Int'l S. S. Ass'n. Cloth $1.00

Contains the surprising results of the systematic and exhaustive investigation by the Commission appointed by the San Francisco Sunday School Convention. Its unique recommendations are a decided step forward in the effort to check the serious departure of teen age boys and girls from the Sunday school. The discussion of teen age characteristics and possibilities alone is worth the price.

THE BOY AND THE SUNDAY SCHOOL
JOHN L. ALEXANDER Cloth $1.00

A broad and intensely practical treatment of the question of the Sunday school's responsibility not only to teach the boy the Bible, but to be a real factor in his everyday life, constantly but tactfully keeping Christian ideals before him, and developing him into all-round manhood. Peculiarly rich in methods of work.

Poor Negro's Work for Boys of His Race—Lee McCrae

NEW YORK CHICAGO PHILADELPHIA

¶ Have you written to find out about that school or college? Do not wait until the last minute and then be forced to make a hurried decision. ¶ If your son or daughter is not to enroll in a secondary school or college this year, why not begin now to inform yourself regarding the institution that will be entered later? Present education is always more helpful when it takes account of future objectives. ¶ You will find the announcements of schools to fit every requirement in The Continent. They will give you the information you need if you will write to them. Should you be uncertain which ones to address, communicate with The Continent's Educational Bureau.

Illinois

PRESBYTERIAN TRAINING SCHOOL
of Chicago
for Christian Workers

Organized in 1908 by the Board of Church Extension of the Presbytery of Chicago

The demand for people who "know how to do it" is one of the conspicuous signs of the times.

Every trade and line of work is opening schools for training its workers.

It all means that we are awake to the need of people knowing how to do things and learning it in school instead of wasting time, and doing harm, experimenting on the public.

Shall we be less wise in our church affairs?

Don't you think it is time for us to undertake more seriously the training of church workers, other than ministers?

Directors of education, pastors' assistants, church secretaries, deaconesses, visitors—call them what you will or vary the duties as may be required—all should be trained in the School and come to the pastor ready for helpfulness.

That is part of the task of the Presbyterian Training School of Chicago. (Open this year to women only.)

If you are a prospective student, or if you want to help such a School, let us hear from you.

Around the Shop

There are ministers who believe a religious paper is helpful, and do not object to their parishioners taking it. There are ministers who believe thus and who urge their parishioners to take a good paper. The latter class is a growing one. They are the men who have convictions on the subject of the service of a good religious periodical, and who do not hesitate to act. Let us show how one man of the positive type shows the faith that is in him:

"To My Friends of the Church: This will introduce Mr. ——— of The Continent, and I am introducing him because I believe he has something that every loyal Presbyterian should have.

"Please bear in mind that this testimonial is freely given; it is unsolicited. I give it because I have been a subscriber to The Continent for several years and I confess I know of no better religious paper in the land; it seems impossible to imagine a better one. There is no more welcome publication coming to my home, and it always receives a thorough perusal.

"If one has any desire of becoming a stronger, more loyal Presbyterian, my advice would be to subscribe for The Continent, and I give this advice because we, as Presbyterians, should know more about our own denomination.

"The Continent is a Presbyterian paper from beginning to end; but not a narrow one in any sense. It will do you good."

And just an "after word" from another positive pastor, written to a Continent representative:

"You did us good here by coming when you did—just at the time for urging a church paper—and above all The Continent. Everyone is delighted with it. With the old and new subscriptions we have just thirty. Next year fifty!"

For the Bride nothing can be too beautiful, too intrinsically good.

You want her appreciation of your gift to be not only for the day, but for all the years to come.

This is why we have made

A New Edition of

The Marriage Service

Four different style bindings, each one individually exquisite.

The Edition de Luxe

Bound in padded white silk, lined with white moire silk. A double-page certificate, set in old English type, forms the two center pages, bound in with a dainty white ribbon tied in a true lover's knot. The regular service from the Book of Common Worship, each page framed in a decorative border, follows. Separate leaves with the same artistic decorations are added for congratulations of guests and friends. The finished book, exquisite, refined and elegant, is enclosed in a white moire silk-covered box, harmonizing with the lining.

Christ's Sliding Scale

"WHAT DO YE MORE THAN OTHERS?"

That question from Christ contains a whole volume of Christian ethics. In our Lord's time, just as today, multitudes regulated their conduct by the standard measurement, "All that's to be expected of an ordinary man." Then as now there prevailed a kind of set tradition as to what consistency demands of a religious person; anybody who kept abreast of that mark felt himself doing well enough.

But Jesus carried always a prod to disturb the content of "well enough." He was for everlastingly keying up character to a higher plane—the good to the better.

The Master could not permit religious people to measure themselves by one another. He knew that meant self-righteousness. Instead, he insisted on having his followers read the measure of their obligations by the deeds of those who don't profess religion.

"What do ye more than others?" To please his Master the Christian disciple dare not stop with doing as well as is to be expected of the average man. He must do a great deal better than the average man dreams of.

And as the man of the world improves, it is the business of the Christian to keep improving faster.

There are pessimists a plenty in the church and elsewhere who will be hasty to deny that the Lord meant anything of the kind. They can't conceive that it would ever be safe to test a Christian's duty by any such standard.

The world all the time grows worse, according to their philosophy. To put Christians on notice to be better than the world would establish a sliding scale indeed, but as they see it, a scale sliding down.

The forevision of Jesus Christ, however, had no such fear in it, and it is safer to side with his optimism than with anybody else's pessimism.

He saw the world getting better even in his day—saw faith and revolt from sin in many whom the church of his hour deemed hopeless. And he knew that when his gospel of good will began to be preached, the process of betterment would go on accelerating from century to century.

So it has come to pass—even though a few dark souls are unable to see it. Outside and beyond the effect which the gospel works in the lives of those who consciously accept Christ as Saviour, there spreads an almost immeasurable zone of social effect where Christ's ideals steadily elevate thinking for the whole civilized world.

Two thousand years ago not even the best of men were ashamed of being selfish. Now everybody is ashamed of selfishness. Even the vilest men today lighten their consciences with kind acts to the unfortunate.

So in times past dishonesty and debauchery did not disgrace men, but today even the dishonest and debauched are conscious of disgrace, and make the best front they can to conceal their demerit.

The world's conception of life—and in great part its practice of it—has thus gone up incalculably since Christ was on earth.

What does this mean for the church?

Everybody says there is not as much difference now between the church and the unchurched world as there used to be. Sometimes that is taken to be a sign that the church is dropping backward into more worldly conformity than previous generations yielded to. But only in superficial senses is that true.

The deeper fact, touching the things that really matter, is simply that as the world absorbs more and more of the teachings of Christ, it moves up closer to the church in moral standards; it continually increases the bulk of its generosity and integrity in lines once considered exclusively Christian.

The distance between the church and the world lessens because an improving world treads on the church's heels.

Many who perceive the fact take singular comfort from it. They argue that the world itself is rapidly becoming Christian, and so the old obligation, insisted on by the apostles, to keep the church separate from the world, is being obliterated.

But the apostles are not so out of date. There is just as much reason as ever for keeping the church separate from the world. And the only way to maintain that separation is for the church to realize this:

When the world absorbs so much of Christ that it begins to act and live as the church has been living, the church must get nearer the Master and live and act still better.

Always Christians must be doing "more than others." Does the world grow generous? Christians must be doubly generous. Does the world improve in honor? Christians must be superhonorable. Does the world learn sacrifice? Christians must become supremely sacrificial.

Let the idea be illustrated by a very "modern instance."

Eugene V. Debs, leader of American Socialists, and his wife recently adopted into their home as a daughter a poor deceived and unfortunate girl who had fallen into the deepest pit of woman's sin.

Admirers of Mr. Debs have made much ado over the act. Mr. Debs, they have said, does not pretend to be a Christian, and yet he has here done a deed of superbly Christlike sympathy from which the vast majority of Christ's professed followers would have shrunk with dismay. It is to be feared, indeed, that even Mr. Debs himself has not wholly refrained from applause of his own goodness.

At all events, the manner in which the kindness has been advertised has irritated many. But irritation is not the Christian response. The Christ spirit will not return scorn for scorn any more than evil for evil.

Mr. Debs would never have done this deed if he had not learned the manner of it directly or indirectly from Jesus Christ. Jesus set the example. Therefore the friends of Jesus Christ must give thanks for Mr. Debs's following the example.

But meanwhile they must themselves stir up zeal to outdo Mr. Debs and all his like.

If "others" receive one fallen girl to a new chance for womanly honor, the Lord's disciples must receive a multitude. At any cost, they must do "more than others."

It will not suffice for the church man of today to be only as good as his father was. He can't live on his father's standard now.

To be his father's equal as a Christian; the present-day church man must be as much superior to the average morality of this age as the father was to the average morality of his age.

It is a sliding scale and it always slides up.

President Yuan Holds His Power in China

Affairs in China have of late been progressing favorably for one man, that man being Yuan Shih Kai, the provisional president of the republic. Regardless of President Yuan's nominal title, he is "the" strong man of China today, and British and American observers agree that he is fast coming to occupy in his country the position long successfully held in Mexico by Porfirio Diaz—that of absolute dictator. And some of the observers believe that for a time at least China will prosper under such a dictatorship, if it becomes an actuality, as Mexico prospered in the best days of Diaz.

Yuan's prestige has been greatly increased by the failure of the southern rebellion, which finally collapsed with the capture of Nanking by government troops on Tuesday of last week. The capture is said to have been attended by looting and barbarity. The American consulate and two missions were threatened and fired upon, but no one was injured. Previously Dr. Sun Yat Sen and General Huang Hsing had fled to Japanese territory. The suppression of the rebellion brought Yuan's troops into conflict with Japanese civilians, a few of whom were fired upon and killed while carrying a Japanese flag. The Tokyo newspapers referred to the incident as a massacre and demanded that full reparation be required from the Chinese government. In Peking, on the other hand, there is reported to be strong feeling at the active part which Japanese are accused of playing in fostering the rebellion.

By way of Mukden and St. Petersburg a dispatch last week announced that President Yuan would resign office as soon as peace is restored, but verification was not forthcoming. On Friday Yuan gave out the names of members of a new cabinet. All are described, with one exception, as henchmen of the president, and with no exception as "old style officials with modern tendencies," and men of monarchical sympathies. The cabinet selections are to be submitted to the parliament or assembly for ratification, but the president has lately evinced scant respect for the assembly. The Manchu dynasty abdicated more than a year and a half ago, and the present assembly first met more than four months ago, but only slight progress has been made toward the adoption of a constitution and there is no immediate prospect of a presidential election. In the meantime Yuan keeps a steady hand on the helm.

Several members of the assembly were arrested two weeks ago, and arrests and executions became so frequent in the capital that many of the deputies were terrorized. The senate appointed its speaker and deputy speaker to visit Yuan and ask him for an explanation of the arrests and also to inquire whether he desired to govern China without the help of the assembly. Yuan replied that he was in ignorance of the arrest of the deputies, and promised to investigate.

Japanese Mob Assails Foreign Ministry Offices

Japan's foreign policy appears to be as unsatisfactory to the Japanese mob spirit in Tokyo as it is to the partisans of President Yuan Shih Kai in China. On Sunday a crowd of several thousand persons gathered in a public park in Tokyo and listened to inflammatory speeches urging military action against China in revenge for the Nanking incident. From the park the throng marched to the government foreign offices and demanded that troops be sent to China or else that Foreign Minister Makino resign. After four or five hours of wrangling and parley, delegates from the crowd were pacified by a promise of being received later.

The disturbance was precipitated by the assassination of a foreign office bureau chief, Mortiaro Abe, who died Saturday after having been waylaid and stabbed by two unknown men. One explanation is that the act was a manifestation of displeasure against the government's course in the California and Chinese matters. A more sinister suggestion was that the bureau chief, a comparatively unimportant individual, was a victim of mistaken identity, as he resembled Dr. Sun Yat Sen. At the time Dr. Sun left China there was a rumor that a band of Chinese assassins had been sent to Japan to take his life.

Incidents of the Mexican Imbroglio

The week passed with no more startling development in the Mexican situation than the shooting of a drunken Mexican army officer on the international bridge between the Mexican city of Juarez and El Paso, Texas, by two American immigration officials. The incident angered the Mexican soldiers and civilians, but proved to be nothing more than one of the many dangerous flashes that have kept the United States troops on the border alert. Feeling in Texas, as voiced by the governor, has been strong against the amicable policy which rules at Washington, but the President knows that the great majority of the American people want peace, and that the people as a whole do not believe that Mexico and all its resources are worth a war.

To offset ex-Governor Lind's special mission to Mexico the Mexican government announced that a personal representative of President Huerta would be dispatched to Washington. Manuel de Zamacona, who has had diplomatic and financial experience, was designated by the Mexican foreign minister, Gamboa, to carry on a parley with the American authorities, and it was hinted that Zamacona would endeavor to secure for the de facto government the financial assistance to which Mr. Lind referred in one of his communications.

General Felix Diaz in London, where he was sidetracked after the Japanese government expressed its unwillingness to receive him, definitely declared his candidacy for the Mexican presidency. Minister Gamboa took occasion to deny that any further official statement had been made that President Huerta would not be a candidate, but the Associated Press states that the American government in all its negotiations is taking Huerta's withdrawal for granted.

American consuls throughout Mexico have been instructed to assist American citizens who may wish to leave Mexico, as strongly urged by the President. The Presbyterian and Methodist mission boards have sent word to their missionaries to exercise their own judgment as to leaving Mexico, but advising that women and children should be removed to places of safety.

Another Fatal Wreck on New Haven Railroad

Public indignation has been aroused by a series of fatal railroad wrecks on the New York, New Haven and Hartford railway, the last one occurring at Wallingford, near New Haven, early in the morning of September 2. Twenty-one persons were killed and fifty injured in a rear-end collision between two sections of express trains from the White mountains and Bar Harbor. Many of the victims were prominent in business and society, and were, for the most part, homeward bound vacationists. The locomotive of the rear train plowed through two sleeping cars, the latter of wood construction. The fact that the coaches were built of wood instead of steel increased the seriousness of the wreck. Two trainmen were arrested—the engineer of the White mountain express, who speeded past a danger signal in the fog, and the flagman of the Bar Harbor flyer, who failed to set warning torpedoes far enough in the rear of his train, which had come to a standstill. The New Haven officials also blamed the block signal system of the so-called "banjo" type, which is being replaced by the semaphore system.

Besides state and local investigation of the accident the federal machinery is at work to determine responsibility and find out methods of prevention. The interstate commerce commission took the initiative under Commissioner McChord, and the railroad management was ordered to produce all minutes of the board of directors since July 12, 1911, the date of the Bridgeport wreck, which first put the New Haven lines into bad repute. Within the last two years there have been fourteen wrecks and over 400 persons were killed or injured. The record reads like a list of battlefields. New York critics of the road affirm that its equipment is not consistent with safe operation and that the discipline of its employees has been weak. Representative Britten of Chicago introduced a resolution in Congress ordering the federal inquiry already under way. Evidence given by the employees of the road at the public hearings conducted by the commission tended to show general laxity and carelessness.

Sympathy is expressed for the new president of the road, Howard Elliott, who has just come from the West to succeed Charles S. Mellen. Slason Thompson, who is regarded as an apologist as well as a statistician for the railroads, in a letter published a week ago says railway wrecks are "absolutely adventitious"—i. e., accidental—and points to the wreck of the Scotch express in northern England, which fell on the same day as the New Haven casualty. But the factor of safety is distinctly larger in Great Britain than in America.

Financial Echo of the Railroad Wreck

At the first meeting of the executive committee of the New Haven railroad directorate to be attended by the new president, Mr. Elliott, last Friday the famous banking house of J. P. Morgan and Company served notice that it would terminate its contract as fiscal agent of the road and its subsidiaries. Mr. Morgan stated that it was desired to give the new management a free hand in financial as well as in other matters. The newspapers, however, were quick to suggest that the recurring disastrous wrecks may have influenced the Morgan firm, which for many years has looked after the financing of the New Haven lines, and only recently undertook to float $67,000,000 of 6 per cent debentures. Another theory was that a financial war is impending between the Morgan interests and the Kidder-Peabody banking concern of Boston. Boston capitalists desire to have New England finance its own railway system without going to Manhattan.

The executive committee at the same meeting discussed the Wallingford wreck and reaffirmed a blanket resolution adopted last October in which the president of the company was directed to "leave nothing undone which in the judgment of himself and his associates will conduce to greater safety in the operation of the railroad" as to passenger travel. Future passenger equipment was to be of all steel type. The reaffirmed resolution is a demonstration that something more than strong words and good intentions are needed to prevent accidents on a big railway system.

Appointment as Balkan Envoy Opposed

Charles J. Vopicka of Chicago was last week nominated by President Wilson as American minister to the Balkan states. In submitting the nomination the President and Secretary of State Bryan disregarded protests of the Anti-Saloon League, and the protests were renewed before the senate in an effort to prevent Mr. Vopicka's confirmation. Mr. Vopicka is president of a brewery concern and naturally allied with the liquor interest, and for that reason his appointment was objected to. In his favor it was urged that he represents the type of immigrant that has worked up to prominence by dint of earnest and diligent effort.

The United Societies for Self-Government, an association of several liquor and "personal liberty" organizations, strongly indorsed the Vopicka appointment. In a resolution sent to Washington it was urged that "so long as the brewing industry is recognized as legitimate and lawful, and so long as the United States government does not refuse to derive a considerable part of its revenue from this very industry, the men engaged in that industry should not be branded by the government as citizens of an inferior degree."

Thaw Dodging Deportation After Asylum Escape

An unedifying game of hide-and-seek which one man has been playing with the law and the authorities of two nations will probably be ended, so far as one country is concerned, soon after Harry K. Thaw appears before the full king's bench at Montreal September 15. Ever since 1906, when the rich young man killed Stanford White, the architect, under sensational circumstances, and was committed to the asylum for the criminal insane, he has vainly sought escape through the courts. Despairing of success, he or his friends plotted for him to slip through the gate at Matteawan, New York, from whence he fled by way of Vermont to Canada and was there arrested. Then ensued a legal battle against his deportation to the United States, with writs of habeas corpus and several hearings in different places in Canada. Just as the Canadian immigration officials were on the point of sending him back to the Vermont line a writ from the Montreal court was brought to the Quebec village of Coaticook by special train.

A feature of the proceedings last Friday was the arrest of William T. Jerome, former district attorney of New York City, who prosecuted Thaw in the original murder trial, on the charge of gambling—the gambling being for pennies with some of the numerous newspaper reporters who help to shed publicity on the movements of the notorious criminal lunatic, or former and momentary lunatic, as Thaw describes himself.

—Lord Strathcona, Canadian high commissioner, is said to have indicated what he considers a proper "dead line." It was recently reported that he would retire early in 1914, after reaching his 94th year. His probable successor will be Hon. Clifford Tifton, aged 52. Lord Strathcona's physician says there seems to be no reason why the veteran should not continue working till be reaches the century mark.

—Both legal and popular opinion have recognized Lieutenant Governor Glynn of New York as acting chief executive of the state pending the hearing of the impeachment charges against Governor Sulzer. In behalf of the latter a pamphlet was issued recently asserting that Tammany and Murphy sought to depose him because the governor had uncovered "graft" in various state departments.

Government Sends Temperance Leaders to Milan

The American delegates to the fourteenth international congress on alcoholism, which meets in Milan on the 22d instant, have just been appointed according to law by Secretary of State Bryan and approved by President Wilson. In considerable part the personnel of the delegation is the same as that which went to The Hague on a similar errand two years ago. The members of the commission are as follows:

Dr. E. C. Dinwiddie of Washington, legislative superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League and other temperance organizations; Ernest H. Cherington of Westerville, editor of The American Issue; Father P. J. O'Callaghan, Chicago, president of the Catholic Total Abstinence Union of America; Mrs. Suessa B. Blaine of Ovid, New York, Woman's Christian Temperance Union lecturer; Dr. Arthur J. Barton, Waco, Texas, chairman of the temperance committee of the Southern Baptist Convention; Dr. James Cannon, Jr., Richmond, former superintendent of the Virginia Anti-Saloon League; Professor Charles Scanlon, Pittsburg, superintendent Presbyterian Board of Temperance; Edwin Mulready, Boston, ex-secretary of the Catholic Total Abstinence Union; Judge William Jeff Pollard, St. Louis, who as police judge released drunkards on total abstinence pledge; Dr. Rufus W. Miller of Philadelphia, chairman of the temperance commission of the Federal Council of Churches; Hon. George F. Cotterill, mayor of Seattle and chief templar of the Good Templars of America; Henry T. Laughbaum, Oklahoma City, superintendent Oklahoma Anti-Saloon League; Mrs. Mary H. Armour, Macon, Georgia, Woman's Christian Temperance Union lecturer, and Miss Marie C. Brehm of Pittsburg, lecturer for the Presbyterian Board of Temperance.

Foremost United Presbyterian of His Time

There is no invidious or dubious comparison in saying without qualification that the United Presbyterian Church lost its most eminent figure in the death of Dr. Alexander Gilfillan Wallace, who has recently passed away at the age of 84. Dr. Wallace was already a minister in active service in the Associate Reformed Church when that denomination, fifty-five years ago, combined with the Associate Church to form the United Presbyterian body. In quick succession Dr. Wallace became stated clerk of the General Assembly of the new church, editor of its principal journal, The United Presbyterian, and secretary of the board of church extension. Of these offices he retained the former two until his decease; the latter until two years ago.

In this triple capacity he exercised an influence far transcending that of any other man in the communion, and his encyclopedic knowledge of every detail connected with United Presbyterian history, personnel, organization and statistics could only be compared with that of his compeer in the Presbyterian Church, Stated Clerk William Henry Roberts.

Young People to Endow Bible Chairs

No fewer than 750 young men and women of the United Presbyterian Church gathered in Waterloo, Iowa, for the annual convention of the Young People's Christian Union of their denomination. The reports of Rev. H. A. Kelsey, the general secretary of the organization, show a membership growth in the past year from 26,000 to 31,500. A loving cup given for the best record of advancement during the year was awarded to Chicago Presbytery. Of the 751 societies comprised in the union, 128 are connected also with the Christian Endeavor movement. Besides laying plans to promote mission study and tithing, the convention determined to initiate a movement to endow Bible chairs in each of the five United Presbyterian colleges in the United States. The convention chose as its president George E. Hartsock, a young layman belonging to a country congregation at Sugar Creek, Ohio.

—The absence of work for boys and the evident disinclination in many places for the ministers to work together were some of the outstanding impressions received by the team of the Men and Religion leaders who held meetings in South Africa recently. Boy Scouts have been established in Johannesburg, however, under the care of the Y. M. C. A. there.

Editorial

"I Ought to, but I Can't"

DR. HENRY BULLARD, of sainted memory, used to tell with great glee of a man recounting the hard experiences of a woodchuck. Chased by a dog and in great straits, the animal finally escaped by climbing a tree. But a farmer boy standing by and hearing the story was skeptical. "A woodchuck can't climb a tree!" he objected. The narrator answered, "I know a woodchuck can't climb a tree, but this one had to!"

That story often comes to mind when people are talking about what they ought to do but cannot. If they really felt they ought to do it, if they "had to," they would probably do it. It is not exactly a problem in ethics, for when we say "ought" we do not mean it in the ethical sense. We mean no more, generally, than that we admit it would be a good thing to do, if we only could do it. But even so, the real question is whether we have come to see the debated thing as thoroughly desirable compared with something else which might be given up in its behalf.

There come times when we find we can do all we were sure we could not do. We could not possibly take a day off from business, conditions absolutely forbade it, but when the wife was ill or we slipped on the street and were hurt, we found we could take several days off. When we "had to" we could climb a tree. We could not arrange things so that we could attend prayer meeting, but when we heard that Booker Washington was to speak, there we were on the front seat. We could not possibly go to the Sunday evening service when we work so hard during the week, but if the Hampton singers were to be there we could climb our tree like all the rest. It is altogether a question of whether we thought it was important enough. We can meet emergency opportunities by sufficient effort, and it is fair to wonder if we could not meet common ones if the dog were near enough, and if we felt we simply "had to."

Have not our ministerial brethren often heard each other remark, "Oh, I know I ought to read more, but I simply cannot do it; I have not read a new book for ever so long"? When a brother says he has just been reading this or that new book, which he says is really worth while, it is common for others to say, "I don't see how you can do it; I can't find time to read any more in these day of committees and parish work!" And it is all true. No minister can find time to read in these days unless he feels he "has to." But we are bound to think that any minister can find time for it if he counts it important enough, if he sees that he simply cannot keep abreast of the movements of the gospel in these moving days of thought and action without reading.

Sometimes we have wondered if it is not possible to show a bit of affectation in the familiar word about being too busy to read. Of course a minister is busy about something all the time. Most men are, who are worth their salt, as ministers supremely are. But that proves nothing about the comparative value of the things they may do and the things they may leave undone. We commend to our brethren the parable of the woodchuck and suggest that they look behind to see if the dog is not near enough, so that they had better climb the tree, even if they cannot.

That same word is often used about Bible study. We know we ought to read or study our Bibles more, but we cannot; we never can seem to find the time or the chance for it. And that is true. The man who in these days can "find" time for anything is in an unusual position. Most men have to make time for the things they count most important to do, and they can do it as soon as they really think they must. The trouble lies far deeper than our busy days—it is in our busy hearts. As soon as we think Bible study important enough we will make the time for it—not all the time we may wish, but enough time so that our hearts will feel free about our duty. At any rate, we can be on our guard against talking piously about what we ought to do but cannot, when we mean only that we see our duty, but are not earnest enough about it to make a way to do it.

There Will Have to Be a Decisive Decision

Compromise may be a happy spring of harmony among comrades or it may be a source of dissension—according to the kind of compromise it is. Unluckily for its work, the Board of Home Missions at New York is in position to explain the difference between kinds. And it knows now that at the last Assembly it chose wrongly.

Wholesome compromise is effected when both sides to a controversy consciously yield something in order to compose an agreement which all concerned may be content with. Mischievous compromise results from cultivating ambiguities in hope that each party will quiet down in the satisfied idea that it has obtained everything it insisted on. Temporary truces with an abundance of love feasting may be thus achieved, but when the contenders later try to enforce their supposed victories over one another, the old troubles break out again aggravated by the new misunderstanding. Vastly better than this, if there is no other alternative, is an honest "finish fight," which has the not-to-be-ignored virtue of leaving somebody well aware that he is licked.

Congratulations that the critics of the Home Board and its officers "got together" at Atlanta and avoided a battle on the floor of Assembly might have been seen even then to be ill based. Now it is doubly evident. The parties had agreed in committee that "as soon as practicable" the departments of country life and Indian missions, as well as the district superintendencies, should be discontinued. And thus the Assembly passed the order. Such as ventured to ask when that "practicable" date was due to arrive were promptly frowned upon; the board's assailants believed it was immediately at hand; the board's defenders that it could be postponed till the thirty-second day of the calendar's thirteenth month; for anybody to have tried in definite terms to judge between them would have started a fight after all. So in the hollow peace of a great uncertainty the Assembly went home. But the peace has already collapsed.

The air is even now torn with wild complainings against the board because it has not yet found "practicable" what its secretaries do not think practicable at all. The old argument therefore returns intensified. Manifestly there is just one way to settle it, and that is to debate the question out to the end, bitter or otherwise, and decide in the plainest of unmistakable legislative action by Assembly whether the church does or does not wish these criticised features of the board's work to be carried forward. Such a decision must on no account be delayed later than the Chicago Assembly of next spring. The church cannot longer than that endure the strain of ambiguous peacemaking.

For one reason only is the delay until then a benefit. By the time the Assembly of 1914 meets, the church will have the advantage of a report from the board's own committee on revised policies. It is to be trusted that that report will satisfy all the incidental criticisms which inevitably attach to any administrative enterprise as vast as the home mission work of the Presbyterian Church U. S. A. But that the tenor of it will be progressive in the general lines of the board's existing methods can hardly be doubted. Nor does The Continent doubt that the church is prepared so to sustain the board.

That would, we are confident, have been the result had the question been pushed to a clear-cut determination at Atlanta. The Southern Assembly there was better advised. It drove its questions through to decision in every case, and in every case, although the personnel of the body was reputed to be unusually conservative, the progressive side won. This is no time for progressives to dread trying out the issue of their own causes.

Playing Private Secretary to a Dusky Monarch

Dan Crawford, the twenty-two-years-without-a-furlough missionary to Africa, who is now in the United States, is a member of the Plymouth Brethren, a sect which strenuously holds it wrong to pay anybody money for preaching the gospel. And Crawford has lived up to the letter of that scruple. He went out to Africa without the backing of any mission board and has never been in receipt of salary checks from home. He simply presented himself to the African natives as their guest, and when they cared for him enough to entertain him, he stayed and lived with them, helping them with their town building and agriculture in a way which, he has good reason to feel, paid for his keep.

Fortunately for Crawford, he early received the favor of a powerful African chieftain, Mushidi—an emperor, indeed, judged by the size and population of his despotic realm. This potentate was so lofty and proud that he would not condescend to eat with even the greatest of his own retainers. But the coming of the white stranger offered the negro tyrant a welcome opportunity to relieve the loneliness of his table without compromising his royal exclusiveness toward his own people. So Crawford stayed with Mushidi many years, becoming the king's "private secretary," as passing travelers phrased it. The missionary sorrowfully confesses that he was not able to convert his dusky patron to religion, but he had the satisfaction of mitigating many of the horrid cruelties which Mushidi was practicing on his people when his self-bidden Scotch guest arrived.

In an interview with Dr. William E. Barton, editor of The Advance, Mr. Crawford admitted that even in that conversation he was talking English, his native tongue, as a foreigner. That is, he was thinking out his sentences in Bantu, the language of his field in Africa, and translating them into words which his interviewer understood. So he delivers, it appears, his public addresses. This complete transfer of all his intellectual processes to an African base is what the missionary means by the title of his wonderfully racy and scintillating autobiography, "Thinking Black."

And he will not admit that he has lost anything by learning to "think black." The language of the Bantus is, in Crawford's opinion, incomparably richer than English. Its grammar has thirty-three tenses, ten voices, nineteen genders. All names of long things are in one gender, all names of short things in another, and so on. The achievement of which the Scotchman is proudest is the rendering of the entire Bible into the complicated idiom of this tongue.

Twenty-four years ago young Crawford had tuberculosis and was under necessity of getting away from damp Scotland to a warm climate. And he passionately admired Livingstone. Those two circumstances took him to Africa. Today he is sound in body through and through. And the world calls him Livingstone's successor.

"They Still Bring Forth Fruit in Old Age"

The Continent a few weeks ago spoke of the long reach of the life of Dr. Elisha W. Stoddard of New Jersey, back into the early decades of the nineteenth century. But Dr. Stoddard is not the senior active Presbyterian preacher of this date. That honor seems to belong to Dr. David Tully of Media, Pennsylvania, who has just celebrated his ninety-fifth birthday, and who still defies the tradition that an aged minister is entitled to rest. It is plain that there is going to be no rest for Dr. Tully this side of the heavenly land, and his strong-paced foot is not yet on the threshold of his departure from this world.

Since he passed his ninetieth birthday Dr. Tully has organized and built up a new church near his home, and the congregation has loyally and appropriately taken his name; so that even now it is known as the Tully Memorial church. Wiseacres cautiously warn against the danger of giving any institution the name of a living man, lest he may ere his death discredit the title. But all will agree that from Dr. Tully's case such a fear is as far away as the East is from the West, and the church which already bears his name is but an earnest of the honor in which his long life and abundant works are sure to be commemorated for many a generation to come.

If Dr. Tully is indeed the oldest active minister of the church, he is not the oldest Presbyterian church official, for Dr. William H. Wishard, ruling elder in one of the Indianapolis congregations, is 98, and his vitality bids fair to carry him over the century mark alive and active. Dr. Wishard has not only served the Lord conspicuously well in his own person, but even more in a family of devoted children who in world and church have followed faithfully the footsteps of his stalwart Christian example.

—Dr. A. J. McKelway of the national child labor committee was, we believe, the first Presbyterian clergyman invited to preach the annual sermon before the National Conference of Charities and Correction. And all reports from Seattle, where the conference met this year, indicate that the historic preaching reputation of the Presbyterian ministry was fully upheld by this strong and spirited southerner. Professor Graham Taylor, commenting on the sermon in The Survey, says: "His eloquence, warm-heartedness and exalted loyalty to religious ideals and standards so suffused and tempered and balanced his criticism of the church as to take out of it all the sting. Not within the memory of any of us has the justice, kindness and religion of all the churches been borne closer home to the heart and conscience of social workers than in this sermon."

—The opinion of The Continent that the antiunionists of Tennessee would learn from their lawyers that they were simply marching to certain defeat if they went up to higher courts on the publishing house case was unexpectedly confirmed by the quick surrender of the property to its rightful owners, although the Cumberland Presbyterian remnant might have delayed the capitulation by two more appeals. This is an obvious acknowledgment that the legal aspects of church union are settled. There is no longer any doubt that the federal courts will maintain any church union which is carried out according to the prescribed law of the denominations uniting.

—The last Indian appropriation bill passed by Congress provides for a commission of three senators and three house members sitting jointly to investigate the whole management of the Indian bureau and its agencies. The commission ought to find out among other things whether the Roman Catholic schools which the federal government has taken over into its Indian system are or are not being conducted yet as sectarian institutions. People who know definitely of instances where public money seems to be still used to teach superstitious Roman ceremonial should offer their testimony to the commission. And even more important, all who know of cases where the Indians are being grafted on by avaricious whites should send clews of evidence. The injustice which has so long kept the Pima Indians of Arizona out of irrigation privileges for their farms is being investigated separately, but it is to be hoped that the special commission will look into that subject also.

—Though it is common to say that America's reading habits are depreciating, an observant eye cannot help noting that philanthropic business men of the sort that would never be suspected of any fetish worship for literature show more and more confidence in the good they can do by distributing books. It is remarkable how frequent are recent instances of men giving away in great quantities volumes large and small which have impressed them with messages that they want to see scattered. Gerald Stanley Lee's "Crowds" is being thus circulated by an admirer of it. So, too, George S Dayton, a Presbyterian layman of Minneapolis, sent out to Minnesota ministers an invitation to come to his office and get free copies of Miss Laughlin's "Penny Philanthropist," Mr. Knowles's "Undertow" and Dr. Hillis's "Fortune of the Republic." The giver asked no recompense save that each recipient should read all of them "slowly, thoughtfully, meditatively, and give the world the benefit of any thoughts suggested." Very apparently there are some live people still alive who do not think the printed page has lost its force or its opportunity.

—Dr. J. B. Gambrell, editor of The Baptist Standard at Dallas, Texas, writes to The Continent denying our remark that Mr Napier was "hooted off the platform" of the Southern Baptist Convention at St. Louis when he argued that Baptists ought to participate in the union missionary college at Nanking. Dr. Gambrell says that the St. Louis daily papers exaggerated the incident, and that in point of fact Mr. Napier stayed on the platform and finished his address. But our courteous corrector acknowledges that the speaker was clamorously interrupted by a vehement chorus of "noes," though, we are told, not without some approval intermingling. Dr Gambrell frankly says that he regrets the disorder. And The Continent continues to feel no less than before that such a reception for a suggestion so enlightened and rational constitutes a grievous reproach against the denomination which the St. Louis convention represents.

—The Episcopalian commission which has made public the plans for a pension for retired clergymen which it will submit to the next Episcopal General Convention aims at a graded pension, calculated by a percentage relation to the salary a man has received during his active service. This, of course, signifies that a rector who has served rich churches will get a great deal more pension than the rector who has served poor churches. It would seem to be a safe prediction that no plan of that kind will ever get through a church legislature where the spirit of Christian brotherhood prevails. Here at least is a place where even Episcopalians will have to practice the parity of the ministry, or if they are going to make any distinction, will be compelled to give the bigger pensions to ministers who have served the poorer churches and so have had less opportunity to lay up in store for old age.

—There is no state in the union where the liquor traffic is more deeply intrenched than in Pennsylvania. But there is no daily paper in Pennsylvania more prosperous than The Philadelphia North American, which is out and out against the saloons. Lately it said in comment on the prohibition law in Kansas: "Yes, something is the matter with Kansas. And in view of the effect in the Sunflower state, there is little wonder that an increasing number of persons believe that this nation will be past the most dangerous rocks in its course when the thing that is the matter with Kansas is the matter with every square mile of territory from Eastport to San Diego and from Walla Walla to Key West." It is certainly a sign of the force of straightforwardness that a newspaper which talks this way is too strong to be broken down even in Pennsylvania.

—West Point is to have a new chaplain in the person of Rev H. P. Silver, an Episcopalian clergyman from Topeka. Mr. Silver served some years ago as army chaplain in the Philippines and has since done vigorous missionary work for his church in the West There has been room for improvement in the chaplaincy at West Point, both as to spirituality and as to earnestness, and it is to be hoped that Mr. Silver will bring the improvement.

DR. JOWETT'S MESSAGE

As to Modern Snares

SNARES are always about our feet. They vary in their guise, but their purpose remains unchanged. We are enticed through apparent innocence into bondage. Through some inviting fragrance we are seduced into a trap. By the bewitching strains of the sirens we are led on to the destructive rocks. I want to look at a few of the perils which thus beset the youth of our modern life. There is the snare of materialism. I speak of it not as a theory but as a life. A young fellow comes from some secluded village to the congested life of a large town. He is impressed by the breathless, impetuous pace, the feverish competition, the unconditioned concentration of material gaze. He is caught in the passion, and is whirled along in its grasp. What happens? Let me give a concrete example. Many years ago I was intimate with a fine, sensitive, altruistic young fellow, whose thought and energy were unselfishly devoted to large and noble ends. He went into business, began to make money, acquired a taste for it, but at last became possessed by a voracious greed. It absorbed his thought, it transformed his conversation, it claimed every power in his life. He asked me to go and preach at a certain place, and mentioned as his motive that the service might be the means of enlarging his business!

Now I call that a materialized life. He had become the victim of the "god of this world." And this materialism has certain inevitable consequences. It leads to the atrophy of the æsthetic powers of the life—"he hath blinded their eyes." It leads also to the petrifaction of the moral powers; the emotions are "shaken into frost"; the conscience loses its fine grip, and eventually becomes insensitive in all fine discernment. In Watt's "Mammon" there is a great pompous figure in heavy scarlet and gold. His face is fat and sightless. Brutal hands and feet are resting carelessly on the godlike figures of the young. The bloated materialistic presence has the ears of an ass, indicating that he is powerful but imbecile. That is the materialistic life, the worship of naked gain, the pursuit of carnal power and the unconsidered crushing of all the ethereal elements in our richly dowered being. It is one of the most insidious snares of the devil in our time.

Embittered Doubts Beset the Sophisticated

And there is the snare of cynicism. In our childhood we live and move in an atmosphere of happy confidence and trust. All things are just what they seem. We see everybody's front door; indeed, nobody has a back door! Everything is simple; nothing is double. There are no subtle convolutions hiding secret things. That is the very sweetness of childhood. And in that sunny land there are no cynics.

But this is how the cynic is made. First of all, we discover our own duplicity. There comes a momentous day when I discover that I am putting in the shop window of my life goods of a different quality from what I keep in my warehouse. It dawns upon me that I am leading a double life—that appearances say one thing when the reality is quite another. And then I begin to wonder if others are the same. I read myself into them, and at last I discover a man in some duplicity. A little veneer peels away, and I discover common deal. I get a glimpse behind the man of prayer, and I find the hypocrite. At the back of his churchly face I discover a fox.

Now a double discovery of this kind is apt to embitter a man, and he becomes a cynic. He regards all men as untrustworthy, and he regards every virtuous appearance as proceeding from a foul root. He does not go about on holy quest, looking for jewels; he moves about with the expectation of everywhere finding things ugly and repulsive. He sees that somebody has given a handsome subscription, and he immediately makes the comment, "Title!" He sees that Dr. So-and-So has become a regular attendant at such a church and he adds the interpretation, "Practice!" He finds that this or that man is seeking parliamentary honors, and he finds the explanation is "Directorships!" So-and-So has taken to preaching; "What is he after now?"

I call this a horrible pit. The man who fosters the cynical spirit converts his world into a charnel house. It is the very opposite of the Christian spirit. "Whatsoever things are lovely, think on these things." "Don't bark against the bad, but chant the beauty of the good." But here is the peril, here is the awful Nemesis that awaits the cynic—he so habituates himself to the exploration of the ugly that he utterly loses his power to discern and appreciate the beautiful and the good. When a man becomes a cynic you may write upon his life "Ichabod," for "the glory hath departed."

And there is the snare of superficialism. There is the peril of moving and abiding upon the superficies, of being contented with the surface waters, the shallow but by no means crystal pools which lie here and there in the common ways. The modern newspaper is too frequently a minister of superficialism. The peril is suggested in the names of many of the weeklies which burden the stalls at the railway station. Everything is dished up in scraps and bits and fragments. Our papers rarely give us a joint to cut at, something solid and satisfying. "The readers would not stand it now!" No, and there is where I think is the peril. It is most unhealthy, and the primary trouble is that we are fostering habits of superficial judgment which will impair and impoverish the entire life.

The peril is not less obtrusive when we turn from popular papers to popular books. Am I too severe in my estimate when I say that if you take the first half dozen readers of your acquaintance you will not find more than one out of six who has regularly in hand some solid work, which requires slow mastication and quiet digestion, and which will provide nutriment amid the sterner struggles of life's march?

The same peril prevails when we turn to the realm of modern pleasures. I know that "one man's meat is another man's poison"; I know, too, that pleasure should be a relaxation—that it need not demand the mental concentration of a game of chess; and yet, the best pleasure is found in the best things. We are not going to find the purest delight in the first shallow puddles on the road. If we do find our delights in the puddles, it is either because we have degenerated or have never yet attained. The most sparkling delights are found in purity; the lasting satisfactions, as well as the most inspiring relaxations, are found in things "that are excellent," in the highest and the best. It is in this, as in all other matters, it is the best that pays.

Fellowship with God and Good a Sure Defense

How can we be lifted above these modern perils? I have nothing new to say. I can only burnish commonplaces, but they are commonplaces which, if accepted, will redeem and glorify the life. Here, then, are my counsels:

Seek height of fellowship, and begin with the highest of the heights, even with the Lord himself. Snares have no power over the intimate friends of the Lord. If I could but lead you to him I should have no fear when you are walking on the perplexing or bewitching road.

> "'Twill save you from a thousand snares
> To mind religious things."

Seek the fellowship of the saints. Make friends of noble and chivalrous people. If you cannot find them in actual life, then seek their companionship in noble books.

Seek depths of noble service. The indolent are never safe.

Seek breadth of outlook Read the best books. Take notes of the best books, and incarnate their best teachings. Give your mind good, nutritious bread. Do not live on sops and scraps. Sit down to a great book, and have a square meal.

"Satan finds some mischief still for idle hands to do." Accept no rest which leaves you without service. Find some congenial sphere, begin work, and hold fast to the thing; and by friendship with the Lord, and by serving your fellow men, and by feeding yourselves on good books, by reverence for body and mind, you will be delivered from all encompassing snares. J. H. JOWETT.

Sunday Observance in Paris

BY HENRY M. HALL

FRANCE, although nominally in religion Roman Catholic, is alleged to be at least two-thirds agnostic, or "free thinking." In the revolution of 1789 the Sabbath was abolished by the free thinkers of that period and a holiday in honor of the "goddess of reason" established instead to occur every ten days. As a "rest day," every seven days was finally decided to be the true need of man's nature, as well as of the Hebrew law. Napoleon in 1806 reestablished the former calendar and seventh day Sabbath. Recently the French chamber of deputies has passed a remarkable law respecting the workman's right to one day's rest from weekly toil by a majority of 500 to 2. The law also provided that the rest day should be, whenever possible, on Sunday, thus establishing by law the present Christian Sabbath. Such a law was much needed for the benefit of France as a whole, as well as for the working classes, for the good reason that seven days' continuous labor had made the French workman prematurely old; and also so reduced the general vitality of the common people as to prevent any increase in the population for many generations.

In Paris most of the smaller retail stores, I notice, are open Sunday mornings, but nearly all close during the afternoons. The wholesale stores and offices and the large department stores are all generally closed upon the Sabbath. All the museums, art galleries and theaters are open on Sundays, although the former close an hour earlier upon that day. "The Louvre," that has over two miles of galleries, is generally more crowded with visitors on Sabbath afternoons than upon any other day. It is not only a delightful resort in which to spend a few hours daily but the Louvre is a school of instruction and inspiration as well as of continued interest to every attentive mind.

If the leisure population and pleasure loving classes of this gay city could be persuaded to visit the Louvre, and the many other museums that abound, instead of sitting by thousands and hundreds of thousands at eating and drinking tables all Sunday afternoon long, guzzling colored liquors and ruining their health by such other abominations, it would work a transformation in mind and customs that might regenerate Paris society.

What "Country Life" Means

BY WARREN H. WILSON

Dr. Wilson, who is superintendent of the department of church and country life of the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions, here discusses some of the questions which have been raised in connection with that work

WITH the growing interest in rural institutions the voices which speak for the country are many, and misunderstandings arise. The position of the Presbyterian department of church and country life in regard to the duty and office of the country church requires a clear statement.

Many misstatements have come to us—that the department holds that "the minister ought to teach the farmer how to farm"; "the minister ought to go to an agricultural college rather than to the seminary," and "it does not matter whether the farmer has any religion, if he only has some good land," are among the misstatements of the department's position which it is important to correct.

The three ministers who speak for the department have been country pastors. We hold, each of us, that the minister has no time to till the land or to teach others how to till the land. Each of the speakers for the department advocates the care of folks, and not the care of animals or vegetables, as the work of the minister. Furthermore, in the discussion as to the place of the agricultural college, the department has always taken the ground that while students from the agricultural college ought to go into the ministry as well as students from the classical college, they should go through the theological seminary. We have held from the beginning that the seminary occupies a central place in the training of men for the ministry and that the church has no substitute for the seminary.

Church Concerned with Welfare of Community

In the country life institutes held by the department of one and two days' length the speakers are selected by the local pastor. Generally speaking, they represent every interest concerned, as the church is, with the welfare and uplifting of the country community. Thus superintendents of country schools are included, agricultural college lecturers, expert farmers and advocates of farm cooperation. Grangers and country merchants are regularly on these programs. Each man is selected for Christian character as well as for the content of his message. Generally these speakers seize the occasion to advocate federation of churches and other purely religious adaptations. Very seldom do they talk on a topic proper to the farmers' institute, and only in two instances do I recall an address from these men on the methods of farming or on the problems of tillage of the soil. The addresses and the discussion in the conferences and institutes are all in the field of community organization and have to do with the human beings, not with the crops. We do not discuss in these institutes property questions, but human questions.

The reason for the topics having to do with economic life is this: The country church finds it almost impossible to sustain a minister. The problem of his support is its greatest difficulty. Farmers explain this by their own difficulty in getting a living, and all leaders of country life recognize that the economic crisis now transforming country life is the cause of the difficulty in maintaining rural institutions. There is no special religious decline in the country in contrast to the city. There is no lack of intelligence in the country as contrasted to the city. The trouble in the country is a bad organization of the life of the people, which has its effects upon educational, and very markedly upon religious, institutions.

The trouble with the country church is the same as that which makes the farmer's sons and daughters, indeed the farmer's whole family, leave the country community. If we may have the people, we can promise the churches. If the community will remain whole, the church will remain intact, but the exodus from the country explains the decadence of the country church.

This exodus is due in the largest way to economic changes. It is for this reason that in all the work of the department of church and country life we are concerning ourselves with the vital desire of country people for a better living.

The Ancient and the Modern Rural Exodus

The Old Testament was written in just such a critical period as the present. The Hebrews came out of Egypt for the same reason as causes the rural exodus today. Their troubles were economic. They sought a living. They were promised a land. This necessitated a profoundly thorough religious leadership. The leadership of Moses, greatest of prophets; the priesthood of Aaron, the military administration of Joshua and his followers, had very largely to do with questions of land as they affect a people. These problems were so thoroughly dealt with that to the Hebrews their land became "holy." It is even to us today a "holy" land. Almost every one of the prophets was forced to cry out against iniquities that had to do with economic affairs. Country preachers today are dealing with these same questions. Their prayer and their preaching are engaged in the profound struggle to make the life of country people spiritual, which tends by the burden upon them to be purely material. It is the same spiritual struggle through which the Hebrews went and out of which came the Old Testament Scriptures.

Country pastors are very few. In Ohio "where three farmers out of ten are absentees, nine ministers out of ten are absentees." Wherever the pastor is in the country the evangelistic power of the church is twice that which the church has without a pastor. The pastors of country churches are bearing these great burdens of economic struggle upon their hearts. The men who live out in the country with the farmer in a remarkable degree are undertaking the study of the vital concerns of the farmer. Some few of these men have become students of agriculture and are actually advising the farmer as to the problems of tilling the soil. Such men are very rare. But a greater number are undertaking the culture of the young, the furnishing of recreation, and in some places of education itself, to the young people of the community. A larger number are engaged in the social life of the community, as leaders and promoters of a purer and better social life. But in almost every successful country church the pastor is a leader in lifting the burden of the common problem of living.

Country Life Undergoing a Great Revival

Country life is undergoing a great providential revival. Without such revival the world cannot be fed, for the means of subsistence are falling short of the growth of population in all the European and American world. The United States is the granary of America and of Europe. The American people are turning from the farm. Those who remain are not increasing the product of their acres. Profound discontent, moreover, affects the country church and tends to depress the life of the rural home. This shows itself in a smaller number of men going into the ministry, in the weakening of the piety and devotion of the whole church and in the fear of the future among those who look out upon the Protestant churches. For the city is filled with Catholics, but the American country community is Protestant and American born. The hope of the nation is in the rural community.

It remains for the churches to say whether this revival shall be purely material, or whether it shall be translated into spiritual power. Just at this time the agricultural colleges, the state and national governments are, through their representatives, turning to the churches and calling upon them to lead in this country life movement, because the most essential thing in the revival of country life in America is the providing of motive. There is intelligence enough and there is reason enough for country betterment that shall accomplish the uplift of the whole country population, but the motive is not there. This is the task of the minister of religion. The appeal to the spirit and the awakening of moral and spiritual purpose are the special function of those who lead in the name of Christ. When this spiritual awakening shall come the country church will first of all be revived. Until country life has enjoyed such general revival, the institution which most of all reflects the feeling of country people will languish. In that great revival it, too, will be awakened and will take again its place of power and of leadership among the churches.

What It Meant to Fight at Chickamauga

BY DUNCAN C. MILNER

THE FIFTIETH anniversary of the battle of Chickamauga falls September 19 and 20. It is considered the greatest battle in the West of the civil war. Of it John Fiske said: "In its dimensions and murderousness the battle of Chickamauga was the greatest battle fought by our western armies and one of the greatest of modern times." The results of the battle are still a subject of controversy. It is claimed as a Confederate victory, because that army held the battlefield at its close. It is also asserted that it was at least a drawn battle, because the union troops kept possession of Chattanooga, a great gateway to the South and the objective point of the campaign.

Duncan C. Milner, D. D.

I was adjutant of the 98th regiment of Ohio volunteer infantry, belonging to Mitchell's brigade, Steedmån's division of the reserve corps of the army of the Cumberland. Our command was sent on a reconnoitering expedition the first day of the battle to find out if Longstreet and his corps from Lee's army had arrived. They proved their presence by shelling our camp. Sunday the battle was renewed. The right wing of the union army was crushed and driven back to Chattanooga. General George H. Thomas commanded the left, and in face of one of the greatest onslaughts of the war held his position, and by his stubborn courage held the field and won the title "the rock of Chickamauga."

General Granger, in command of the reserve corps, moved by the fierce sounds of battle, decided to go without orders, and we made a rapid march of about four miles. General Steedman led our division at General Thomas's direction and there was a fierce conflict resulting in the repulse of the Confederates.

"Like Two Railroad Trains Coming Together"

General Garfield in describing the attack led by General Steedman said "the shock was like that of two railroad trains coming together." In that first charge, lasting about twenty minutes, our command lost 20 per cent in killed and wounded, and in the four hours of fighting during the afternoon the loss was nearly 50 per cent.

Seven companies of my regiment were in the battle. Captain M. J. Urquhart was in command and a few minutes after we entered the fight he was disabled by a musket shot that cost him a leg. As adjutant it was my duty to notify the next senior captain to take command. I found Captain Armstrong J. Thomas, a noble young man, who had been a teacher in an academy. While I was giving him the orders a bullet entered his eye and passed through his brain and he dropped dead at my feet. I then carried the orders to Captain Lochary, who was killed at a later time.

We were ordered to move farther to the right on Missionary ridge. I was at the rear of the regiment directing the men and urging stragglers to get into line. I heard a voice saying, "Adjutant, for God's sake, help me!" I found a young man from Scotch Ridge, near my home. He had been wounded slightly and stepped behind a tree to bind up his wound and was again struck by a fragment of a shell. He was perfectly helpless. I could only say, "My poor fellow, God only can help you," and left him. In a few moments I saw a mounted officer galloping toward us and when a few yards away he fell from his horse. I hastened to him, and as I turned him over found it was Captain Russell, Granger's chief of staff. He was breathing his last from a mortal wound.

We now entered upon further fierce fighting, charging the enemy back and forth on the ridge. During a lull of the battle I found a young Confederate soldier lying within our lines. I asked him if I could serve him. He answered that he was mortally wounded and courteously thanked me. I found a blanket and put under his head and gave him a drink of water and left him to die. I record this to show that there was no bitterness between the soldiers, and this fact should increase our hatred of war.

Thrown from Horse by Concussion

I had the experience of being knocked from my horse by the concussion of a shell. I went heels over head down the hill. When I was helped to my feet no wound was found and the stunned and dazed feeling soon passed away. A bullet grazed my temple and cut the band of my hat and pierced the crown. In the last charge of the battle I was shot. A minie ball passed through the large bone of my left forearm. Just after this orders came to fall back to Rossville. The boys made a tourniquet with a bayonet and handkerchief and stopped the flowing of blood. A comrade had me put my right arm around his shoulders and another comrade took my left side. We took step together and marched in the darkness through the woods until we came to the Ross cabin, where I spent the night. The next day I was taken to Chattanooga. The surgeons advised amputation. A crushed arm, with very limited supplies, suggested the operation, but I was told if I could get some place where I could have favorable surroundings and care the arm might be saved. The railroad bridge north had been burned and all supplies had to come by wagon. I was so anxious to get home that I rode my horse in company with a guarded wagon train over the Walden ridge and through the Sequatchie valley nearly seventy miles. It was a fearful experience, but my intense anxiety to get to my home sustained me.

I came near death twice from my wound as a result of gangrene and erysipelas, suggesting the lack of antiseptic treatment in those days. Fragments of bone worked out of my arm for a long time, the last one eleven years after the battle, when I was a pastor in Kansas City, Missouri.

The first person professing conversion under my ministry was Gabriel Lilly of Osceola, Missouri, who had been a Confederate soldier in Longstreet's corps, who were our immediate opponents at Chickamauga.

My war experience seems now like a fearful dream. I hate war as a horrible thing and rejoice at the prospects that the nations of the world are getting ready to settle their differences on the basis of Christian principle and not by human slaughter.

She Caught Them That Time

They were talking of the vanity of women and one of the few ladies present undertook a defense.

"Of course," she said, "I admit that women are vain, and men are not. Why," she added, with a glance around, "the necktie of the handsomest man in the room is even now up the back of his collar."

And then she smiled—for every man present had put his hand up behind his neck!

Odd Bits of Humor

Lawyer—"The cross-examination did not seem to worry you. Have you had any previous experience?"

Client—"Six children."

Mrs. Towne—"Have you had this set of china long?"

Mrs. Suburbs—"Let me see; I've had it just four girls and a half."

The White Glove

BY MABEL A. McKEE

THE PRESIDENT looked expectantly at the one lady member of the school board. Since she had forced her way into their number the male members had given her certain privileges, one of the least being that she make all motions to adjourn. It was for this motion they were now waiting, after four heavy hours of disputing, bickering and wrangling over just how much of the city's money they could spend on a building for the higher education of the city's youth. When Dr. Brown touched Mrs. Wildy on the arm, she arose and began: "When the first white man was created he was given the earth; when the first negro was cursed and colored he was given any part of the earth that the white man did not want. Whatever we have that is of no value to ourselves we give to the negroes; tonight we decided to give them the old school building. I move that we select a suitable site in the hollow and there erect a new school building for the colored children."

The other members groaned as they looked at the clock. It was after midnight; they had already exhausted their stock of words in argument. But the little woman was adamant; she had been duly elected by the people and she would have her rights. Then her vote was the deciding vote when the two factions battled. So they recalled the flow of adjectives that they had employed earlier in the evening and the struggle was renewed.

Mrs. Wildy's most bitter opponent was Dr. Brown, who argued that he had never known any good to come out of the education of negroes. "Do you believe that they will appreciate a new building—that they will be grateful for it?" he asked.

"Grateful to whom?" asked Mrs. Wildy. "They are paying or are helping pay for it."

"Well, I've never seen any gratitude from one of that race," grumbled the doctor.

At exactly 1 o'clock the White faction voted for a new building; at ten minutes past 1 Mrs. Wildy, smiling over her victory, left the building. The Brown faction remained to express its opinion of the whole procedure; to tell the White faction that it would be opposed in all future measures, and to discourse on the ingratitude of that race which the white man persisted in making servants.

For a week the white children talked of nothing but the new high school; then came the flower parade. But down in the hollow the children of Ham looked with veneration on the little lot the school board had purchased for the colored children's school. The boys stopped playing in the commons, brought their soapbox express wagons and hauled away the rubbish from the lot. They carried water to the workmen; they picked up all the stray nails and carried them to the contractor; they held the already secure ladders on which painters worked; they guarded the building from early morning until late at night; and they severely dealt with those who tried to carry away blocks of wood or broken bricks. On circus day there were few colored boys who viewed the parade, and on Fourth of July there were no fireworks within four squares of the new building. One morning it rained and work on the building was stopped for the day. When the contractor happened to come back in the afternoon he found an old ragged comfort stretched like a tent above the box of lime; the tent poles were six sturdy little negro boys, one of whom proudly explained to the amazed contractor, "We ain't gwine to have it burn down foh it's done built."

They thought the contractor was the most wonderful person in the world and deemed serving him the highest honor that could befall them. They almost worshiped the workmen; the workmen liked them. "Why," exclaimed one young carpenter, "I love these little black faces! When I see the way they regard us I feel honored in being allowed to work on this temple."

To Eva Bell Brown it was a temple; yes, even more—it was the ark of the covenant. She had said the morning after the purchase of the lot: "Mammy, I'm goin' to that high school; I'm goin' to graderate; I'm goin' to teach down heah in fo' mo' years."

So Mrs. Brown went proudly to her washtub and Eva Bell went to high school. Mrs. Brown said nothing to her daughter when the flour was low or all the coal they owned was in the bucket. Whenever her back stiffened with rheumatism and her arms ached she went to the window and gazed at the little green building and prayed, "O God, let my little gal git dere!"

Eva, too, had her periods of anguish. Then she went down to the little schoolhouse. Her God was established in the cupola; her altar was the stone steps. Here she poured out her heart when some girl had been particularly cruel; here she asked help to endure the teacher's sarcasm—it seemed as if she received the majority of it—and here she implored aid for her hardest lessons. She always arose from those steps with a feeling of peace. Then she would walk around the building and peer through the windows. She endured great anguish the day that she discovered that some of the desks were being marked; that the glossy black finish was being washed from the blackboard and that there were three dents in the stovepipe. She cried bitter tears when she saw that one white teacher—there was a new white teacher in the little building every month—had left a flower pot in the window until, when it was removed, there was a great blistered spot on the sill. She kept count of the number of teachers; she estimated their probable salary; and she knew exactly how many years, months and days it would be before she could stand in that holy place. She never doubted her receiving the position, for long ago the board had decided to give the school to the first colored girl who could fill it. She was the only colored girl who was preparing herself for it, and the white teachers spoke of their sojourn there as their "probation in Hades."

There were tears in her mother's eyes as she stood beside Eva Bell four years after they had made their decision about Eva Bell's career. They were looking at a sheer white dress on the bed.

"You got the nices' dress as any," said her mother.

"It's lovely," said the girl, simply.

"Don' you like it?" anxiously asked the mother.

"It's beautiful," she replied.

"Look at dese here gloves. Ain' dey gran'? I got dem fo' a quatah at a sale."

Here she held up a pair of thin white silk gloves and waited for her daughter's approval, but none came. Then she heard a low, suppressed sob and she knew that Eva Bell was crying. Taking her in her arms she cried, "Oh, Eva Bell, why ain' you happy? Yo' eddication is over and you is goin' to teach. Tell mammy what is de mattah."

"Mother," the girl burst out, "it seems awful. I've been through four years of suffering and now I've got to spend two more hours in torment. It sounds ungrateful to tell you, but they're so mean up there. The girls don't want to sit by me at commencement tonight. They say I'll look just like a blackberry in a pan of milk. Mr. Curry saw that something was the matter and then he arranged our seats in alphabetical order. That puts me between Don Brown and Dave Carter."

"Dave Carter will treat you nice." And her mother smiled, for she had been his nurse.

"Yes, mother, but Don Brown. Mr. Dole used to call the roll in alphabetical order in botany, and after he would call Don Brown's name, and before he could call mine, the boys around would whisper, 'and wife.' Then he got to calling me his wife to the boys. He will make me miserable tonight. I wish I could get my diploma without going."

She saw the disappointed look on her mother's face and remembered the past; she knew that though she would spend the two hours in misery, her mother would spend them in paradise—a paradise that she had built by the labor of her own hands. Shame over her seeming ingratitude smote her. "Mammy dear, forgive me!" she cried. "It's been nothing for me like it has been for you. Come on, honey, and help me get dressed."

"Don' put on yo' gloves until you git dere," said mammy, after the dressing was completed and a new Eva Bell stood before the mirror. "You sure would git dem dirty an' dey is col' and thin. Jus' slip on yo' ol' mitts."

"I don't care if it is cold," cried the girl. "I'm glad it's January instead of June, for I can begin teaching Monday. You know what the board said, and I am the first girl to graduate. I'm going tomorrow to tell them I am ready. Why, I have to go to see Don Brown's father; he's president of the school board. Oh, mother——"

Then her mother had to reassure her again. She dwelt on the promise of the board, on Eva Bell's high record, and on God's goodness to them in influencing the board to build the school. At last she started the girl to the commencement in a relieved condition of mind.

Don Brown stared at the empty seat beside him and remarked to Dave Carter, "Wifie doesn't seem to be on time."

Then he regretted the words, for standing behind him was a quivering colored girl, who was trying in vain to stifle her sobs.

"What is it, Eva Bell?" asked Dave sympathetically. The rest of the class were too much engrossed in their own finery to notice the girl's sorrow.

"My gloves," she sobbed. "Mother didn't want me to put them on until I got here and I lost one on the way, and I can't go out there after my diploma barehanded."

Dave looked around. "I'll see if I can get one from one of the girls," he said.

Then Don Brown spoke in a shame-faced way. "You won't have time, Dave. The curtain will go up in two minutes. What hand is it, Eva Bell?"

"Good!" he exclaimed. "I'll have you fixed in a jiffy."

As he went out to the boys' dressing room an angry murmur arose. Already the crowd was beginning to applaud. And while they were grumbling he was slowly pulling a white glove from the inside pocket of his overcoat. There came before him a vision of a laughing girl, and he heard her say, "If you bring back my glove next summer we will be comrades again."

There were tears in his eyes when he handed it to the colored girl. He had said good-by to his little comrade out there in the wings. He heard a giggle from Maud Darnell. He said: "Let her giggle, Eva Bell. She wouldn't be giggling here if you hadn't worked her geometry last year and her trigonometry this year. These girls are all silly, anyway. Does it fit?"

The girl could not speak; she nodded her head.

Don Brown had long ago decided that this lecture would be a torture for him; he had brought a difficult puzzle and now he took it from his pocket. Instead of the figure on the puzzle he saw a river. It flowed on and on, until it came to a camp. A girl came singing out to the bank; she launched her canoe with her own hands—brave, strong hands they were. They had worn the white glove which he had given away. And she had said that if he cared enough to keep it until they met she would be his comrade again; now that would never be. He gazed at one or two boys who were giggling over the incident, struggled in vain to suppress his emotion and uttered a sound—half a sob, half an exclamation of shame.

Eva heard that sob and wondered what the lecturer had said that was affecting Don Brown. She did not know why he had given her the glove; but the gift wiped away the memory of four years of martyrdom. Life seemed to grow warmer, more rosy colored. She kept repeating: "Don Brown is good after all. I will pay him back some day. God is good, too. I'm going to teach the best school in town and I am going to teach it for Him and mother. I'm glad I'm graduating. I'm glad, glad, glad!"

She saw her mother sitting in the audience. Her figure in its ill-fitting black dress seemed to droop wearily; her face worked pitifully as she heard the speaker tell of the deprivations many parents had endured to secure this high school education for their children. When he told of how they would be honored for these deprivations in later years tears stood on her black face. But her crowning joy came when the diplomas were presented. The boys behind her had been touched by her tears. Somehow even high school boys are capable of a great deal of sympathy. When Eva Bell Brown's name was called their applause was deafening.

The next morning Maud Darnell sat in Dr. Brown's reception room; she sat as if the office and all its furnishings were honored by her presence. She was busy estimating how many new clothes she could get for $8—her weekly salary—and congratulating herself on having secured this position. On the whole, she was well satisfied with Maud Darnell. She had just decided to hold to the dignity of her position when Eva Bell Brown walked in.

"The doctor doesn't see colored patients," said Maud haughtily. She already had her diploma, which said that Maud Darnell had satisfactorily completed a high school course in mathematics.

Eva Bell slowly looked at her. "I came to see about the school," she said evenly.

"You mean the colored school?" interrogated Maud.

"Yes," she assented.

"You want to teach down there?" asked the inquisitive Maud.

"I would like to speak to the doctor if he isn't busy," said Eva in a controlled voice.

"I'll ask him," condescended Maud. "Sit down."

Eva chose the most uncomfortable chair and sat down. Four white men entered the reception room and were admitted to the consultation room before her time came. Then the doctor motioned her in. He did not ask her to sit.

"I've come to see if I can teach—if you will let me teach in the Lincoln school," she began. "I am Eva Bell Brown and I graduated last night. I have all the records of my school course with me."

"Oh, yes," said the doctor, "I remember! Let's see your records."

He studied them carefully. "Pretty good," he said, "but to tell you the truth, Miss Brown, we will not need a teacher there before next autumn."

"I thought no one liked to teach there?" Eva began.

He frowned and became confused. "Well, to be frank, usually they do not. But my daughter is interested in your race. She wants to teach there this spring to collect material for a book. You see, it will be a great help for your people. You're interested in them, aren't you?"

The girl nodded miserably. Why, she hadn't thought of failure; it was incredible. The doctor, seeing her distress, spoke quickly: "You may have it next fall. Isn't it worth the waiting?"

"But I have to live," she said. "We even borrowed the money for my graduation dress. Mother has washed four years so that I could get an education. Will you please give it to me?"

"I have told you that you could have it next fall," he answered impatiently. "It is impossible to let you have it now. Why not be sensible and get a position elsewhere until then? The stamping mills advertised for girls in the morning paper."

The eyes she raised to the doctor were full of tears; the voice he heard was tremulous. "I went there last summer to work during my vacation. At the end of the first day the superintendent came and told me that he was sorry, but I would have to go; that the white girls had refused to work where I did. Then I went to the canning factory; the same thing happened there. They're all sorry, but not half as much as I am. You don't know how I feel about it, Dr. Brown. I'm proud; I'd starve. It's for mother that I am begging. Don't you suppose you could do something?"

The same look in her face that had moved Don the night before almost moved his father. He cleared his throat and started to speak, when the telephone bell rang.

Eva Bell heard him give a quick exclamation, then say, "I will be right home."

As he picked up his hat he saw again the colored girl. "Come back this afternoon," he said gently. "I may be able to find you something to do."

When she walked back into the reception room Maud was making figures on a piece of paper; she was still spending that $8, and Maud—well, even now she was not exactly strong in mathematics. She coolly looked at Eva Bell; seeing the tears in her eyes, she grew magnanimous. "Say, Eva Bell," she said, "do you know where I can get my laundry work done?"

"I'm glad I didn't answer her, mother," Eva said half an hour later. "I know we need the money, but I'd starve before I'd let you wash for her. Of course I'm going back this afternoon, and I suppose he'll offer me a janitorship. Well, I will take it, but look out! If ever that man gets under my foot once I'll surely get even with him."

The tears trickled down her mother's worn face and splashed in the soapsuds. Gently pushing her away, Eva took her place at the washtub. The mother walked over to the window and stood there. Eva Bell knew that she was praying. She felt that all their sorrow had come from this Brown family. "What does this girl want the school for?" she said. "She is rich enough. The doctor didn't even ask me to sit down, and Don has been meaner——"

Looking up, she saw a white glove on the table. Memory silenced her. She washed on for a time and saw her mother put the last of the coal in the stove. She made a survey of the room to see what she could pawn. The bed, table, chairs and stove were all too dilapidated; her mother's great chair seemed to be the only article of value in the room. It had been her father's last gift. Then her eyes fell on the bookshelf. She lovingly read the titles—"Marmion," "Snowbound," "Jane Eyre," "Hiawatha," "Vergil," "Goethe" and "Maria Stuart."

"Why," she cried aloud, "I can sell my books. I almost know them from memory and, mammy dear, I can repeat to you instead of reading them. It will be more educational, anyway."

The mother went over to the girl and put her arms around her. "You'll have to, honey," she sobbed.

Eva Bell had prepared herself to be very humble when she went to the doctor, carrying one of the precious books which she was to pawn and a white silk glove. She would even ask Maud for the laundry work. But all thoughts of laundry work vanished the minute she entered the office. The telephone bell was ringing violently and no one was in sight. She walked to the consultation room; there Maud was sobbing with all her might.

"Maud, what is the matter?" she asked. All memory of the morning had left her. She started to the telephone.

THE HOME COUNCIL

Their Sky-Blue Lady

By Elizabeth Price

"HOME AGAIN, are you? Well, dinner is all ready," and Mrs. Philips waved a hospitable dish towel at her group of young boarders.

"Oh, joyful news! I need something to strengthen me after the nervous strain of the past two hours." Mischievous Adelaide pretended to faint in a near-by hammock.

"You're no worse off than the rest, my love, so don't expect us to revive you. Oh, wasn't it funny!"

The landlady placed a huge platter of fried chicken on the table and surrounded it with steaming vegetables before she said: "Be seated, young ladies. What was so funny?"

"Everything!" Madge spread her hands in a comprehensive gesture. "The sermon, the music, the congregation. We wouldn't speak of it before you, Mrs. Philips, but you aren't a bit like these——"

"Hayseeds," Myra suppied the word promptly. "The preacher talked through his nose and murdered the king's English in cold blood. Text? Dear me, I don't know. Did he have one, Ad?"

"Don't appeal to me. I was lost in admiration of his auburn locks and russet brow."

"Do tell me who was the ancient party in the giddy gown?" Madge demanded of Mrs. Philips. "Oh, I forgot you weren't there! Blue, it was, almost sky-blue—the gown, not the ancient party—one piece, narrow skirt, short sleeves and, of all things, low neck and Dutch collar!"

"She's 60 if she's a day," Adelaide picked up the recital. "Wrinkled and scrawny and gray-headed—in sky-blue, mind you, and a Dutch collar!"

Mrs. Philips's cheery face sobered. "It's Mrs. Pinning, I guess. She usually looks queer, but she has to wear what she can get. Some distant relative in Ohio sends her cast-offs to the old lady."

"And she wears them as they are? Isn't that the depth of ignorance! Why, 10 cents' worth of dye and a few hours' work might make that dreadful dress presentable. Surely she could see that."

"She'd rather have a different sort of 'dic' if she had her choice, I judge." Mr. Philips was heaping the plates before him as he spoke. "It's rather dreary for her, the way she gets along."

"She can't sew—rheumatism or something has stiffened her hands," explained Mrs. Philips.

"Couldn't her children fix her?"

"She has none—all dead, and her husband, too."

"A widow—in that ghastly blue!" Adelaide tried to giggle again, but the attempt was not a success, especially as Mr. Philips kept his eyes on his carving fork and failed in his usual response to the merry chatter. Madge was not so easily quieted and elaborated on the morning's service, mimicking the bald and crimson choir leader and describing the solemn-visaged officers who received the collection, until her two friends shrieked with laughter.

THE long, shady porch held hammocks and rockers galore, and after dinner the girls reveled in luxurious ease, surrounded by papers and magazines, a box of candy within easy reach, while indoors Mr. Philips was clumsily wiping the dishes that his wife might have an hour of leisure to enjoy the out of doors. "It was God's house, Belle, and it's his day as much here as in a city," he remarked after a long revery.

"I know, Timothy. I hoped you'd remind them. They mean well, only they're thoughtless. Maybe they haven't been trained to reverence—though Adelaide's mother used to be a fine Christian girl when we were in school together. We'd better not urge them to go to church next Sunday—it hasn't seemed to do them any good."

The noisy old clock in the front hall struck 4 as Adelaide lifted her eyes from her book and looked across at Myra. "Whatever is the matter?" she demanded curiously. "You haven't read a word since the last time I looked at you. That's the same picture you were staring at ages ago."

Myra flushed and laughed. "I've been thinking," she confessed, as Madge came over and took the chair beside her. "It's Mrs Pinning."

"Our sky-blue lady? Do tell!" Madge raised roguish hands of exclamation.

"Yes," Myra proceeded steadily, "the same. Think of wearing somebody's impossible cast-offs, girls! Imagine being obliged to wear them whether you want to or not, because you're rheumatic and forlorn and can't help yourself!"

"I can't imagine it, for I should not do it." Madge was very emphatic.

Myra sat up suddenly to turn upon her. "I said what if you had to? People who have to do things can't choose—they just go ahead and do them."

"Don't be so fierce, Myra. Mrs. Pinning doesn't mind," declared Adelaide carelessly.

"She does, too; that's one of the things I've been thinking about—how shrinking and embarrassed she looked."

"Well, child, what of it? We can't help the sky-blue lady, so what's the use of fretting and making ourselves uncomfortable?" Madge made the remark as if it needed no answer, but Adelaide nodded.

"We could keep from making fun of her," she said. "That would at least be kinder, even though she doesn't know we are doing it."

"Of course that would be much better manners," acknowledged Madge. "But, girls, when I think of the picture she made I can't help laughing—'deed I can't."

Myra left her hammock as if it were no longer comfortable. She cleared her throat huskily before she said: "I can hardly help crying—which is where you and I are different, Madge. Girls, it came over me all of a sudden a while ago—what if it were my mother? Mrs. Pinning is about her size and——"

"Oh, Myra Carson, for shame! Your beautiful lady mother, who never wore an inappropriate garment in her life," two voices mingled in indignant protest, but Myra only nodded calmly.

"I know—she never had to. What if she had? It struck me like a blow when I thought of it. Girls, I've got to do something for that poor lady that reminds me of mother. I hope you'll help, but if you don't it won't make any difference."

"Oh, we'll undoubtedly get in on the scheme, whatever it is." Adelaide's voice was half amused, half provoked. "You're so dictatorial there's no loophole of escape for your unwary friends."

"Thanks. I call it firmness; but I haven't quite decided what to do. I'll have to consult Mrs. Philips first and I may as well do it now, for I just saw Mr. Timothy stroll barnward, so she's alone."

THE consultation didn't last long, and when it was over Myra returned with suspiciously moist lashes. "Nobody cares whether she wears ball gowns or gingham aprons to church," she declared, "because there's nobody left to care. The distant relative sends what she can't use any longer herself. Sometimes they're pink or rose color, and one was yellow—she's gay in her tastes, the distant relative is. And that little, mortified woman wears 'em rather than stay at home from church; and she never complains, only shrinks all up in her corner and blushes with shame. No wonder her face was red this morning, but it shan't be next Sunday—not from the same cause."

"Myra Carson, how can you help it? Loan her your pink organdy or your white crepe de chine?"

"No, Madge, my dear. We are going to make her a sweet black lawn, with a pretty tucked yoke and a boned collar of black val. The sleeves will come to her wrists and the waist line will be marked by a soft silk belt."

"Did you ever in your life, Adelaide Mann! Such trifles as fitting don't enter into her consideration, evidently."

"Not at all, Madge. Nor the fact that it is a rather delicate matter to present a gown to a perfect stranger—or, at least, some people would so consider it."

Myra ate a caramel contentedly. "Mrs. Philips will lend me her pattern—she's nearly the same size. I defy it to fit any worse than the sky-blue atrocity. As for the gift—Mrs. Pinning is never, never to guess where, how or who. It may be credited to the D. R., to Santa Claus or the fairies, but not to us. Nobody'll know but ourselves and Mrs. Philips, and she won't tell."

"Black lawn grows on bushes here, I suppose, same as blackberries?" Madge inquired of Adelaide, who nodded affirmatively.

"Yes, and val lace climbs the trellis, along with the clematis," she added.

"That's all right," smiled Myra. "They have both in the village and I can spare enough out of my summer frolic to buy what's needed. Why, girls, one carriage ride over the mountain would pay for lawn and lace! I'll stay at home some afternoon and you two can go without me."

But they didn't. Instead, they stayed, too, and added neat low shoes and a pair of lisle thread gloves to the package that was ready for delivery when the rural express went up the road. Not that the rural express took it from the Philipses' door. Far be it from three such strategists to spoil their secret like that. Instead, Mr. Philips had carried it on a business trip to the county seat on Friday afternoon and there prepaid all charges and delivered the precious parcel into the hands of strangers who knew neither sender nor recipient.

MRS. PINNING was pressing the blue gown when the parcel arrived on Saturday. Her cheeks were scarlet once more and her lips were set in a firm line, as if only firmness kept them from trembling. "If it was black,"

Verses Old and New

THE BURDEN OF THE HOUR

God broke our years to hours and days
That hour by hour
And day by day,
Just going on a little way,
We might be able all along
To keep quite strong.
Should all the weight of life
Be laid across our shoulders, and the future, rife
With woe and struggle, meet us face to face
At just one place,
We could not go;
Our feet would stop; and so
God lays a little on us every day,
And never, I believe, on all the way,
Will burdens bear so deep
Or pathwaps lie so steep
But we can go, if, by God's power,
We only bear the burden by the hour.
— George Klingle.

Her Invisible Partner

Mrs. Humphry Ward, the novelist, has a husband. The two were at a dinner. The lady who sat next to Mr. Humphry Ward, according to The Saturday Evening Post, in making conversation said to him, "In olden times it was claimed men could make themselves invisible."

"That's still possible, madam," put in Mr. Ward.

"You are joking," retorted the lady. "How can a man make himself invisible?"

"By marrying a celebrated wife."

YOUNG AMERICA

Two Birthdays and Three Boys

BY SALLY CAMPBELL

PART I.

IT CHANCED, one time, that two boys who lived in the same town had birthdays on the same day. Billy Sheldon was one of the boys. Billy had lots of relatives to give him presents, and so birthdays were a rich time for him, and especially rich was the birthday on which his Uncle Palmer sent him a bicycle from New York.

Billy was so happy that he could think of nothing but his bicycle, and the day it came he rode it up and down the sidewalk under the maple trees in front of the house.

The other boy that had a birthday was Charley Burke. Charley had a mother who loved him every bit as hard as Billy's mother loved Billy. But she was a poor widow who had to work to pay the rent and keep herself and Charley fed and clothed. As for relatives, Charley had very nice ones, too, but they lived far away and, besides, they could not afford presents on one another's birthdays. Christmas presents were all they could manage. So all Charley received was one gift from his mother, with her love and best wishes and eight kisses, and another "to grow on."

It was a lovely present—a book full of stories and gay pictures. Charley was delighted with it. After his mother had kissed him good-by, and given him a few more kisses (just everyday kisses, for no particular reason), and gone to work, he opened it at the first page and read the story through without taking a breath, so to speak. Then he shut the book tight and hunted his cap.

"If I stay I'll peep," he told himself. "One story is enough for once. It's got to last! I guess I will take a walk."

His walk led him to a street where there were maple trees, with the sun shining through their branches, where a boy was riding a bicycle up and down. The boy was not Billy Sheldon, however. Billy had seen this boy at a window and had beckoned to him. The boy opened the window.

"Isn't she a beauty?" Billy had cried proudly. "Come on out and try her!"

Down had gone the window in a hurry; the boy did not need to be invited twice.

He was the first boy, after Billy, to try the new wheel. There had been others. One was Patsy Flynn from the corner bakery. One was an Italian. Every boy that came along was one. Soon there was quite a crowd.

"Let's take turns," Billy had said. "Turns are fine! Lots finer than lonesomeness."

"You're right!" commented Patsy Flynn. "Lots finer for the bunch. I'm thinking good turns would spoil most any kind of lonesomeness there is. They are dandy and sociable."

The first boy was riding again when Charley heard all the voices and laughing and looked around the corner to see the fun. Then, after that, he was part of it.

The fun stopped when the maid at Billy's house came down to the gate and called, "Bil-ly! Billy! Lunch!"

Billy rode off, waving his hand and inviting everybody to come again. "It's been fun," he called.

"Sure it has!" said Patsy. "The kid's got a fine, open way with him. If more had it there'd be less fights and the like."

Patsy spoke generally, but he had in mind a particular fight which he had meant to wage that morning. He was stale on it now, he told himself; and when you get stale on a fight you can't do it justice.

"I guess," meditated Patsy, rather shamefacedly, "Billy wouldn't think much of fighting. He's peaceable."

Charley was thoughtful, too, as he faced toward his own lunch, which his mother had left for him in the cupboard. When he had finished it he got out his birthday book again. "I wonder," he said to himself, "how I could do like Billy with it. I think Billy's idea for birthday presents is splendid. I like it. Mother would, too."

On the floor above Charley and his mother lived Mrs. McBride. She went out to work every day about the same time as Mrs. Burke. Sometimes they went down the street together. Mrs. McBride, when she started, always looked up and nodded and smiled to somebody upstairs, just as Charley's mother did to him. Charley knew who it was upstairs because he had heard the neighbors talk. But he had not paid much attention; there are so many neighbors in the city. Now, however, he remembered.

"Poor little Jack McBride! Poor laddy!" one of the women had said only yesterday. "And such a fine, bright head as he's got! Well, we'll hope it can do something for him, for he can't do much ever with his heels after this, I'm afraid."

Mr. Swan, Robber

If this swan looks particularly comfortable, it is because he has just swallowed a large piece of cake. One day in July when one of our very small Young Americans was at the park, on a picnic, with his mamma, they walked down to the lake, after lunch, to watch the ducks and geese and swans and other water fowl. Small Young America carried in his hand the last delicious bit out of the picnic basket—a piece of chocolate cake—while with his other hand he clung fast to his mamma as he slid down the low bank to get close to the water.

The swans at the park are very friendly, and when this beautiful snowy fellow spied small Young America at the water's edge, he put on his most stately air and sailed up to have a look at him. "Perhaps," he thought to himself, "he'll give me a bite to eat."

Small Young America was delighted with his white visitor, and squatted down to get a good look at him. Out shot a long neck. Snap! went a yellow bill, and with a single gulp Mr. Swan had swallowed small Young America's piece of cake! Then he sailed off as haughtily as if he hadn't just rudely snatched and made away with a little boy's dessert.

Small Young America's mamma took Mr. Swan's picture as he turned away to look for some other little boy with cake to steal, and here he is.

Charley took his new book tenderly under his arm and trudged up the steep stairs to the McBrides' door. There he waited for a while to gather up his courage. Charley was very healthy; he did not know just how he would get on with a sick boy. He felt shaky. Should he turn back? Suddenly he saw a boy, in a navy suit, riding a shining bicycle over freckles of sunlight and calling across his shoulders: "Come again tomorrow! It's been fun!"

Charley knocked and a tired voice answered. In another minute he had opened the door and was looking into the white face of a boy propped in a chair and staring back at him with very big, bright eyes.

"Hello!" said Jack McBride politely.

"Hello! I'm Charley Burke. I've come up for a visit," faltered Charley, bashfully; "for—for company."

"Oh, good!" The tired voice had a happy ring. "That's good! Bring a chair over. Is it a book?" he asked, his eyes brighter than ever.

"My birthday book," explained Charley. "I read the first story this morning; it was fine! And I am going to read another this afternoon. And I thought most likely you'd like to hear it."

Jack gave a delighted little chuckle. "Then you thought what was just exactly true. You couldn't please me more than by a story, a real story in a book. I tell mother that I'll try to make some up while she's gone and I am sitting here. And I do. But they are stupid. I'd like to shake every one of them! But don't tell mother."

Jack laughed out gayly. But Charley did not laugh. He was glad that Billy had had his idea.

He read the second story to Jack. Then he read him the first one, and they compared the two. The afternoon went by as quickly as the morning had gone.

Meantime Patsy Flynn, in his search for further adventure, had forgotten Billy's hospitality. Patsy's taste in adventure was of a sort that too often did not endear him to his neighbors. It did not this afternoon, for example, endear him to a certain Jake Lester.

"The boy is always underfoot!" growled Jake. "And he's just about as nice to have there as a crooked pin. He needs to be trounced. I'd attend to that, free, for the street, if I could once get him."

But Patsy saw to it that he could not get him, recounting at a safe distance, in sniggering triumph, his successful trick upon big, exasperated Jake.

"Jake's been fired from his job," said the boy whom he told. "He's on the grouch, anyway. It would be a pleasure to him to crack your bones one by one."

"Fired!" said Patsy. "For what?"

"The boss was laying off men. He laid off Jake. Jake can't hardly believe it. He's pretty near crazy."

Jake had five small children, and his wife had been ailing off and on all winter.

Patsy sniggered no more. For, though he tried desperately hard to make a secret of it and to ignore it himself, somewhere in his happy-go-lucky anatomy there was a heart. He thought of big Jake and his chubby children and his pale wife and got mad.

"Such things ought not to be! Jake is steady and worthy, his wife's a nice woman and brings her children up nice. Ain't there anybody to see that folks like them get a job?" Patsy flung a challenging glance at the strip of spring sky above the tall roofs. "Well, all I can do myself," he muttered, "is forget it."

Seeking a kindred spirit, he was brought to a standstill on the landing by Jack McBride's door. Patsy's curiosity was one of his strong points. He lifted the latch unceremoniously and thrust in his mop head.

"What's all this visiting about?" he demanded.

"It's Charley's birthday," explained Jack. Jack was radiant. "He's making me a birthday call and reading me the stories out of his birthday book."

"Oh, is he? I know just where he got the notion of that," said Patsy.

"From Billy," Charley agreed. "It's a good one, isn't it?"

But Patsy shut the door in the middle of the question and cut himself off from answering it—from answering it to Charley, that is.

(To be concluded)

Agnes, aged 3, had just heard a graphophone for the first time. She described it thus to her mother: "It was the funniest thing; there was an old man sitting behind a table where we couldn't see him, singing for us, and the woman was feeding him with tin plates."

NEW BOOKS

The Rural Church Problem

THE COUNTRY CHURCH, by Charles Otis Gill and Gifford Pinchot, is a most illuminating and valuable contribution to country church literature. Mr. Gill writes from the ripe experience of a fifteen years' successful pastorate in a rural church in Vermont; while Mr. Pinchot, the great conservationist, needs no introduction. These men are well qualified to handle their subject not alone by their long experience and study of country life problems but also by thorough and careful investigation of church and country life conditions.

The purpose of the book is to bring before the public definite and reliable information on the condition of the rural church, past and present, with a view of throwing light upon the question over which authorities on rural life widely differ, namely, Is the rural church gaining or losing ground? The authors contend that "this disagreement as to the facts and needs has made it impossible for the church generally to realize that the condition of the country church constitutes an emergency, and thus has altogether prevented concerted action to meet the actual situation." And they hold further that "no effective united action in favor of the rural church can be expected until the essential facts as to its condition and its necessities have been established beyond dispute."

The authors base their conclusions on an intensive survey of Windsor county, Vermont, typical of agricultural New England, and Tompkins county, New York, representative of large areas in northern and southern New York. The investigation was confined to the lines of activities on which the church itself in these two counties places most emphasis, namely, membership, expenditures and attendance. Non-Protestant churches and city churches were not included in the survey. The general conclusion reached by the authors is that "the country church in the two counties surveyed has suffered a decline in vitality and power which proves beyond question that it is losing its hold on the community."

The remedies proposed may be briefly summarized under the following heads: Improvement of country life, improvement of schools, a new program of social service, an effective country ministry and church cooperation. The book abounds in instructive facts and tables compiled from the survey. It should be noted that the findings of this investigation, which is probably the most thorough yet made, verify other similar surveys that have been made of the country church. The Case of the Immigrant IMMIGRATION, by Henry Pratt Fairchild of Yale University. In this book an effort has been made with marked success to regard immigration not simply as an American problem but as a sociological phenomenon of worldwide significance. Setting out with a helpful discussion of the four main forms of migration, viz., invasion, conquest, colonization and immigration, Professor Fairchild traces the course of the last movement in American history. The chapters dealing with the conditions of immigration as they affect the country are not meant as a brief for larger care in admitting aliens, but they constitute such a brief without doubt, and the further pages which deny the fact of real assimilation add to the argument. It is poor charity which makes the land of promise a barren land by neglecting to safeguard its resources. We do not know a better book on the whole subject. [Macmillan Company, New York. $1.75 net.

THE IMMIGRANT: An Asset and a Liability, by Frederic J. Haskin (Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. $1.25 net), reproduces a series of articles which were published in a large number of newspapers throughout the United States, and embodies material taken from exhaustive reports on immigration made by the federal government, as well as personal observations of the writer both at home and abroad. The Revells are also bringing out three other books on immigration: COMRADES FROM OTHER LANDS, by Leila Allen Dimock, issued under the direction of the Council of Women for Home Missions (25 cents net); AMERICA, GOD'S MELTING POT, by Laura Gerould Craig, which is a textbook in the interdenominational home mission study course (25 cents net); and THE NEW AMERICA, by Mary Clark Barnes and Lemuel Call Barnes, also a home mission textbook (30 cents net).

Before the Cave Dwellers' Day

LONGHEAD: The Story of the First Fire, by C. H. Robinson, is a book of striking unusualness. It depicts the evolution of the social life of man from a purely savage existence, when treetops were used for shelter and flesh was eaten raw, down to the budding of community ideas and leadership and fellowship. All this the author attributes to the virtue of fire, starting out his story with his primitive apelike man chancing upon a tree set on fire by lightning, discovering slowly that this brightness was warming, that it frightened wild beasts, that it was painful to touch and that it could be preserved by the punklike substance in trees. He took the woman of his choice and showed it to her and they decided to keep the fire, carrying it to their cave and setting up a real menage, a thing not customary at the time, he spending his days hunting for food, she remaining at home and caring for the fire. They found that its warmth and cheer in the evening quelled savage instincts and induced a sociability never before known; accidentally they dropped flesh in the embers and were fascinated with the wonderful new taste; wild roots were experimented with and so they came into a healthier physical condition with the use of cooked food. Due to the fire's agency, they discovered that chips of flint could be used to cut things, and that they made dangerous weapons, thereafter man being able to go about more upright and fearlessly. When the other people learned of this wonderful thing called fire they collected around Longhead, whose intellect had lost its sluggishness and worked more effectively than that of any of his fellows. He gave them of the fire on condition that they supply him with food and he made flint javelins for them at the same rate, establishing himself as a leader where never before had there been any leaders. This was before the very earliest days of cave dwelling of which we have any record, but it is a tellingly effective description of the steps of logical sequence by which earliest man lifted himself out of absolute brutism into even the initial stages of civilization, due to the significantly social agency of fire. It is worth reading. There are several typically expressive illustrations by Charles Livingston Bull. [L. C. Page and Company, Boston. $1 net.

Recent Fiction

THE OLD ADAM, by Arnold Bennett. A new story of the audacious Denry of the Five Towns, already made famous by Mr. Bennett. After making his way upward by sheer nerve and readiness to financial and matrimonial success, he has settled down to prosaic provincial life. But the "Old Adam" is revived in him by domestic dullness, and he makes a dash for excitement. He goes to London, stops at a tremendously aristocratic hotel and becomes involved with literary and theatrical folk, with the result that he starts a theater—a theater of the intellectual drama. After ill success at first, he hires a popular suffragist, and his theater booms. The whole makes a very entertaining story. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.35 net.

THE LAND OF THE SPIRIT, by Thomas Nelson Page. These stories are gentle excursions into the feelings and emotions which underlie the expression of our finer selves. "The Stranger's Pew" describes a condition unhappily too frequent in our churches and suggests in a half mythical manner the Christ's attitude toward it; "The Old Planters" reveals the effect of the kindly courteous manners of a fine old southern family who take to running a hotel; and the other stories follow the same lines, giving the reader very pleasant glimpses into what Mr. Page calls "the treasures of the soul." THE HILL OF VENUS, by Nathan Gallazier, is a novel laid in thirteenth century Italy, in which the chasm between church and state is fearlessly and impartially drawn. A youth reared in the atmosphere of a gay and happy court life is forced to become a monk by the deathbed superstition of his father. His tragic fight against love constitutes the rest of the story. The Glory of Present-Day Youth

YOUTH AND LIFE, by Randolph S. Bourne. "It is the glory of the present age that in it one can be young," says Mr. Bourne in the first admirable essay in this volume. And he is right—one dares to be young in this day and age because the potentiality of youth has been discovered, and on every side tribute is being paid to it. To have youth is to have about the best thing God invents—if we may paraphrase Browning a little.

Since the age is supposed to be a practical one, it is easy to find a practical explanation of youth's recent recognition. In industry the older generation is being forced to look to its laurels, for youth has entered the game to prove its greater efficiency. How common a thing it is now to hear an older man complain that "all the good jobs are being given to mere youngsters." But deeper than this lies another explanation—one which satisfies those deeper cravings in us. We are coming to feel that the hope and promise of the world lie in this younger generation with its rebellions, its radicalism, its ideals, its enthusiasms, its daring, its "activism"—its ideas and the courage of them.

The older generation used to have what it considered an adequate gag for the effusions of the younger. "You can't know anything about that yet," it said; "you've not had any experience." Now the younger generation has discovered a subtle revenge for such suppression. When it hears its elders lamenting the evils of the times, and wondering how, since "we're all born free and equal," such things can be—then it answers: "But we're not all born free and equal; we acquire freedom—if we have the strength—and we don't care anything about equality anyhow"; and then it sets to work upon the evils. The revenge is clever because it substitutes action for talk—and action is difficult to suppress. That is the new method—youth's method—of looking at life; clearing away the cobwebs of tradition and facing the facts squarely.

Mr. Bourne—who confesses to just 25 years—has written a most brilliant series of papers upon these great struggles of youth. He has no sympathy with the young conservatives who take the struggle easily; but for those who find themselves "exposed to the full fury of the spiritual elements" he has the most penetrating comprehension—and he justifies them, oh! so magnificently. His book is one of the significant and interesting publications of the current literary season. [Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston. $1.25 net.

By J. L. Scott

Lesson Text, Exodus 32. Golden Text, I. John 5:21: Little children, guard yourselves from idols.

Man is a contradiction. His past does not always determine his future. This finds abundant illustration in the history of Israel at Sinai. Never did the currents of public sentiment more completely reverse themselves, or in a shorter time. The explanation is difficult. Here is a people to whom the teaching of the one God had been familiar for centuries. Their lives in trend and drift had been along that one line. And moreover, the incidents of the recent past must have driven the conviction of the existence of this God deeper and deeper into every soul. As a nation they had seen the gods of Egypt wither and die at Jehovah's hand. And by his own hand he had led the people, as a shepherd leads his flock. The sea had retreated before them and a highway had opened through the desert. And at that very moment Mount Sinai, kindled by the flaming torch of the divine presence, was on fire. Clouds and smoke hung about its summit, where God and Moses met and talked as man talks with man. The people lingered about the base in full sight of the awful mystery.

Moses an Expression of God to the Israelites

In the absence of the lawgiver Aaron and Hur were in charge. Neither was fit for the position. Hur was scarcely a factor, and Aaron was a voice and little else. A tree protected by the surrounding forest is strong against the tempest, but that same tree alone on the mountain bows to the forces directed against it. Such was the position of Aaron —a willow compelled to confront the whirlwind. Waiting tests one more than action. For forty days Moses had been away. Where was he? To the people he had been the expression of God. In this attitude toward him they were right. Christ himself was anticipated in Moses. God must localize himself in person and revelation. The incarnation was more than the fulfillment of prophecy. It was a response to the outcry of the human heart. A Deity on the mountain, dwelling amid clouds and darkness, could not meet the people's sense of need. God, apart from Jesus, appeals to our sense of mystery, but the essential Person is found only in Christ.

In the absence of Moses the people appealed to Aaron: "Make us gods, which shall go before us; for as for this Moses, the man that brought us up out of the land of Egypt, we know not what is become of him." They did not ask for a god in the place of Jehovah, but for some visible representation to be what Moses had been. That Aaron should have for a moment entertained their request is the most astonishing part of the whole transaction. They had lived in sight of idolatry all their lives, but he had been favored far above his race. Aaron asks that the people contribute the jewelry which they had brought with them from Egypt. This he threw into the furnace and a golden calf was the result. It was no accident. He had shaped it with his own hands after the form of the god Apis, the sacred bull of the Egyptians.

Aaron Attempts to Erect Idol and Altar Side by Side

But there were contradictions stranger still to follow. Men will cling to some semblance of religion long after it has ceased actually to exist for them. Aaron would effect an impossible combination. He would erect an altar and an idol beneath the same roof. In this he anticipated every generation from that age to this. Altars and idols are often found in the same company, and the size of one depends largely upon the size of the other.

It is not entirely certain that the administration of Moses was not without its discords. The readiness to complain would suggest an undercurrent of discontent that does not appear upon the surface. This was probably especially strong among the younger element. Moses was a lawgiver, and youth is naturally impatient of restraint. Aaron was more cosmopolitan. His vision included altar and idol alike. He had observed the festal services in Egypt and noted how they enlisted the interest of the young. The young people as a factor in Israel must not be overlooked.

Whatever the character of Aaron's services they must at least appear to be sacred. Accordingly he proclaimed throughout Israel, "Tomorrow shall be a feast unto Jehovah." Tomorrow came, and none too soon for the worshipers. Early in the morning the altar and the idol became the center of an eager multitude. The altar was first to receive their devotion. Burnt offerings and peace offerings were presented without stint. Then came the secular part of the observation. The Egyptian custom of dancing about the idol was revived and Sinai echoed with pleasure and song.

Moses, Pleading for His People, Reaches Height of Grandeur

Israel was happy, or seemed to be, but at that very moment an old man was stumbling down the mountain with his war secretary by his side. The venerable lawgiver mistook the shouting for the noise of battle, but Joshua, accustomed to the voice of war, failed to recognize the accents of defeat or victory and heard only outbursts of song. The two drew nearer. Suddenly the truth fell upon Moses like a bowlder from the mountain. Israel had corrupted herself and gone back to the worship of idols! His great soul swelled with speechless rage, while he flung the tables of the law from his hand and dashed them to the earth. He ground the idol to powder and scattered its dust upon water.

Aaron, when confronted with the responsibility, like the weak man that he was, protested and laid the sin at the door of the people: "Thou knowest the people, that they are set on evil." But the sin had been committed and Omnipotence alone could undo it. Moses interceded with God. To forgive is nobler than to punish. Never before or after did the lawgiver rise to a grander manhood. Like our Advocate, the Christ, he bore the guilt of the people up to the very throne of God—"This people have sinned a great sin, and have made them gods of gold. Yet now, if thou wilt forgive their sin—; and if not, blot me, I pray thee, out of thy book which thou hast written." That was intercession. It was the plea of the innocent for the guilty, the lasting work of the Christ begun upon earth.

The Lesson Verse by Verse

By Hermon D. Jenkins

Analysis—A great popular movement may leave the individual unsaved. We should ask, What does religion give us to do? rather than, What hours of feasting does it afford? There are only two kinds of worship in the world—the worship of the spirit and the worship of the senses.

The first thing to note today is the evanescence of great popular movements. We are warned by history that every great popular religious flood has been followed by a great popular religious ebb. That is not the fault of religion but the fault of human nature. The majority of mankind will follow hypnotic leadership anywhere. The tremendous personality of Moses carried everything before it. The people rose against their oppressors; they started for the land of their fathers; they crossed the Red sea and they were ready for further advances—when, all at once, Moses disappeared.

The most promising religious reform, which has not gripped the individual but only moved the leaders who are followed by the multitude, is bound to be ephemeral. The moment the leadership is lost the impetus is lost. It was so in the days of Savonarola and it was so in the days of Oliver Cromwell. It is easy to reform a church, if you have such a man as Moses to lead it, but it is impossible to keep it reformed unless you have created new individual consciences. It is easy to reform a state, if you have a great man at the front of the movement. But the moment he falls it all goes to pieces unless you have reformed the individual citizen. What we need is a church whose members are capable of self-leadership when other leadership is lost.

Verses 17-19—The religion of Egypt had a great many "popular" features. Herodotus tells us that the feasts held by the Egyptians in professed honor of their gods were of great number. They were liberally scattered throughout the year and were observed in every temple. On these occasions festival plays were enacted and religious processions delighted the common people and relieved the dull monotony of their lives. The idols were carried from temple to temple, the gods "treating" one another to meat and cakes, and even the poorest had a share in the abundance of the times. In India and other Oriental lands today the strength of heathenism lies not in its philosophies but in its shows and festivals. The Greek Church in Russia has tightened its grip on the ignorant peasants by multiplying beyond all reason the holy days, when labor is tabooed and play made a duty.

What the Israelites wanted was a good time. They wanted the freedom, the license, the feasting which marked the holidays of the land out of which they had come. They were not anxious to see carried any further this religion of restraint, of honesty, of purity. Religion was with them an excuse for a revel and for the gratification of all the senses. We must not imagine that the issue which moved Moses so profoundly was a merely theoretical one as to whether God could be worshiped under this form or that form; the issue was a very real one—whether religion was, as his tables of stone implied, a spiritual faith and a curb on passion, or such freedom of indulgence as they had seen associated with the religion of Egypt.

Israelites Wanted God That Would Not Rebuke Sin

Verses 4, 8, 19, 20—Great stress is laid on the fact that the idol was in the form most commonly seen by them in the land of their servitude. In great museums one may see in glass cases various mummied bulls which were once gods of Egypt, embalmed and reverenced even after they were dead. The diminutive "calf" is used probably because the material in such images was precious and the idol itself, even when made of wood and overlaid with gold, as was the common practice, required the sacrifice of their personal ornaments and decorations to produce it.

The character of their religion is indicated by the character of their god. They did not wish to find a god of intelligence, tenderness or helpfulness, but a god of force, will and passion. Such a god would never rebuke sin. Such a god would encourage indulgence, deify force and enthrone might instead of right. The bull god was not only another god from the God Moses was revealing, he was the antithesis of Jehovah in every attribute and characteristic. It is to be noted that, however lofty at the outset the pretensions of any anti-Christian propaganda, it usually ends in the same horrible pit and miry clay of its predecessors. Israel's sin was not intellectual but sensual. And when we understand the impulses which were betrayed by their choice of a divinity we know why the worship both now and in Jeroboam's time (I. Kings 12:28-30) was so hateful to the true Israelite and so popular with the multitude.

Prayer of Moses Shows Spirit Exhibited by Paul

Verse 32—One of the most memorable sayings of Henry Ward Beecher was, "Every great love has in it something of the awe and shadow of eternity." Perhaps this is something of what John meant when he spoke of "the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world." In every great love there is always something of the atoning spirit which dominated Christ. "General," said the writer to a friend, a veteran of the civil war, "I see your sword there on the wall, but where is the scabbard?" "Oh, I threw that away at Gettysburg. I thought I should never want it again," was the reply. He knew that the charge which he was ordered to lead meant certain death to his men, and he was ready to share their fate. If the nation was to be wiped out, Moses said, "Let me die with them." We admire such fidelity, but we are not called upon to justify it. We have no right to say, "My country, right or wrong," or "My church, right or wrong." Our first duty is toward God; and this, too, Moses felt in his sober moments when in command of his reason and his feelings and his conscience.

BY EDWARD ARTHUR WICHER

Week Beginning September 14, 1913

Topic—The candle under a bushel. Matthew 5:15.

The standard version gives this verse: Neither do men light a lamp, and put it under the bushel, but on the stand; and it shineth unto all that are in the house." The lamp, the lamp stand and the modius, or peck measure, were all necessary parts of the simple furnishings of a Palestinian house. But should a man ever light a lamp and put it under a peck measure? This would be an utterly absurd action. He naturally sets it upon a lamp stand, so that it may do what it was intended to do—give light unto all the people who are in the house.

The Master has lighted lamps. Those first disciples were his lamps; we are his lamps. It is intended that they shall be set in full view of all the people of the neighborhood, so that they may share in the blessedness of the illumination.

A little farther on in the same discourse Jesus says: "When thou doest alms, sound not a trumpet before thee." "When thou prayest, enter into thine inner chamber, and having shut thy door, pray to thy Father who is in secret." "When thou fastest, anoint thy head, and wash thy face; that thou be not seen of men to fast, but of thy Father who is in secret." "Let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth." Is it possible for us to obey both apparently contradictory precepts, to let our light shine that men may see our good works, and, at the same time, to prevent our left hand from knowing what our right hand is doing? Evidently it is, or Jesus would not have commanded both.

The purpose of the Pharisees in being conspicuously religious was to get praise of men; the purpose of the disciples in letting their light shine was that men might glorify their Father who is in heaven. The result of the Pharisees' conduct was that they were seen of men; the result of the disciples' illumination was that they were a blessing to their brethren. The Pharisees' religion, to which such publicity was given, was wholly concerned with particular acts of religious custom; the light-giving grace of the disciples proceeded not so much from specific works of righteousness as from the divinely controlled character of the disciples. And the lamps of the Pharisees were lighted by themselves, while the lamps of the disciples were lighted by God.

Christ's exhortation to the disciples to let their light shine is simply a declaration of the supreme value of a pure character and a holy conversation. It has been said that if the whole Christian church would be true to her Lord for one day, the world would be converted before nightfall. But the hindrance to the salvation of the sinner is oftentimes that the light of the Christian is so fitful; it flares up for a brilliant moment, and then is almost extinct throughout the long, dark watches of the night. Or perhaps our light is one-sided. We may not have completely covered our lamp, but we have so concealed it in a corner of the room and so shaded it, that it can give light only in one narrow direction. A man might pass by very close to us without even suspecting the existence of the lamp. What Christ requires from us is a clear, bright light that burns without diminution or flickering, and is placed so unequivocally as to be visible from every side.

There is an inestimable value to the community in the presence of one strong, pure man, who has never been known to speak an untrue word or do a dishonest deed, but whose entire life has been moved by the highest principles of probity, justice and compassion. Young men who are just entering upon their active career look up to him as an example. Aged men who have laid down the activities of business and public service are glad to feel that their affairs are in his hands. Other vigorous men, who are carrying the burdens of the day, like to consult him before making new plans and engaging in new enterprises. Widows come to him to confide their cares. Little children look up into his face, as he passes along the street, and are proud if he speaks to them. Such a man gives character and impulse to a whole community. He may be the most humble of men, but he lets his light shine.

And each of us in his own place, large or small, may be the center of some such illumination. If our character is true and steadfast, it cannot be otherwise with us. The lamp of purity, the lamp of truth and the lamp of comfort are among the lamps we bear. The world sorely needs them all.

There is the lamp of purity. The disciple of Jesus should be so completely, so intrinsically, pure that no evil word or suggestion can lay hold upon him. The gloom will not overcome the light, but will be pierced and dissolved by the light. A Christian man, standing in the midst of the sin and shame of the foulest slum, sends forth a light that will save many a poor, degraded soul from the darkness of despair and death. It was wonderful how, wherever Jesus moved, sinful, suffering outcasts appeared to greet him. It seemed to make little difference whether he went into the city or the desert; the needy people were still there. This was because Jesus was a light that could not be hid. And just in so far as we are possessed by the spirit of Christ will we everywhere find the sin-burdened, sorrowing ones, who will bring their griefs to us because we hold forth a light.

There is the lamp of truth. There are perplexed men who want to know the truth, and who are conscious that they cannot gain the freedom of their personal powers until they possess the truth. If our light shines clearly, they will turn to us for the knowledge they crave. It may be our rare joy to lead them to the light of life.

There is the lamp of comfort. It may be that God has made us sorrowful and comforted us in order that he may make of us precious vessels to carry the oil of his comfort to other troubled souls. "God comforted me by the coming of Titus." The aged apostle, in his last imprisonment, sees in the arrival of the young man Titus the ministry of God to the loneliness and sorrow of his heart. The light of Titus was shining that Paul might see it and glorify God.

There are close around us all burdened souls that need to be comforted, troubled souls that need to be set at peace, darkened souls that need to be enlightened, sinful souls that need to be cleansed and redeemed. And the means that Christ has chosen to these ends are the disciples who have taken his name upon them. He depends upon us to let our light shine.

A GROWING WINTER

Topic—How to get the most from this school year. II. Timothy 2:15-26.

This topic was doubtless framed bearing in mind that large proportion of the members of young people's societies who are still in school. It does not exclude the rest of us, who are still undergraduates in the school of experience. Life's lessons are all for life, whether they be learned in the schoolroom or in the large field of activity. The principles which help youth to get most from its books also help maturity to catch the meaning of that oldest and wisest of schoolmasters, whom we call life.

George Ade says, "You can lead a boy to college, but you cannot make him think." And it is the thinking that is done in college that makes real education, rather than the instruction that is imparted by the teachers. To fail to learn to think—to think clearly, consecutively and fearlessly—is to fail in the first requirement of culture.

Four things a man must learn to do
If he would make his record true—
To think without confusion, clearly;
To love his fellow men sincerely;
To act from honest motives purely;
To trust in God and heaven securely.
—Henry van Dyke.

If some power could constrain all the people of the nation between the ages of 15 and 50 to devote one entire winter to serious thought upon vital subjects what an intellectual leap forward the world would take! Imagine millions of persons simultaneously addressing themselves with conscientiousness to the business of considering carefully the great themes of history, character, patriotism, brotherhood and religion! No earthly power can compel this on the part of a nation; but what is to hinder the reader of these lines from quietly resolving to take this pledge for himself? Instead of giving undue time to the daily newspaper and the magazine of entertainment, he would master a few great books. For the inconsequential conversation that fills most of our days, he will seek to talk seriously at least once a day with somebody better informed than himself. With systematic perseverance he will cultivate an interest in the grave concerns of the nation and the world. That would indeed be a year of education.

The habit of acquisitiveness is one of the secrets of eternal youth. To cease to learn is to begin to cease to live. Count over the young old people one knows, whose zest in life is the joy of their friends, and they will be seen all to be persons who are still interested in learning. President John R. Finley's rule is a good one: "Every day to take a long walk, read a good book and make a new friend."

A few days ago I was standing by the newsstand in a railway station, when a beautiful young woman, with a refined face, correctly gowned in quiet taste, came up and bought a certain magazine, known for the vulgarity and even immorality of its fiction. The manner in which she went directly to that one publication and took it up without glancing at the table of contents showed that she was accustomed to reading it, and knew exactly what she wanted. The action betrayed her as truly as if she had sworn or chewed tobacco. Any sophisticated person, seeing the incident, would have written down that young woman as essentially unrefined in her mind. No woman of genuine culture would be seen reading such a publication. The obvious conclusion is that education reveals itself in all the affairs of life; and the world does not have to look at a person's diploma to judge of his cultivation.

Most alert persons are aware of the new trend of education to relate itself to present life. It teaches children history with respect to the welfare and progress of the people rather than as a string of useless dates. Patriotism is shown to be less a matter of battles in the past than of loyalty to the common welfare in the present. The sacredness of every life, right here and now, is written large. Living issues of our own day are given rank ahead of the wars of Greece and Rome. All of which but recalls that Jesus pointed the way to wisdom when he asked, "Can ye not discern the signs of the times?"

Brains that are fed but not exercised, like horses in a similar condition, are unable to bear their share of life's load.

Religion educates. That is a tremendous truth. Culture in refinement, in idealism, in unselfishness, in service, in relative values and in the eternal relationships comes through the knowledge and worship of God, and through study of his word. Over and over it has been remarked that saints whom the world calls peasants have been examples of perfect gentility.

They whose own abilities are led out—and that is what "education" means—themselves become leaders of their fellows.

MISSIONARY WORK

Filipino Agitators Hinder Missions

A Protestant missionary in Manila in a recent letter reveals a new difficulty which is rising to face the labors of all the evangelical churches in the Philippines. Theoretically the question of political independence for the Philippine islands would seem to be a strictly civil matter which would not affect the preaching and spread of religion. But, as a matter of fact, the influence and activity of the native agitators who are stirring up the people to demand release from their dependence upon the United States affect also the feeling of the Filipinos toward American missionaries.

Shrewd and underhanded insinuations are used by these professed patriots to make the name and presence of all Americans more and more odious to the native population. No missionary succeeeds in being on intimate enough terms with his Filipino friends to escape altogether some sense of this growing dislike and distrust. And the men who represent the independent Filipino Catholic church, popularly known as the "Aglipay movement," are particularly industrious in fomenting these suspicions. Aglipay's followers have apparently come to a place where they cannot hope to gain very much more by defections from Roman Catholicism. Under American priests the Romanist lines are being drawn tighter every day. The independents therefore seem to be turning to proselytize among Protestants, and altogether apart from any question of doctrine or church method, the influence of these proselytizers is demoralizing.

Some at least of the Agilpay workers do not hesitate to tell the Protestants that if they will join the independent church they need not be so careful about their conduct as they are obliged to be under the supervision of missionaries. Indeed, the lives of some of these independent priests themselves fully attest their claim that there are no moral standards for membership in their church. Until the independence question is settled one way or the other, it is seriously to be feared that missionary enterprise in the Philippines will have to make headway against greater opposition than it has suffered hitherto.

Itinerating in Colombia

Rev. F. E. Barber, writing from Medellin, Colombia, gives an interesting account of a journey which he took recently, with one companion, though the mountainous country just south of Medellin and through parts of the adjoining states of Antioquia and Caldas. The itinerary covered in all was some 280 miles. Mr. Barber says:

"We made the entire trip on foot, having only one pack horse to carry our Bibles and Testaments, and a folding cot and bedding, for in such a journey one must take his bed with him if he desires much comfort at night. It is difficult and most disagreeable to try to describe some of those mountain homes that one is often compelled to lodge in during the night while journeying. And as for the food, it is, as you might expect, only that which a man with a ravenous appetite from walking can relish. But when one is climbing over mountains all day in a good, cold climate in the tropics, often in pouring rain, with roads indescribable and mud halfway to the knees, you may be sure that he is ready to eat almost anything that is in the form of food."

Mr. Barber speaks of the many advantages of itinerating on foot in a country like this. He remarks: "The missionary meets many people on the road who are either carrying their produce to market on their backs, or loaded on the backs of mules and oxen. Walking along the road with them one finds them always ready to talk, and then, of course, comes the opportunity to tell them of the true Christ. Naturally, many wonder and know not what to think; but others who have already thought something about the subject ask questions most freely and are eager to learn. One day we had a big, strong peon come up and defend us against a crowd of men and women who were trying to prevent our sales in a market place, and it certainly would have done anyone good to hear him talk. This same man had listened to us in our journey two or three days before, and he soon scattered the crowd. Even though some of them belonged to the higher class, he wasn't afraid of them."

This trip was much more encouraging to the missionaries than they had dared to hope. As in other parts of Colombia, towns from which the colporteurs had been in the past ordered to leave, or else had been driven away, received the messengers of the gospel with warm welcome. Antioquia is considered a stronghold of fanaticism, and Mr. Barber and his companion were warned that if they went there they would probably be stoned, as had happened when two colporteurs tried to stop there three years before. But this time they were received kindly, and heard not a single threat against them. In Aguadas, where three years before the missionaries had had to leave the city within a few minutes of their arrival, they were not only received kindly but sold there more Bibles and Testaments than in any other place during the trip.

Mr. Barber speaks particularly of the drunkenness he encountered in all places. In Manizales he says he saw more drunken men than ever in his life before. In another town some of the citizens presented a charge to the mayor that the missionaries were selling bad books to corrupt the lives of the people. A policeman took Mr. Barber to the mayor's office with his load of books. Mr. Barber at once requested the mayor to examine them and began to explain about Christ. While he was talking a young man entered and asked permission to speak. He was from Bogota, from a well to do family, and so was asked to proceed. He told of the Presbyterian church and its work, stating that he attended regularly, that the missionaries' books were such as the people needed, and that no one could say a word against either the teachings or the teachers. After this testimony the mayor declared the accusation was unfounded and the missionaries proceeded with their work unmolested.

Women's Conference in Weihsien

Although here and there a woman has stood out strongly from her sisters, the great mass of womanhood in China has until recent years borne very little public part in religious life, but it is being increasingly noted that the women are coming to the fore. A women's conference held recently at Weihsien, in the Shantung province, was attended by fully 300 delegates. The participants came from distances ranging from ten to eighty miles, and in various manners of conveyances. One old lady, 83 years old, walked twenty-five miles to be present at the meeting. She had been a Christian for more than thirty-five years, and could not bear to be absent. Others came by wheelbarrow and some by the modern trains.

The spirit of the conference was deeply impressive, and after the women returned to their homes rumors began to come back of the work they were doing among their friends and neighbors. In one family—one of the most exclusive of the gentry of Weihsien—one of the young women members, who is interested in Christianity, was allowed to attend the conference in a private room, and was greatly impressed. The attendance of this young woman was a breaking of precedent, for this family was one of those who do not allow their women to go out to church or mingle in any of the new movements. She was deeply impressed by the experience.

During the meeting a conference for the women of Wiehsien city, practically all non-Christians, was held and the result exceeded the hopes of the planners. Three times a day for three days the city church, seating nearly 300, was filled, sometimes many having to stand. It was the feeling of the missionaries that great good would come of this meeting.

Board Notes and Announcements

—Leading the Friday morning meeting of the Board of the Northwest in Chicago Mrs. Lockwood Brown showed the secret of having what the devoted Pastor Chia of Shantung says his people have, "big hearts and their eyes open"—in other words, the spirit of missions. Letters were read from Africa and Mexico. Mrs. Frothingham, who presided, praised the new book about Africa, "Thinking Black," by Dan Crawford, of which Mrs. Coy said, "I have got information there that I've found nowhere else." The mention of Dr. Senska, in Mr. Hickman's letter from Batanga, was welcome news to Mrs. Fox, who had known him during his student life in Iowa City and praised him highly. Mrs. Coulter asked prayer for the appointed candidates who cannot go to the field, five of those whom she had hoped to number among her correspondents in China having already had their hopes of fulfilling that appointment either broken or deferred. The field secretary is about to visit Mankato presbyterial and several synodical societies.

Mexican Children in Mission School

Here are some bright children in a mission school at Puebla in Mexico, where Rev. and Mrs. Troyer of the Baptist mission have had 200 sons and daughters of citizens of the troubled republic studying in their institution. They are far different in appearance from the typical Mexican as we imagine him to be with his palm or wool sombrero, decorated by silver ornaments, and with his long and narrow bright blanket which he passes behind his back and around the body in front, throwing the free end carelessly over the left shoulder. Children the whole world over are the same, and little Mexicans are no exception. They do not worry very much over the possibilities of intervention or such questions as disturb their fathers.

The Presbyterian mission has nearly a thousand students in nearly thirty boarding and day schools. Over 2,500 pupils attend its Sunday schools. Twenty Americans make up the missionary staff. From one of the stations this item was reported: "We have had just enough of the revolution to break the monotony of our prosaic school life, though not enough to interfere greatly with our peace of mind." That was from the mission station at Aguascalientes.

Sam Daly and Some of the Dependent Colored Lads He Helped to Make Into Decent Citizens

What One Poor Negro Did for Boys of His Race

BY LEE McCRAE

IF "OUR sole value is what we are worth to others," then an obscure, illiterate negro farmer down on a wornout plantation has been one of Alabama's chief assets.

Yet when the people of the state read in a two-line paragraph that Sam Daly of Tuscaloosa was dead they hurriedly turned the paper, hunting "real news." Who was Sam Daly, anyway?"

Twenty years ago he was janitor, flunky, general factotum to the boys at the state university. But with eyes and ears open, he was drinking in the inspiration that became the governing power of his life. Seeing how education and religion uplift a race and an individual, the janitor began to covet it, first for himself, then for his people. He was already a devout, whole-souled Presbyterian, and because of his anxiety to "read de good book" for himself some of the students taught him in a desultory fashion.

While he was laboring at his janitorship, and laboring even more strenuously over his reading and writing and figuring, Sam was also saving money, enough to purchase the hack plying between town and the university. This proved so lucrative that some town lots were soon his; then, when a great longing for the country came over him, he sold these to advantage and bought 500 acres of second-rate farming land fourteen miles from town.

Right here, according to Dun or Bradstreet, Sam Daly's public history ought to have ended. He was 40 years old and "well fixed" for the rest of his days. But Sam's vision included others besides himself—his people, particularly little negroes, who, like himself, had been denied much.

Black Urchins from Buzzard's Roost

In December, 1903, he came across an advertisement in a Birmingham paper in which Judge Feagin of the juvenile court asked for country homes for colored boys convicted before his court. There was no law for probation then, no "big brother" officers, not even a reform school for negro youths; but the heart and will of this wise judge were strong enough to be a "law unto himself," and he boldly advertised, "Who will take my little criminals out of jail and out of the swirl of evil in Buzzard's Roost and Scratch Ankle Row to the purity of God's outdoors?"

"I, boss!" cried Sam Daly, holding out his big, black hands.

So behold a farm wagon rattling through the woods bearing a smiling black man and five wide-eyed little negroes, seeing the "real woods" for the first time in their lives. They were frightened and homesick for the noise and clamor of town, but this was better than being in jail.

Chapters and chapters of this story must forever remain unwritten. None of the boys could write. Sam "never could spell nothin'," and besides, there was too much to do, raising cotton and food enough for this suddenly increased family.

Trip after trip the shackly wagon made through the woods to meet the train bringing more derelicts from the crime waves of the city. In less than ten years over 300 colored boys, of varying ages and varying crimes, have been sent to this farm to be "tried out." And out of this 300 only 10 per cent have "gone bad." In other words, this patient, God-loving, boy-loving negro and his wife saved 270 vice-steeped boys and turned them into useful, self-dependent citizens, men in the making.

Where has this ten years' work a duplicate? What would you say Sam Daly was worth to the state of Alabama—to the nation?

How Transformation Was Effected

How was it done? By love and patience, by nature's own teaching and the word of God. Kindliness from Sam and his wife first startled the boy. Then there were three square meals a day served on a table (both unknown before), and there was a bed made for him! It was almost invariably the first glimpse of love and home that had come into the little sinner's life. Better still, around that table every morning he heard a verse of Scripture from each boy and he was taught to say one himself. After breakfast there was work to do in the open fields, and there nature came to him with her own healing and uplift. In the silence of the old woodlot many a boy "came to himself."

Two hours a day, summer and winter, must be spent in the old log schoolroom, where a well trained young negro man, sent out by the Presbyterian Board of the Southern Church at a meager salary, does his best to teach these habitual truants. But for these boys and this race an education of heart and hands beats education of brain many fold. It was industry, purity of environment and Sam Daly's own beautiful life and spirit that worked the salvation of the 270. Never once has he put shackles upon a boy's limbs or stripes upon his back.

"But how has he fed and clothed and housed this big family?" asks the business man.

By simple daily toil. Forty dollars and the salary of the teacher constitute the donations from the church. Not a cent of public funds has gone from Jefferson county or the state, although he has supported their charges. A few individuals, touched by Sam's struggles, have given small sums, and once a bill was put before the legislature for an appropriation, in return for which the negro offered to turn over 175 acres of his land. But an inflammatory speech by one man, angered by a negro crime in his community, caused the bill to be lost by five votes. The short-sighted legislator could not see that Sam was working to prevent countless more just such heinous crimes.

A Mortgage for Charity's Sake

So there came a dark day in which Daly had to mortgage his farm to borrow $1,800. (Do you know of any white people who have mortgaged all they possessed for charity's sake?) That $1,800 went into food and clothes—not into buildings, or equipment. The $40 from the church was the total cost of the boys' "sleeping room"—a clapboard log cabin, where the boys lined up to have their pictures "tooken," with Sam at the head of the procession.

There is a large, unfinished building, but it has not cost any money yet. I wish it would! Under their leader, Andrew May, the boys went to the woods, cut down trees, sawed them into mill lengths and rolled them to a mill, where they were sawed on shares. The construction was every bit their own labor. Now, as no money and no more logs are to be had, the unroofed shed stands there useless, in mute appeal.

"Sam," Judge Feagin said to him last winter, "you will lose all you've got taking care of those little negroes."

"De good Lawd is gwine to take care ob me 's long as I's doin' his work," answered Sam, with his radiant smile.

"But you've got a mortgage on your place now," persisted the prudent lawyer.

"Yas, but it ain' foreclosed yit," cried the negro triumphantly, true to his faith that the Master was guarding his ways.

Dies Before He Can Make His Appea

Last May, driven by his necessities and confident that help would be given him, he went to the convocation of the Presbyterian Assemblies at Atlanta. But before he could so much as enter his plea he was taken violently ill with ptomaine poisoning, and died among strangers. His last conscious words were, "Take care—take good care—ob mah little niggahs!"

His brave widow and the young teacher are doing their best; the judge of the Birmingham juvenile court declares the work must be continued or his hands are hopelessly tied; and the boys are wondering if they will ever have such another friend. Verily, nine and one-half years of Sam Daly's life will outweigh the three score and ten of countless thousands when placed on the unerring scales of high heaven!

School and College

Two new instructors have been added to the teaching force of Dubuque German College and Seminary. One, Stephen Popoff, is a Bulgarian, who will have charge of the science department. He is a graduate of Cornell University.

The third annual summer school of the Korean students of America, which is held each year at Hastings College, is ended. Before the close the boys presented to the college a drinking fountain which they constructed on the campus as an appreciation of the college's effort in their behalf. All of the class of 1913 who sought schools as teachers were located some time ago.

The quarter centennial of Occidental College is to be celebrated the middle of December with a three days' program of great variety. The new buildings on the Eagle Rock campus will be dedicated at that time. The fact that the college will move to a new ninety-acre campus and enter new, modern, fireproof buildings upon which there is not a dollar's debt is unprecedented. The alumni will have a large part in the celebration, and each class is expected to transplant its class ivy and class tree. All the class stones now in the old buildings will be reset in the new buildings, and there will be class reunions. The Christmas vacation is the time set for moving the college to the new location.

A Conservative Bible Organization

The Bible League of North America has elected Dr. J. Benson Hamilton, a Methodist pastor of New York City, to be its secretary in succession to Dr. Daniel S. Gregory, the founder of the organization, whom advancing age has compelled to retire. The Bible Student and Teacher, which has appeared at irregular intervals as the organ of the league, has been reduced in size and renamed The Bible Champion. As is commonly known, the Bible League opposes the application of critical scholarship of the word of God. Ministers who sympathize with its purpose and desire its literature are invited to communicate with the headquarters office, 86 Bible House, New York.

The Open Hearth

The Commander-in-Chief's Orders

It is of rare occurrence that the President of the United States has felt called upon to issue a direct order to loyal citizens temporarily domiciled in a foreign land. It would seem that the exceptional character of such an order would have a tendency to accentuate the alacrity with which such an order should be complied with. Recently President Wilson, with a thorough knowledge of existing conditions in Mexico, directed all Americans to leave the country at once, providing at the same time all necessary transportation. Thousands of Americans have obeyed the summons; many have not. It is with infinite chagrin and sorrow that we note by the daily press that foremost among those who have disregarded the President's order is our own Foreign Board.

Permit me to enter my humble protest and to say to the missionaries in Mexico and to the board in New York under whose orders they serve, that it is no matter of personal safety with which we are concerned; it is a matter of obedience to orders in a critical hour when our commander-in-chief is bending every energy to cope with a condition of affairs that is fraught with stupendous difficulties and dangers. That the President should be the foremost representative of our own denomination but adds to our mortification and may properly be made a handle of by other missionary bodies in the neglect of duty.

"Human Wrong in Church Disunion"

There is so much that is true and admirably well stated in your leading article of Aug. 21 that any criticism of it may seem to be captious and unreasonable. Nevertheless, I crave the privilege of addressing a few words to your readers.

Evidently you mean that God is the author of church disunion only in the same sense that he is the author of sin. He created man free to sin. He left his church free to divide because of differences of opinion as to doctrine and polity. In neither case can we "blame God—unless we disagree with him about the wisdom of human liberty."

True, of course. Then comes this question: Have God's people the right to surrender this God-given liberty at the bidding of those who would bring them into subjection to the doctrines and commandments of men? Is church union to be purchased at the expense of a surrender of a love for Christian truth and of the right to contend for Christian liberty?

You admit that schism is not always sin. You justify, on the Protestant side, the disunion of the church in western Europe in the sixteenth century. But you deprecate Protestant disunion and ascribe most of it to "faults of stubbornness and uncharity . . . outstanding on both sides." You then condemn "that fictitious obstacle to present church union which is created by disseminating the notion that denominational differences are something to be proud over."

This indiscriminate lumping together of both sides seems to me to be very unreasonable. It serves to make obstacles to union fictitious which are not fictitious, but, on the contrary, are very real, important and hard to remove. Every case of disunion must stand or fall, be approved or condemned, on its own merits. And after disunion there can be no proper or real union until the party or parties in the wrong renounce the wrong and take up sincerely the right. Meanwhile those who are in the right, or who sincerely believe that they are in the right, must stand fast or betray their consciences or surrender their Christian liberty. Would you have Protestants unite with the Roman Church before that church renounced its errors of doctrine and polity?

Then as to church progress. Would Christianity in England today be as strong as it is if all Christians since the time of Henry VIII. had remained in the communion of the Established Church? Was not the progress of the church in Scotland advanced by the exodus of the Free Church? Did not the exodus of Wesley and his followers from the Church of England promote the progress of true Christianity? Are not these and other heroic contentions for the truth and purity of Christianity something for all true Christians to be proud over?

Today in the United States there are some Presbyterians who do not feel at liberty to be connected with a church, whatever may be its numbers, wealth and power, which ordains candidates for the ministry who frankly tell their examiners that they do not and cannot accept, and will not maintain, certain doctrines which hitherto all have agreed are fundamental and formative of our Presbyterian system of doctrine, and yet permits those same candidates at their ordination to declare that they do accept and will maintain this system of doctrine.

Is church union to be secured and maintained at the cost of a surrender of the gospel, of honesty, of liberty? If all our fathers had believed that church union was worth this price, where and what would we be today?

Fewer Factory Girls; More Housemaids

Mary E. McDowell's "Red Hat and a Question," in The Continent recently, has raised some discussion among those who know anything about working girls' conditions in Chicago and the localities of which she speaks. The article assumes that every girl who works is necessarily worth as much as her living expenses—which every person who employs labor knows is not always the case. It is a fine thing for a girl living at home to be able to be worth to an employer even $6 per week, because with a home as an asset her wages become profit to her. But without a home she must pay a profit to others to supply her with the scant necessities of a home.

Miss McDowell seeks to arouse pity for the girl with the red hat and thus attract more money to the wage scale or charity in the form of helping clubs and social settlements for the benefit of such homeless girls; all of which is no doubt laudable from the broad ground of humanity and social sympathy. But why should any girl work for $6 per week and board herself? Why must she work in a factory? Analyze the reasons and we will find that the prime cause of such girl's working in a factory at all is false pride and a fatal desire for independence, which generally means the gratification of a spirit which will submit to any yoke provided she and her fellow workers are left to their own devices after working hours and on Sundays and holidays. In the estimation of this type of working girl, it is "freedom" to be ruled by a shop foreman or forewoman for eight hours each day, provided she can go to amusement places with young men and can wear red hats and ready made clothes during leisure hours.

The place for that type of girl is the kitchen or second work of a well ordered home, where now the mistress of the home is overburdened nearly to distraction for the lack of her. Thousands of fine American families are being blotted out by the failure of their youth to marry; and why do they not marry? Because they see in their own childhood the terrific struggle of the mother and the father to make both ends meet and the constant strain to maintain even a semblance of well ordered family life owing to the entire lack of moderate-priced help. The cost of living is constantly increased by the demands of pleasure-loving city girls for higher wages in factories—girls who ought to be working as ordinary servant girls in the kitchens and bedrooms of the ordinary American family.

The average wage of housemaids is $6 per week, which, being in addition to board and washing, means to the working girl, including various extras which all help receive from their employers from time to time, the equivalent of $10 per week. Let us have fewer factory girls and more housemaids.

Ways of Working

Getting the Names of Strangers

The problem of obtaining the names of strangers who may be worshiping temporarily in a church is one which has interested many pastors and other church workers. In some places men who know the regular attendants are stationed at the rear of the church and tactfully ask strangers for their name and address. This is difficult work and in a large church it does not always prove satisfactory. First U. P. church, Chicago, has evolved a plan which has been in operation with satisfactory results for a number of years.

This scheme transfers the scene of greeting a stranger from the rear of church to the pew which the stranger occupies. As soon as a visitor is seated the usher having in charge this plan quietly hands to a member of the church sitting nearest the stranger a card telling him the location of the newcomer and asking him to obtain his name and address at close of service. This regular attendant then speaks to the visitor and puts his name and address upon the reverse side of the card given him by the usher. This stimulates the new members to pay attention to the newcomers and also furnishes a reliable list of prospects.

The session of Cottage Grove Avenue church, Des Moines, Iowa, takes the next step in gathering newcomers into regular membership by sending to every stranger whose name may be obtained a neat card signed by the pastor and elders offering the privileges of the church during residence in the city.

Study Church Efficiency

Through all the hot weather of summer a class with an average attendance of nearly twenty-five has attended a series of conferences conducted in Central church, Rock Island, Ill., by the temporary supply, Rev. Otis G. Dale, formerly of La Junta, Colo. Mr. Dale's class investigated church efficiency under the general topics of worship, instruction, evangelism and service. With the assistance of diagrams and charts the class studied how to conduct the business of a congregation and efficient plans of each of the auxiliary organizations.

It is the testimony of many pastors who have made a close study of the organizations of the church that the need is for more intensive and effective work rather than multiplication of societies.

Sunday School Teachers Have Reference Library

Thanks to the generosity of a friend of the school the teachers and members of the training classes of the Sunday school of Vincennes (Ind.) church have available a reference library, including more than fifty books of Sunday school methods and general church work by a large number of authors. Each department has been remembered in the selection of this library by the pasaor, Rev. A. H. Brand. A librarian will be appointed in the school and the books loaned as they are in a public library.

Outdoor Singing Attracts Crowds

A plan which has increased the evening congregations of a number of New York City churches is that tried by First Union and West Twenty-Third Street churches. At the close of the young people's meeting about 7:45 o'clock the members of the society and others take places on the front steps of the church. From the doorway a stereopticon throws the words and music of familiar hymns on a screen above the steps. Singing is led by a cornetist and precentor, and a crowd quickly collects. A brief address is made by the minister and everyone is invited inside for the regular evening service. This plan has been particularly successful with churches located on streets along which large numbers of people pass.

she murmured, "if it only was, I could stand the low neck and the short sleeves."

And then It came. It held no clew to relieve her bewilderment, only a slip of paper folded inside with her name very clearly written so she could not doubt for whom it was meant—"Cornelia Lavinia Pinning." "And there ain't any other Cornelia Lavinia that I ever heard of," she told herself happily. "It must be me."

The sky-blue dress lay in a forgotten heap on the floor while she tried on her surprise. "It fits like it was made for me," she sighed blissfully. Then as a sudden afterthought came upon her: "Heart alive, I believe it was. Who in all this world?" But try as she would she couldn't solve the mystery. "So I'll just be shut up to thanking the dear Lord," she declared, examining with trembling fingers the dainty stitching, the tucks and ruffles. "After all, it's him, whatever human friend he gave the thought to. Long sleeves and high neck—nobody but the dear Lord knew how I wanted them!"

MR. PHILIPS hesitated about inviting his guests to the humble country church next Sabbath morning. But they had not waited for an invitation—instead, they were ready on the horseblock when the phaeton came around and hurried in as if eager to be off. Mrs. Philips watched them ride away in their pretty summer things and her heart sent up a silent petition, "Help them to remember that it is thy house, Lord, and thy day, in the country even as in the city."

She was waiting at the front door when they came back. She knew by the way they sent a cheery "Good-by!" after the "horseback parson" that their attitude toward him had changed. And then they were upon her, eager, happy, beaming, all talking at once of the transformation of Mrs. Pinning and the new dignity that clothed her so becomingly.

"She didn't blush one minute, Mrs. Philips. Her cheeks were just a cool, soft pink and her lips—oh, I wish you could have seen her smile!"

"It fit her lovely, too, and her sleeves fell over her gloves at exactly the right line!"

"And she sat right out in the middle of her pew!"

Then Myra came and took their landlady by the shoulders and smiled into her face with lips that trembled a little. "I saw last Sunday that we hurt you by our levity," she confessed. "So it's only fair to own up that we're sorry. She opened our eyes, Mrs. Pinning did. We decided that if we had misjudged her so cruelly we were probably misjudging all the rest of the people we had made fun of."

"We talked it over last night," Madge added. "We found this morning what a difference it makes when one is fair and just."

"It is much more satisfactory to help make the music than to laugh at it—we tried the experiment." This from Adelaide. "And we all listened to the text this time. It was, 'As ye would that men should do to you, do ye also to them likewise.'"

"That's a good text to learn—and to live by," declared Mrs. Philips approvingly.

"We mean to try," answered the girls.

"Don't touch that telephone!" screamed Maud. "It's him!"

"Who?" asked Eva Bell.

"The doctor. They have scarlet fever up to the house. He wants me to come up to the house; he says they will die if they don't get someone to help. I can't go, I won't go; it might kill me!"

"Who has scarlet fever?" asked Eva Bell.

"Oh, Grace and the children," Maud sobbed, "and I can't go. Oh, Eva Bell, what shall I do?"

"Be still," said Eva Bell roughly, as a little voice whispered, "You'll get the school now."

But just then something dropped from her book. It was a white glove. She stood irresolute a minute and then turned to Maud. "Maud," she said, "you go right straight to my house. Tell mother I have gone to help Mrs. Brown take care of Grace and the children. You tell her to take some of my books to the bookstore tonight and you take her your laundry. She needs the money."

"Oh, Eva Bell, you are an angel!" the girl exclaimed reverently, but Eva Bell was gone.

Three hours later a tired Eva Bell stood by the table in Dr. Brown's kitchen. A boy came in—a boy whose face bore tear stains. He walked to the window and leaned his head against the glass. The girl felt a quiver in her heart as she looked at his shaking shoulders. She heard that awful sound—a young man sobbing.

The boy's father heard it, too, and came into the room. He was worn and impatient from the afternoon's work. The boy's sobbing irritated him still more.

"It's enough to have a useless son without having a coward," he began. "You are not crying over your brothers and sister. You don't care enough for them to cry. You're crying for yourself because you have to stay here. No one ever accused you of unselfishness. I've spent money on you all your life and what have you done? You have even insulted some of my best patients and you have been rude to your mother's guests. Who invites you any place?"

The boy cringed under the words.

His father went on mercilessly: "When you should be helping here now, you are blubbering like a baby because you are afraid for yourself. Can anyone ever tell me when you did anything except for yourself?"

"I can," said the colored girl.

The doctor's eyes softened as he looked at her. He had not time to question her motives when she came. His wife welcomed her as a blessing from heaven.

"I wouldn't have come if I hadn't owed Don a debt of gratitude," she said. "Last night I lost one of my gloves and he gave me one so that I could graduate. I only came to show my gratitude."

She walked past the astonished doctor to the table. Taking a white glove from the book there, she handed it to him. He took it in his hand and looked at it with a curious expression.

"Where did you get it?" he asked his son.

The boy gulped and answered, "Up to the lake."

The doctor remembered that the family had told him of the boyish affair. The boy himself would not give him his confidence; but he had spent hours in his room writing letters.

"He's just a boy," reflected the doctor. "But he thinks he cares. He let that negro girl wear this glove, and just out of pity. Well, he's my son and I'm proud of him."

He laid the glove back in the girl's hand and walking over to his son put his arm around him. "Forgive me, old scout," he said in an embarrassed way. "We've quarreled a lot in these few years, but it's all over now. You're all right."

Then he turned to the girl. "You're going to have that school just as soon as you get out of here, and get more money than we have paid anyone else for teaching down there. After all, teaching arithmetic isn't to be compared to molding character. You will be that kind of teacher. You have done more in this house this afternoon than a dozen Maud Darnells could have done. And you did it out of gratitude."

The word aroused memories of a board meeting four years before—a meeting where he had been the most bitter opponent to the building of the Lincoln school. It was to this school that he owed his understanding of his son. It was yet time to make a man out of him. And one little word came into his mind and lodged there, cutting like a sword. "Gratitude," he breathed as he abruptly left the room.

Half an hour later the boy who had been generous for the first time in his life was writing a letter. "I am going to bring back your glove soon," he wrote, "and I am coming a different fellow. Your little glove made me do the first kind deed I ever did. I loaned it to a poor colored girl, who had lost hers, to wear at commencement. I had been mean to her, but she forgot that and out of gratitude came here to work when she heard we had scarlet fever. It pulled father and me together and we are not going to quarrel any more. I know you will be glad when you hear that I am going to bring it back, so you can have it after it has done so much good, and I want to be your comrade again."

Down on the back porch a girl was gazing through the falling snow toward a little cupola above her altar. She had tried to utter a prayer of thanksgiving in the house; but some way she could pray better when she saw what she was giving thanks for. And near the end of her petition she paused for a minute; then she said, "And thank you, dear God, for letting me lose my glove."

To Increase Systematic Benevolence

Church Leaders from Coast to Coast, Meeting at Chicago, Discuss Plans to Carry Out Every-Member Canvass.

In furtherance of the plans of the united missionary campaign, which is to culminate in the simultaneous every-member canvass of all churches next March, a conference of Presbyterian leaders was held in Chicago Sept. 3 and 4. At this meeting plans were adopted to reach every one of the 1,400,000 church members by the appointment of committees by synods and presbyteries to urge the adoption of the every-member canvass on the churches. A number of months ago the missionary leaders of all Protestant denominations arranged for this biggest cooperative movement ever undertaken among American churches. Every Protestant church member is to be visited, preferably during March, and given an opportunity to pledge something each week to missions.

The Chicago conference was called by General Assembly's joint executive committee, consisting of Moderator Stone, Dr. William P. Fulton, Dr. J. F. Carson, representing the Executive Commission, and Dr. A. W. Halsey, J. E. McAfee and Dr. J. W. Cochran, representing the boards. Synodical and presbyterial chairmen, pastor-evangelists and board representatives from Oregon to New York were present. Administrative plans were made to reach the entire denomination. These plans contemplate the appointment by synods and presbyteries of a united committee representing its missionary and benevolent committees and its executive committee to cooperate with the joint executive committee named above. These committees will send speakers to the local churches and by conference and other means obtain from each congregation a pledge to make arrangements to canvass the entire membership for missions. The plan as explained by the leaders permits the use of a single pledge to cover both congregational expense and benevolences, or separate pledges for both. The latter is recommended. The plan also is sufficiently elastic to permit special offerings during the year, some churches limiting the number of these appeals, the session determining which shall be presented from the pulpit.

Each attendant at the Chicago conference will visit one or more presbyteries to explain details of the carrying out of the general plans.

According to partial figures presented by Rev. A. F. McGarrah, special agent of the joint executive committee, from a fifth to a half of the churches in presbyteries which replied to a recent questionaire have the every-member canvass in use. The budget plan is used in practically all that have the canvass. Reports on the floor indicated that in Tennessee and other parts of the South and Southwest every church has the plan in use, and in some cases with as many contributors to the benevolent objects of the church as the church has members. In Illinois the every-member canvass has been vigorously pushed for several years.

It is probable that the brotherhoods of the various churches will grasp the opportunity of doing definite work for the local churches by taking hold of the every-member canvass vigorously. R. F. Sulzer of Minneapolis suggested that the men here had an opportunity, and Doctors Henderson and Fox of the brotherhood immediately backed up the suggestion. Later a resolution was adopted urging the special responsibility of the men of the church.

No definite policy has been outlined as to the part the women's organizations and the Christian Endeavor societies are to have in the budget plan, although it is the hope that with modifications for local churches all organizations can unite in the same plan. The use of the deacons in local church canvass was suggested by Moderator Stone, who presided at the sessions.

It was decided that at least a 10 per cent advance in contributions would be aimed at, although it is hoped that the gifts will far exceed that increase. The object is to get everyone interested and to pledge something, no matter how small. Other denominations have found that the total amount of money received has coincided with the amount of interest aroused.

Mr. McGarrah suggested a series of four sermons on stewardship and the budget plan, at various times, leading up to the canvass in March. The literature in print and to be published was also explained. Moderator Stone said that he intended to take two or three minutes each Sunday, in place of pulpit notices, to give a terse outline of the work of some one agency of the church, so that his congregation would know what the church at large is doing. The use of local church papers for the same object was urged by another member.

Those present were: John Timothy Stone, Chicago; William M. Evans, Cedar Rapids, Iowa; W. A. Provine, Nashville, Tenn.; Glen L. Sneed, Dallas, Texas; Jesse C. Bruce, New York City; S. E. P. White, Bemidji, Minn.; F. J. Barackman, Duluth, Minn.; Nathaniel McGiffin, Omaha, Neb.; H. W. Reherd, Waterloo, Iowa; F. J. Cheek, Louisville, Ky.; C. L. Zorbaugh, Cleveland, Ohio; J. M. Dinner for Church Builders

Workmen on Los Angeles Building Guests of Congregation—Church Paper for Each Family—Extension Work by C. E. Union.

LOS ANGELES—The ladies' aid society of St. Paul church gave a supper recently to the men who worked on the new building just completed. The workmen thoroughly enjoyed both the feast and the fellowship that was manifest. All the work on the building was done by day labor under the direction of a building committee and foreman. Through hearty cooperation the building was completed in seven weeks from the time ground was broken and at a cost of about $6,000.

Boyle Heights church carries on a continuous campaign of education in missions and benevolence by putting a church paper into every home represented in the congregation and also into the hands of members of the congregation who haven't homes of their own.

Los Angeles County Christian Endeavor Union is devoting the month of September to extension work. An effort will be made by the entire executive committee to organize societies in all open fields. The campaign is not intended primarily to multiply societies, but to reach the young people and to bring them into active Christian service. A. Huddleson is superintendent.

Los Angeles Presbytery in special session Aug. 25 appointed an executive commission, with power to act, to hear the whole case involving the relations of Rev. O. H. L. Mason with Long Beach church.

An effort is being made by the state officers of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals to arouse interest in the local Humane Society. Women of Los Angeles are urged to write letters to the members of the city council asking an appropriation of $400 for the support of the work. Formerly the fines collected from the prosecution of cases reported by the society were turned into its treasury, but a state law now prevents this, and if the council will not appropriate money for the support of the work the society will go out of existence.

Treasurer Refunds Subscriptions

Members of First church of Frankfort, Ky., are enjoying the unique experience of having money paid back to them by the church treasurer. Several years ago it was determined by this congregation that a new building should be erected and $30,000 was collected as the nucleus of a building fund.

Several months ago 100 members of the congregation offered to the congregation as a whole a new church site valued at about $15,000 on condition that the new building should be erected thereon. The contemplated change would have given the church a commanding location of great publicity, four squares from the present site. Opposition on the part of the older members of the congregation toward any change whatever was so strong that it was considered best to postpone the building project altogether and repair the old building. Therefore the treasurer has been authorized to return to the original donors the money paid in for the new building, together with accrued interest. This church has the distinction of having passed through the civil war and subsequent political troubles without division. Although it has always been loyal to the Assembly, it has for many years divided its benevolent offerings between the Assemblies U. S. A. and U. S. Jesse R. Zeigler, D. D., is pastor.

Egbert Hayes, son of Dr. J. N. Hayes of the Presbyterian mission in Soochow, China, was married Sept. 3 to Miss Eva F. Morris at the residence of the bride's parents, Dr. and Mrs. I. S. Morris, Detroit, Mich. Mr. Hayes has finished the second year of his work in Union Seminary and has accepted mission work under the Y. M. C. A. at Nanking, China, where his brother, L. Newton Hayes, is Y. M C. A. secretary.

Denver Bible Conference Soon

Prominent Ministers Will Instruct -Tenth Anniversary of Rev. O. S. Baum Occurs This Month—Benevolences Increase.

DENVER—The Rocky mountain Bible conference will be held in Twenty-Third Avenue church Sept. 21-28, with Rev. Leon W. Tucker, Los Angeles, and Rev. A. C. Gaebelein, New York City, as the leading teachers. They will be assisted by Rev. P. V. Jenness and Rev. M. A. Stone, McPherson, Kan.; Rev. A. C. Peck, Rev. S. T. McKinney and Rev. Joshua Gravitt, Denver. This association devotes itself especially to prophetic study of the Scriptures and the consideration of devotional topics relative to the Christian life and is maintained throughout the year in Denver. It also does extension work in the neighboring cities.

Valverde church, Rev. Charles A. Hunt minister, has received into membership, as the result of a summer evangelistic campaign conducted by Dr. F. E. Smiley, a large number of members. The church has also been redecorated, new electric fixtures placed and the financial outlook strengthened.

Highland Park church, Rev. O. S. Baum minister, will celebrate the tenth anniversary of his pastorate this month. The church has had a steady and proportioned growth. It supports a foreign pastor, all the money being raised by free will offerings. The church is fifth in membership in the presbytery, but second in its giving to foreign missions, and well up in offerings to the other causes of the denomination. There is an organized system of community and church visitation, with weekly ingatherings of members and persistent personal work. Missionary study classes for young people and adults are conducted through the fall and winter. The pastor has a communicants' class that provides a steady flow of well instructed youth into the church.

Hyde Park church, Rev. Jesse Penney Martin minister, has increased its benevolent offerings 100 per cent, all floating indebtedness from some improvements made in the past has been met and added facilities provided for an extending work. Dr. Martin is chaplain in the National Guard and prominent in civic enterprises.

First Avenue church, J. F. Elder, D. D., minister, is planning as the outstanding feature of its fall campaign a triple educational course, including teacher training, mission study and definite instruction in the Christian life.

Twenty-Third Avenue church, Rev. Perry V. Jenness minister, has during the summer months conducted vesper open air services, with an average attendance of 200. The evangelistic motif has been leading, and among other results has been the conversion of two men who have been for many years confirmed drunkards.

Revive Ocean Shore Churches

San Francisco Presbytery Extends Home Mission Work—Centennial Church Has Twenty-Fifth Anniversary.

SAN FRANCISCO—The picturesque Ocean Shore group of churches, southward along the California coast, is again in the limelight of presbytery. The little rustic edifices of worship built at Salada, Moss Beach and Granada a few years ago in anticipation of the immediate growth of those subdivision beach resorts are likely, through the addition of the evangelical church at Montara, a town farther to the south, to become adequately manned and financed. An adjourned meeting of presbytery has given the home mission committee large powers in the making of negotiations. Montara has a fine building and equipment, and a membership ready to accept Presbyterian leadership and government; and Rev. J. S. Thomas, pastor-evangelist of Sacramento Presbytery, is available for the pioneer work.

Three notable recent social events include the farewell reception of Olivet church, which bade adieu to its pastor, Rev. William E. Parker, Jr., who went to Chicago to be associate superintendent of church extension after a nine years' pastorate in this city; the farewell reception of First church, Oakland, to its retiring pastor, Frank L. Goodspeed, D. D., given with the attendance of large companies of friends and prominent Oakland citizens and officials in the handsome new edifice that Dr. Goodspeed has just brought to practical completion; and the twenty-fifth anniversary celebration of the organization of Centennial church, East Oakland, continuing through an entire week and addressed by a number of old-time pastors and former Sunday school superintendents and elders, and which splendidly exhibited its large immediate growth under the efficient pastorate of Rev. Herbert E. Hays.

The annual young people's day at the Occidental Board Sept. 1 was addressed by three student volunteers—Messrs. Day, Cochran and Wilkie—who told of the increased interest of the Christian Endeavor societies which were contributing to foreign mission enterprise through the Occidental Board. Preparation for the forthcoming semiannual meetings of synodical societies at Santa Rosa in October during the sessions of synod occupied the business hours of the day.

Novel meetings of outgoing missionaries and students were held on Wednesday evening, Sept. 10, in the Berkeley churches for the purpose of interesting the university men and women in work. College Pastor Arthur Hicks was assisted by E. F. Hall, district superintendent of foreign missions, L. A. McAfee, D. D., and Rev. G. G. Eldredge in encouraging a large attendance. There were about twenty-five in the missionary party.

W. H. Oxtoby, D. D., the new professor of Hebrew literature in San Francisco Seminary, arrived in the city in time to occupy the pulpit of St. John's church for the last Sunday in August.

City Boys May Learn to Farm

Visitor to World in Chicago Gets Inspiration for Important Gift—McCormick Seminary to Open Sept. 16.

CHICAGO—Through the interest of the owner of a Michigan farm, twenty-five boys of Chicago's congested districts are to have a chance to grow strong and clean and become farmers. R. E. Jennings, near Paw Paw, Mich., heard of the work of the Chicago boys' clubs at "The World in Chicago." He saw where the boys live and thought that they would have a better chance in the country. For three or five years or longer boys are to be kept on his farm until they are sufficiently experienced to obtain employment. The officers of the club having the matter in charge look on the experiment as one having large possibilities.

Presbytery devoted considerable time Sept. 1 to passing the necessary motions releasing four pastors from their work and listening to the numerous speeches of appreciation by fellow ministers. Rev. C. L. Lucas was released from Morgan Park, Dr. H. D. Jenkins from Riverside, Rev. A. J. Montgomery from Oak Park Second and Dr. George B. Safford was dismissed to Minneapolis Presbytery. Dr. Jenkins has been in the pastorate forty-five years and has been at Riverside thirteen years. He will remain in Riverside and devote himself to editorial work. Mr. Montgomery goes to Portland, Ore., and Dr. Safford to Minnesota as Anti-Saloon superintendent, as has been previously announced by The Continent.

A son of Dr. H. S. Jenkinson of Arlington Heights church has been accepted by presbytery as a candidate for the ministry.

All friends of the institution are invited to the opening exercises of McCormick Seminary Tuesday, Sept. 16, at 10:30 a. m. Dr. Cleland B. McAfee will deliver an address, "The Old and the New in Theology."

STUDY CHURCH PROBLEMS AT CAMP

Members of presbytery to the number of eighty-five went to Lake Geneva Monday afternoon to spend two days at Olivet camp, the guests of friends. This outing took the place of the retreat usually held for a day later in the fall. A number of papers on church efficiency were discussed.

Rev. Pierre Beauchamp, who has been doing a notable work among the French at St. Anne, will be released from his pastorate by presbytery at an adjourned meeting at 10 o'clock sharp Sept. 15 at assembly hall. He has accepted a call to St. Hyacinthe church, Montreal. The first meeting of the ministers' association this fall will follow the adjourned meeting of presbytery next Monday.

Men of these and many other countries have gathered at Dubuque for another year of work to acquire the English language and lay the foundation for Christian leadership among their own people in this country. Last year there were at Dubuque German College and Seminary, an increase of 253 per cent in eight years. The total enrollment has also increased in about same proportion. Twenty years ago all of the students were of German and Holland stock. The demand for pastors of foreign speaking congregations of other races led to an enlargement of the facilities of the institution until nearly twenty nations have sons at Dubuque being trained for Christian leadership. During the summer our students have been scattered over many states earning money for their expenses in school, and learning of the conditions that they must face on graduation. One young man went to Gary, Ind., and gathered a considerable congregation of fellow Hungarians. A Spanish student visited the 2,000 Mexicans in a Texas city, preparing the way for a mission. Many Presbyterians have had the pleasure of working with us in this institution.

If you are interested, tell us so. Address Dubuque German College and Seminary, C. M. Steffens, D.D., President, Dubuque, Iowa.

C. A. last week, attracted large crowds, as he did at the evening services held in various churches. In one of his addresses he urged the necessity of the downtown church.

The Presbyterian Training School opened its sessions Tuesday with an encouraging enrollment.

MERCHANTS HELP OLIVET DISPENSARY

Merchants and manufacturers in the vicinity of Olivet Institute have offered to assist in the work of the dispensary which the institute has been conducting for some time. It is hoped that this work may be enlarged.

Miss Laura B. Walker, sister to Rev. James E. Walker of First U. P. church, has gone to Alexandria, Egypt, to take charge of a girls' school.

Raymond Robins, who accompanied Fred B. Smith on the Men and Religion tour around the world, has returned to his home in this city. The party held nearly 500 meetings and addressed 145,000 persons. Meetings have been held for a short season in England.

Will Go to Milan for Congress

Professor Charles Scanlon Named by President as One of Representatives of This Country—Consider Liquor Problems.

PITTSBURG — Professor Charles Scanlon, general secretary for the temperance committee, with headquarters in this city, has been appointed by President Woodrow Wilson to represent the government at the international congress against alcoholism in Milan, Italy, Sept. 22-28. The Milan meeting will be the fourteenth held by the congress. Professor Scanlon represented the United States at The Hague in 1911. About thirty governments will send representatives to the congress, where the liquor question in all its phases will be discussed. Miss Marie C. Brehm of Pittsburg, a temperance lecturer who has been touring Europe, will address the congress in its final session upon temperance teaching.

Mrs. Catherine Booth-Clibborn on a recent Sunday told at Perrysville church the story of her persecution when she crossed the channel to unfurl the flag of the Salvation Army in Paris and Switzerland. She comes from the Winona conference. Mrs. Booth-Clibborn has recently withdrawn from the Salvation Army and will take up church evangelistic work exclusively.

General Assembly Minutes give five churches in Pittsburg Presbytery as having over 1,000 members: East Liberty 1,617, Pittsburg First 1,601, Pittsburg Third 1,225, Pittsburg Hammond Avenue 1,125 and Pittsburg Second 1,011.

Open New Mission in St. Louis

Presbyterians Given Right of Way in Growing Portion of City—Markham Memorial School Takes Banner.

ST. LOUIS—Arrangements have been made for the establishment of a mission in Southampton, a recently opened subdivision. The city federation of churches has indorsed the location and a lot has been purchased on which a temporary building will be erected.

Markham Memorial school won the city banner for general excellence among the summer vacation Bible schools, of which there were twelve the past season.

It has been decided that the Presbyterian Ministers' Association will meet but once a month during the coming year.

Local pastors have practically all returned to their pulpits for the fall work.

State Troops End Gambling

The action of Governor Ralston of Indiana in ordering the state militia to the Mineral Springs race track to stop gambling there has attracted the attention of all persons interested in the suppression of vice against the desire of local authorities. According to reliable reports the local authorities of the county in which the gambling occurred made no attempt to stop it. The governor sent representatives to the track and soon found that betting, which had been stopped earlier in the year, was again in progress. What action, if any, is to be taken against local authorities for failure to enforce the law has not been announced.

Converts Rally at Carnegie Hall

Close Summer Evangelistic Campaign with a Large Service - Open Air Service for Workingmen on Labor Sunday.

NEW YORK—To mark the close of its ninth tent, open air and shop campaign, the evangelistic committee of New York City is holding a series of rallies in shops during the week, in all the tents next Sunday evening, a mass meeting in Union square on Saturday evening and the converts' rally in Carnegie hall next Monday evening. Yesterday a polyglot service was held at noon in Union square, with addresses in Italian, Roumanian, Bohemian, Hungarian, Polish, Yiddish, Chinese and English. The closing rally for the Spanish work is to be held in Madison Square church next Sunday afternoon in charge of Rev. Samuel F. Gordiano, who has resumed the meetings of the Spanish Evangelical church and is preaching a series of sermons on the general subject, "Christ and His Doctrines."

At St. Nicholas Avenue church a unique open air service was held in the evening of Labor Sunday, when an illustrated lecture showing how workingmen live was given in the church yard under the direction of Dr. John W. Stephens, the new secretary of the brotherhood of New York. This church has an active organization of the brotherhood, with a membership of ninety, which accomplishes much practical good through its strangers' bureau and employment committee.

Rev. James Mursell of Brisbane, Australia, preached last Sunday for Fifth Avenue church, holding its last service in Madison Avenue Reformed church. There will be no further services until the church opens after its renovation the first of October, when Dr. Jowett will be in his pulpit again.

Rev. Frank S. Niles, a nephew of Dr. Mary Niles, who is at the head of the Presbyterian hospital for women in Canton, China, has gone as a missionary to Hwaiyuen, where Central church maintains a mission compound with schools, hospitals and church. The congregation has twelve missionaries there, several of whom are supported by individuals. Dr. and Mrs. Merle-Smith support two. Mr. Niles, who is 25 years old, a graduate last spring from Princeton Theological Seminary and pastor-in-charge for the past year at Park church, Newark, is sent out by Miss Anna T. Van Santvoordt, a sister of Mrs. Merle-Smith.

DR. VAN DYKE SAILS FOR HOLLAND

Dr. Henry van Dyke, former pastor of Brick church, with his family will sail from New York Sept. 16 to take up the duties of the post to which he has been appointed by President Wilson as minister to The Hague.

On the morning of the recent wreck of the second section of the Bar Harbor express on the New Haven railroad Secretary Stanley White was coming down from Bar Harbor, where he had preached on the preceding Sunday; but happily he took the first section and escaped the wreck. Secretary Robert E. Speer, however, was an immediate spectator of the terrible disaster, for on his return from his vacation in the White mountains he was a passenger on the White mountain express whose engine dealt the terribly fatal blow to the second Bar Harbor train. No one was injured among the White mountain passengers, and Mr. Speer worked with all his fellow travelers to aid the relief of the injured.

Robert E. Hume, D. D., of the theological training school at Ahmednagar, India, has been nominated to succeed the late Dr. George William Knox as professor of the history and philosophy of religion and of missions at Union Seminary. Dr. Charles R. Gillett, registrar and secretary of the faculty, has been elected dean of the student body. Dr. Gillett is the oldest member but one of the staff in point of service, and served for twenty-five years as librarian.

Dr. Orr, Noted Scotch Theologian, Dead

Professor James Orr of the theological college of the United Free Church of Scotland in Glasgow died at his home in that city on Saturday, aged 69. Both in this country and abroad Professor Orr was well known and admired for his intellectual ability, scholarly attainments and Christian character. He made several trips to the United States and did a vast amount of public speaking and lecturing in addition to his continuous literary activity and his work as a teacher.

Dr. Orr was born in Glasgow and was graduated from its university. He was trained in theology by the U. P. church and ministered to a church of that denomination at Hawick from 1874 to 1891. He gained fame in this country for his lectures on German theology in Chicago in 1895 and for his lectures on the Elliott and Morgan foundations at Allegheny and Auburn in 1897 and in Princeton in 1903. He took a leading part in the negotiations for union between the Free and the U. P. Churches. He was coeditor of The Union Magazine and United Free Church Magazine and professor of church history at the theological college of the U. P. Church of Scotland for ten years following 1891. He published as author, editor or collaborator a large number of religious works. Among his books are "The Problem of the Old Testament," regarded as a standard among the conservative works on the Old Testament, which won the Bross prize offered by Lake Forest University; "The Bible Under Trial," "The Virgin Birth," "The Resurrection of Jesus," "Sidelights on Christian Doctrines," "Faith of a Modern Christian" and "Sin as a Problem of Today."

Rural Churches Show Growth

Per Capita Contributions to All Causes Increase Largely in Twenty Years - Dr. Tully's Ninety-Fifth Anniversary.

PHILADELPHIA—Some interesting facts have recently been observed concerning the eighteen rural churches of Philadelphia North Presbytery. A number of these are weak numerically, but during the last two decades they have received approximately 2,040 upon confession and 980 by letter, or an average for each church on confession of 113 and by letter of 54. The net increase in membership of these eighteen churches during these twenty years has been 588, or 36 per cent, and for their Sunday schools 258. The largest growth was made between 1892 and 1897, which was a period of financial depression, and the smallest between 1897 and 1907, a period of financial prosperity, when the rural churches lost most heavily to the business centers. The benevolences of these eighteen rural churches, in the two decades considered, averaged $3.09 a member. There has been a steady increase from year to year, the amount given in 1892 being $4,800 and in 1912 $8,554. The increase in congregational support has also been large, the average per member for twenty years being $11.48. The average per member for benevolence increased from $2.92 in 1892 to $3.83

THE DOCTOR'S GIFT

Food Worth Its Weight in Gold

We usually expect the doctor to put us on some kind of penance and give us bitter medicine.

A Pennsylvania doctor brought a patient something entirely different and the results are truly interesting.

"Two years ago," writes this patient, "I was a frequent victim of acute indigestion and biliousness, being allowed to eat very few things. One day our family doctor brought me a small package, saying he had found something for me to eat.

"He said it was a food called Grape-Nuts and, even as its golden color might suggest, it was worth its weight in gold. I was sick and tired, trying one thing after another to no avail, but consented to try this new food.

"Well! It surpassed my doctor's fondest anticipation and every day since then I have blessed the good doctor and the inventor of Grape-Nuts.

"I noticed improvement at once and in a month's time my former spells of indigestion had disappeared. In two months I felt like a new man. My mind was much clearer and keener, my body took on the vitality of youth and this condition has continued."

"There's a Reason." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

in 1912, and for congregational support from $7.86 to $11.63. The averages in these churches both for benevolence and for congregational support are the highest in the synod, although in average additions to membership they fall lower than in some other presbyteries.

Doctors Alexander Henry, secretary of the Board of Publication, and James A. Worden, superintendent of Sunday school training, have returned from Europe.

The nonagenarian minister, Dr. David Tully, pastor emeritus of Media church, celebrated his ninety-fifth birthday recently. He was given a reception by the ladies' aid society of the church, which was largely attended by his brethren in the ministry and others.

Miss Mary I. Craig and Miss Emily E. Patterson, deaconesses of the Philadelphia Training School and Deaconess House, left last week for the China mission field.

OLD CHURCH TURNS INTO MISSION

The fine old Episcopal Church of the Evangelists, Catherine street above 7th, founded in 1846 and famous the world over for its costly art treasures, has been turned into a mission for Italians. It had become so surrounded with foreigners that but a scant score of worshipers attended. The first week of the change 200 were enrolled. An Italian minister conducts the services and a Polish minister will soon be also engaged. The former rector, Dr. Henry A. Percival, spent many years collecting the church furnishings and fitting and preparing a guide book describing them.

Matthew Anderson, D. D., pastor of Berean church (colored), maintains and is president of a manual training and industrial school which has accomplished great good among the colored people of the city. For its encouragement and support he has received an annual appropriation from the state. This year, however, the governor withheld approval of the appropriation, and to save the school from closing Dr. Anderson is making appeal to individuals for necessary funds. W. J. McCohan and George Burnham, Jr., have contributed $1,000 each.

Rev. W. C. West of Wellsville, Ohio, has been called to West U. P. church of this city as successor to Rev. Frank Getty.

Martin G. Brumbaugh, LL. D., city superintendent of public schools, has been asked by the Sunday school union to write a book on the training of the emotions and the will. It is said to be the first time that the organization has asked an American to write a book. At the recent world's Sunday school convention at Zurich Dr. Brumbaugh's paper on "The Making of a Teacher" is said to have attracted much attention.

Rev. Charles H. Bond, secretary of the Christian League and long active in the home missionary society, died suddenly Sept. 2. He belonged to the Disciples Church, was 71 years of age and left a widow, four sons and a daughter.

Harvest home week is being celebrated at Lemon Hill. About 400 men and women, all over 65 years old, were present on Old Folks' Day, being taken in loaned automobiles. The oldest was 114. Among the speakers of the week was Senator Moses E. Clapp of Minnesota.

W. Barnes Lower, D. D., of Wyncote upon his return from his vacation was summoned by telegraph to the bedside of his father, who is very ill at Omaha, Neb. W. P. WHITE.

Have 1,600 in Bible Schools

The commencement of the daily vacation Bible schools of Milwaukee was held at Calvary church Aug. 15. The program included songs by the different schools, address by Rev. Mark Wayne Williams of Prospect Avenue Disciples' church and the award of honors. During the six weeks in which the schools were in operation there was a total enrollment of 1,600. The enrollment by schools was: Berean 168, Calvary 124, Faith Mission 306, Grace 144, North Milwaukee 92, Northminster 261, Perseverance 413, West Allis 86. In connection with the Perry centennial celebration the vacation schools made a notable showing. Several hundred of the pupils in simple uniform marched in the procession, singing songs, giving yells and carrying banners with appropriate inscriptions. This successful summer enterprise was managed by Rev. Robert S. Donaldson, chairman of the committee in charge; Miss Florence M. Bullock, superintendent, and Paul E. Hinkamp, director. Mr. Hinkamp returns this month to pursue his studies in McCormick Seminary.

Downer Home—the rest home for ministers—beautifully located in a splendid residence district on the shore of Lake Michigan, has had its usual quota of guests this summer.

Ground was broken for the new building for Washington Park church, Milwaukee, Aug. 19. The congregation expect to occupy it before winter. Rev. L. W. Ewing is pastor.

Illinois

Work on the new church at Fulton was recently completed.

Rev. Wilson Aull, pastor of First church, East St. Louis, before his departure on his vacation distributed a card bearing the names of the supplies for the pulpit during his absence.

Dr. and Mrs. A. R. Taylor left Decatur Sept. 1. The days immediately preceding their going were filled with marks of appreciation of their work. Aug. 29 a reception was held at Second church, when a memory book was presented to them. It was filled with reminders of people and associations of the church. Sunday morning the pastor, Rev. J. W. McDonald, had Dr. Taylor speak a farewell message at the morning service. Monday evening the men of Decatur gave a dinner in honor of Dr. Taylor, who is retiring as president of James Millikin University. The addresses showed how thoroughly the leading citizens of Decatur appreciate the work he has done there. This note of appreciation was voiced by no one more clearly than by Dr. George Emory Fellows, the incoming president.

Missouri

Special meetings for six days at Coal, Henry county, by Rev. J. W. Mitchell resulted in several conversions.

It is expected that Dr. Warren H. Wilson and Rev. Matthew B. McNutt will attend the prepresbyterial meeting in connection with the Presbytery of St. Joseph at Akron Sept. 15.

Oregon

The new Chinese church in Portland will be named after Dr. and Mrs. W. S. Holt, who in 1885 were called from China to take up work in Portland. In connection with the mission there is an English night school for men in addition to various religious services.

Pennsylvania

Dr. William Henry Swift, pastor at Honesdale, has resumed charge of the congregation after several months of severe illness, which incapacitated him for service. Dr. Swift has been pastor at Honesdale since 1885.

Kansas

By order of the pastor the bell of Chanute church will ring no more, according to press reports. It is thought that every worshiper can get to church on time without the use of the bell.

Indiana

Plans have been made for the enlargement of Warsaw church. The improvement will cost $12,000 and the basement will be equipped with a gymnasium.

New Jersey

Lawrence M. Mead of Plainfield, the only son of Mrs. Frederick R. Mead, who is a member of the national council of the Y. W. C. A., will sail from Seattle Sept. 29 for China under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A. for a short term of service of two or three years. He has finished one year in Union Seminary, whither he went after being graduated at Princeton University.

Minnesota

Redwood Falls church is expending over $4,000 on improvements on its building.

Watonwan church has enjoyed the services of H. R. Shear of Princeton Seminary, who closed his work Aug. 17. Two rural districts were added to his field and the three congregations gave him a reception before his return.

The Christian Endeavor society of St. Paul Central church has maintained its record of other years with a big attendance throughout the summer. There were over 100 at the prayer meeting of this church Aug. 24 during the absence of the pastor, Dr. H. N. Wilson.

Y. M. C. A. work has called Rev. Frederick Schmitt, pastor of Arlington Hills church, St. Paul, to Minneapolis, where he becomes religious work secretary. He formerly was assistant pastor at Westminster church, Minneapolis.

Iowa

The church at Lebanon has recently been papered and painted. Rev. John W. Dickson, pastor at Milton, preaches there.

The Christian Endeavor society of Mason City church successfully conducted the midweek prayer services during the absence of the pastor, Rev. L. C. Cooley, Jr. Three delegates from the Storm Lake conference gave a program at a morning service on their return.

Professor G. C. Fracker, formerly of Coe College and recently with the Michigan State Normal School, will become educational superintendent of the Sunday school work of Iowa Oct. 1. He will have headquarters in Cedar Rapids and cooperate with Presbyterian colleges and churches of the state.

W. L. Richardson, who has been the superintendent of the Oak Grove Sunday school for the past six years, leaves Mason City for Oklahoma City, Okla. The Mason City church, which became free from debt and assumed self-support this year, owes a large debt to this elder.

The churches of Mason City during the summer had a successful series of Sabbath evening services, which were held in the theater. Among the out of town speakers was Attorney General Cosson of Des Moines. The closing meeting was a labor service, to which the unions of the city were invited and which was well attended.

Idaho

Rev. W. S. Bosard has taken charge of the work at Aberdeen. This field has been vacant since Jan. 1.

Arthur C. Evans served a group of three country churches in Twin Falls Presbytery during the summer and De Forest N. Shotwell preached four months at Big Bend and Arena Valley. Both are students of McCormick Seminary

E. P. Linnell and W. R. Kruse, McCormick students, who spent the summer in Kendall Presbytery, have closed their work and returned East. Mr. Linnell served three preaching points—Teton Basin, Victor and Driggs. He leaves a new church in course of construction at Victor. Mr. Kruse preached at Felt, Lamont and Drummond until Aug. 1, when he was transferred to Rigby, and Mr. Linnell put in charge of all six points. A chapel was built at Drummond during the summer.

North Dakota

Rev. W. A. Horn began work at Rolla Aug. 31 and Rev. Ralph T. Fulton will commence at Towner Sept. 15.

Land has been given by the Soo Line railway for a church at Baker, on the Fordville and Drake extension of the road, and it is hoped in a few days that ground will be broken for a cement block church. The pastor-evangelist, Rev. Howard S. Morrison, has been raising money for the building, which is planned as a social center for the town.

Montana

Rev. Newman Hall Burdick, pastor of Helena church, has met with the sad loss of an only daughter, 16 years of age.

Rev. H. G. Klemme, pastor at Harlowton church, since he took charge one year ago has raised $900 of old debt. The exterior of the church has been painted, new pews installed, piano bought and paid for and the pulpit carpeted.

California

A most profitable Bible conference was held in First church, La Jolla, beginning Aug. 11 and continuing a week. Rev. J. H. Hunter, formerly of Moody Bible Institute, but now of Los Angeles, was the speaker and gave two addresses daily. Many tourists, who were visiting here from all over the country, attended. It is the purpose of the pastor, Rev. H. G. Birchby, to hold such conferences at least twice a year, probably in February or March, and in July or August, when visitors are most numerous.

A reception in honor of the forty-seventh anniversary of the pastorate of Rev. Richard Wylie at Napa was recently held by the ladies' aid society. There were present ten persons who were at the church when Mr. Wylie first became pastor.

The daughter of E. A. K. Hackett, superintendent of the Sunday school of Immanuel church, Los Angeles, and proprietor of The Fort Wayne Sentinel, sails soon for China. She will be stationed under the board in Canton, where the Hackett Medical College is located.

Young people of Calvary church, Riverside, to the number of sixty gathered Aug. 18 in the home of the pastor for a social. Professor Henri Ferger, who had arrived in San Francisco three days before, told of his work in the Gordon Mission College of Rawal Pindi, India, where he went as a short term teacher under the U. P. mission in 1910. He is a Presbyterian, and after a month in his home in Chattanooga goes to New York for further preparation before returning to India. He will probably study in the Teachers' Training College.

At East Newport, one of the beaches in the southern part of the state, Sunday morning services have been held in the pavilion, and at the instigation of two young girls interested in foreign missions collections were taken for the support of a boy in the Allahabad Boarding School in India, where Mrs. Arthur Ewing has decided to remain since her husband's death last September. The worshipers were not numerous and they came from many different denominations, but it was not long before the necessary $35 for the year was raised. The two girls started many thinking by their enthusiasm.

New York

The fifty-ninth wedding anniversary of Rev. and Mrs. Washington D. McKinley of Warsaw was recently celebrated quietly. Mr. McKinley is a graduate of Princeton Seminary and has held pastorates in several central New York towns.

Miss Mary A. Beecher died recently at her home in Onondaga Valley at the age of 70 years. She was assistant to her brother, Rev. John E. Beecher, in several pastorates in central New York and compiled a complete directory of all Presbyterian ministers from 1706 to 1881.

For about eighteen years some of the good people of Utica and vicinity have been giving companies of New York poor children a chance to enjoy a fortnight of country life. The "Tribune Fresh Air Fund" pays the transportation charges between New York and Utica. The Utica people contribute the amount necessary to pay trolley fares and a small weekly compensation to those who open their homes to the children. Six or eight children each are taken on farms in the country around Utica, some of these farmers opening their homes year after year. A voluntary committee attends to the arrangements. Dr. Dana W. Bigelow, pastor of Sayre Memorial church, Utica, is chairman. In the season just closed 313 children had the benefit of the outing in this way.

The contract for a new edifice to cost $16,500 has been awarded by the trustees of Madison church.

The ladies' aid of Kadoka church, Rev. Glenn H. Shaw stated supply, voluntarily worked to increase the Sabbath evening attendance and the credit for the offerings is given to them. They recently gave a musical recital which netted $38.

The rural church of Norway, near Hurley, is being served this summer by W. O. Benthin. The quickened interest in the congregation has called for special evangelistic meetings conducted by William Wallace, D. D., of Sioux Falls, pastor at large.

President-Elect Harry Morehouse Gage of Huron College is to be inaugurated Sept. 30, when Dr. C. H. French, the retiring president, will deliver the charge and the president will deliver his inaugural. Dr. John P. Williamson will express the congratulations of the synod and President John A. Marquis of Coe College the welcome in behalf of Christian colleges generally.

A strong program is being arranged for the Synod of South Dakota, meeting with the church of Groton Oct. 2 in the commodious new house of worship, one of the best in the synod. Rev. Jacob Scott Butt is near the twenty-fifth anniversary of his pastorate with this people. The statistics of this synod, as appearing in the Minutes of Assembly, indicate encouraging growth—one more minister, five more church organizations, seven more candidates for the ministry, forty-seven more members added on confession than during the previous year. A total church membership of 156 more and 968 more members in Sunday schools is shown, as well as an increase of contributions as follows: To home missions $64, foreign missions $82, church erection $26, ministerial relief and sustentation $85, freedmen $94, temperance $19. The items showing decreases—fewer licentiates, elders, deacons, members added by certificate and baptisms. Contributions decreased—Sunday school missions $274, college $4,712 and congregational expenses $3.802.

Illustrated Lecture on Presbyterian Colleges

The College Board has prepared an illustrated lecture with about fifty-five steropticon slides telling something of our Presbyterian colleges and the work under the care of the Board. About half of the slides are colored and the lecture is of a character to interest a popular audience.

This lecture is suitable for use in presbyteries or synods as well as in churches. It gives no details of any particular college, but attempts to give a general impression of the whole college work of the denomination. The slides will be supplied to pastors and others who desire to use them without charge except that the user is expected to pay transportation both ways. Address the associate secretary, Dr. James E. Clarke, 415 Church street, Nashville, Tenn.

Financial Situation

Bond Market Shows More Strength—Graphic Example of Loss on Purchase of Vacant City Lots.

Trade during the last two or three weeks has been slightly irregular, due to local conditions. According to Bradstreet's, however, the bond market has shown a further moderate improvement. Several desirable issues have lately been absorbed, although some of the many choice offerings have been ignored. The demands upon the banks of the Middle West for currency to harvest the crop have depleted the amount of reserve cash on hand, although it is not expected that there will be any difficulty in getting the crop to market. The money deposited by the federal treasury has taken from this season any possibility of stringency, and call loan rates in Chicago are about 5 per cent.

Loses Money on Vacant Lots

In connection with the recently published account in this column of the buying, by a friend of The Continent, of vacant real estate on Long island, another reader recounts his experience in buying vacant lots in a Middle West city.

"I bought two lots on the edge of a town for $300 apiece twenty-nine years ago," he said. "I had a little money that I wanted to invest and judged that the town was growing in that direction. I expected to realize on them with an advance in a few years. As a matter of fact, the town did not grow that way as rapidly as was expected, and a fence was put on the lots back of my property in order to inclose a ball park, which did not improve the value of my lots. I sold the property the other day for $1,300, having paid $600 twenty-nine years ago."

A little computation shows that the profit on these two lots is only superficial. If interest on the money invested is considered, together with taxes and depreciation of the value of the dollar during the twenty-nine years, there was a loss of nearly $1,000. This is the way it figures out:

Two lots at $300	$ 600
Simple interest at 6 per cent, 29 years	1,044
Taxes at $10 a year	290
Depreciation of the money standard at 35 per cent	210
Total	$2,144
Selling price of the two lots	1,300
Loss	$ 844

Some economists figure that the dollar of twenty-five years ago will now purchase only 58 cents' worth of food. In order to be generous, a depreciation of only 35 per cent on the dollar is estimated on the above computation.

This does not take into consideration the interest on the taxes which was lost during the same twenty-nine years, nor interest on the $1,044 interest—no small sum.

If the same reader of The Continent had invested his money in a farm mortgage twenty-nine years ago he still would have the farm mortgage, or its equivalent, and would in the meantime have accumulated considerably over $1,100 interest, which could also have been invested in $500 amounts and would be returning him an additional annual income of $30 for each $500.

Very often new investors are attracted by large profits claimed for attractive propositions by solicitors. Investigation by a disinterested, conservative man often shows, however, that it is frequently much more satisfactory to invest a single amount of money in farm mortgages than in any other investment.

Joint Use of South Dakota Indian Training School

The Bible training school department of the Santee Normal Training School for the Sioux Dakota Indians of the Congregational Church, located near Springfield, S. D., is hereafter to be under the joint management of the Congregational and Presbyterian churches and Rev. Jesse P. Williamson, son of John P. Williamson, D. D., has been called to take charge of it. It is to be the training school for church workers among the Dakota Indians of the two denominations from the clergy down to the Sabbath school teacher.

an interesting and beautiful woman, are discussed at some length; and Penny, disillusioned by her first love, is made to see that love is not all of life. The book ends with her happy marriage. [E. P. Dutton and Company, New York. $1.35 net.

Jocasta, and the Famished Cat, by Anatole France; translated by Agnes Farley. Readers of M. France's later work in English translation may be rather disappointed with these stories, especially if they fail to remember that they were published in 1879, constituting the author's first works of fiction. Both the grimness, the disillusion and the wit of the later Anatole France are here, although in cruder form than they have since developed. The first is the story of a girl who loved her surgeon but married a banker at her father's behest; the second a satirical study of a number of Parisian artists and Haitian expatriates. [John Lane Company, New York. $2 net.

King John of Jingalo, by Laurence Housman. Under the guise of "The Story of a Monarch in Difficulties"—the monarch of an imaginary but easily recognizable country—Mr. Housman has written a humorous but occasionally bitter satire on contemporary English public life. In spite of its being primarily satire, the story is interesting, has a consistent plot element and the characters are immensely well drawn. No reader of this tale will retain that blind reverence for royalty as such which so often characterizes even the dwellers in a republic. [Henry Holt and Company, New York. $1.50 net.

A Makeshift Marriage, by Mrs. Baillie Reynolds, is concerned with the tragic love affairs of a churlish young man who has been regarded as the hero in an aristocratic suburban community. An atmosphere of splendid English home life is carried throughout the book. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.25 net.

The Inside of the Cup, by Winston Churchill. This book received editorial review in the issue of Sept. 4. [Macmillan Company, New York. $1.35 net.

Miscellaneous

Light on the Last Days, by Charles A. Blanchard. President Blanchard has given twenty-eight years to the study of the book of Revelation, and in this little volume gives a sketch of the results. His conclusions are premillennial and he treats the book entirely without reference to the considerable body of apocalyptic literature of its period. He finds it largely predictive, closing the historical section with the letter to the Laodicean church. All that follows is an outline of events yet to occur. The seven letters of chapters 2 and 3 he thinks addressed not simply to the particular churches named but to the church in its various periods, the Laodicean period now prevailing, and therefore closing the "church age." This is not, we think, the view of any critical students of the book. [Bible Institute Colportage Association, Chicago. 75 cents net.

Travers' Golf Book, by Jerome D. Travers. Any amateur who will read and reread Mr. Travers's very interesting and undogmatic book and study its pictures will find the time well spent. Mr. Travers simply tells how he has gone about becoming a good player, and it is for the reader to decide how fully he can apply this knowledge to his own game. The champion himself believes it is worth while to have a professional instructor at the beginning, and to do a great deal of careful practicing before and along with regular play. [Macmillan Company, New York. $2 net.

Our Own Weather, by Edwin C. Martin. That the weather may still be made an interesting topic is shown by Mr. Martin's scientific yet simple treatment of it. He characterizes weather as "the air's business" and his purpose is to show how the air conducts it. In the accomplishment of this he makes clear the causes of many things familiar to experience but not always understood. [Harper and Brothers, New York. $1.25 net.

Fifty-Five Years. This interesting little volume is a souvenir of one of the most striking pieces of continuous Christian work that have ever been accomplished in this country—the development and extension of the Y. M. C. A. in Chicago. Cyrus Bentley and W. P. Montgomery, two Chicago citizens, succeeded in organizing the Chicago association in 1858, and its first impulse of growth proceeded from the nationwide religious revival of that year. D. L. Moody soon became a leading factor in the life of the organization, and under his leadership it became an instrumentality of extraordinary evangelistic power. Later, under Secretary L. Wilbur Messer, who has now served the association for twenty-five years, there has come a marvelous institutional development in which today evangelistic and social purposes achieve practical expression through a network of branches covering the whole vast metropolis of Chicago. The profuse illustrations greatly heighten the interest of the volume. [Board of Managers, Y. M. C. A., Chicago.

Great Revival Hymns, No. 2; for the Church, Sunday School and Evangelistic Services, edited by Homer A. Rodeheaver, B. D. Ackley and Charles H. Gabriel. This gospel song book makes good its claim of providing for every department of the church and Sunday school. It supplements Volume I. of the series by presenting a large number of new, though thoroughly tested, hymns. The musical editor deserves especial praise; but the printing is so small in places as to be annoying. [Rodeheaver Company, Chicago. 35 cents net.

My Adventures with Your Money, by George Graham Rice, is a series of confessions by a man who is well known among promoters of various stock selling schemes. As a result of his experiences, during which $500,000,000 of the public's money passed through his hands, he says that the man who buys shares of railway, industrial or mining stock to be sold at a profit may come out even if he is fortunate. He speaks with authority. [Richard G. Badger, Boston. $1.50 net.

Camp Helps the Hosts

A summer camp is made to increase the interest of church members in their community and at the same time provide newsboys with an outing by First church, Mount Vernon, N. Y., Rev. Joseph H. Hollister pastor. A summer camp is maintained at a small lake and after the Boy Scouts and Campfire Girls of the church had outings there a party of newsboys was taken for vacation. Members of the church paid the small expenses for the boys at camp. The boys are all members of a club maintained by the congregation. They include Italians, Jews and others not ordinarily found in the church itself. The enterprise has stimulated interest of the church in the community and it is hoped that by another year all the churches of Mount Vernon will cooperate and make it a truly community outing for the less fortunate boys.

Order of Recruits Has First Meeting

The first annual meeting of the Order of Recruits for the Ministry and Missions met at San Anselmo, Cal., Aug. 18 to 22. It was resolved to memorialize the Synod of California to recognize the order and recommend Presbyterian young people contemplating a life of Christian service to unite with it. Classes were conducted by Dr. Pratt of the San Francisco Bible College, Rev. E. F. Hall, western secretary of the Foreign Board, and Paul C. Brown of the state Christian Endeavor union. Addresses were delivered by President W. H. Landon of the seminary, Rev. G. S. McCune, Dr. L. A. McAfee, Dr. Caroline Merwin and Mrs. F. H. Robinson. This is a recently organized order with the pledge of the student volunteers modified to admit members of any denomination who contemplate a life work of service either at home or abroad. It was started by Rev. George E. Ross of Charlottetown, Prince Edward island, and has made considerable progress in Canada. It is not exclusively Presbyterian, but it is recommended that denominational affiliations of each chapter be maintained. Dr. T. F. Fotheringhame, Orland, Cal., is pastoral counselor of the Sacramento chapter.

Hotel for Kansas City Girls

A hotel for working girls has been opened by First church, Kansas City, Dr. Frank S. Arnold pastor. A four-apartment building has been leased and room and two meals a day may be obtained for $2.75 to $4 a week. There will be a piano, telephone and stationery for the use of the girls, and accommodations are provided for forty-five young ladies each with a single bed. It will be open to girls of any faith.

Ministerial Obituary

Louis Meyer, D. D.

The death of Dr. Louis Meyer of Monrovia, Cal., ends in midlife the career of a man of remarkable parts. Dr. Meyer was converted to Christianity under the influence of the Covenanter Church and became a minister of that denomination. But one of his main interests continued to be the conversion of men of his own race. He was identified for years with the Chicago Hebrew mission, served for a long period as associate editor of The Missionary Review of the World and was for a while connected with the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions. Latterly he had been the editor of the series of books called "The Fundamentals," which have been distributed by the generosity of the Stewart brothers of California.

William Hutton, D. D.

William Hutton, D. D., founder and for forty-five years pastor of Greenwich Street church, Philadelphia, died Sept. 4 of cancer of the face after a lingering illness of many months. He was born in Ireland over seventy years ago and came to this country when a boy. He was graduated from Hamilton College in 1864 and three years later from Union Seminary. He organized and was installed pastor of Greenwich Street church in 1867 and was its pastor through all the years of his life. For more than twenty-five years he was superintendent of its Sunday school and exerted a most beneficent influence over the young people. He was very active and influential as a presbyter and for thirty years was secretary of the Presbyterian Ministerial Association. He served on the summer evangelistic committee from its organization and in all union ecclesiastical movements in the city was a prominent factor. Great confidence was felt by his brethren in his wisdom and his counsel was much sought. He will be greatly missed in the city and many will long cherish his memory. Dr. Hutton never married. He leaves a sister who resides in Providence, R. I., and a brother, whose home is in Chicago.

W. P. W.

John A. Rodger

Rev. John A. Rodger, who several months ago resigned the pastorate of the church of Skaneateles, N. Y., died Aug. 26 in his fifty-eighth year at Summer Hill, near Moravia, N. Y. Mr. Rodger is survived by his widow and two little children—Margaret and John—by a sister, Mrs. Linus Russell of Ogdensburg, and by a brother, Henry Rodger of Oswego.

As a boy in Second church of Oswegatchie Mr. Rodger desired to study for the ministry, but after the death of his father it seemed best that he should remain on the farm. When about 35 years of age, however, the old desire to be a minister reasserted itself, and after preliminary study he entered Auburn Seminary. Mr. Rodger's first church was the Dutch Reformed church at Owasco. Ten years later he was called to the Congregational church of Moravia and after five years was called to Skaneateles, where he remained nearly five years, until paralysis made further service impossible.

Funeral services were held in the Congregational church, Moravia, conducted by the pastor, Rev. Plato T. Jones, assisted by Rev. Earl H. Thayer, a former member of Mr. Rodger's Bible class. A second service was held, previous to his burial in the churchyard of Oswegatchie Second church, at the home of Mrs. Linus Russell. This was conducted by the pastor, Rev. John F. Humphreys; by a cousin, Daniel A. Ferguson, D. D., of Hammond, and by a nephew, Rev. James Elmer Russell of Watkins.

Rev. James M. Kelley

Rev. James Manton Kelley died at his home in Youngstown, Ohio, Aug. 9. While conducting the last of a series of revival meetings in the spring of 1911 he suffered a severe attack of bleeding from the throat, and during the course of a long illness which followed he was subject to similar attacks. As if in direct answer to the prayers of God's people throughout the district, his strength was restored almost as suddenly as it had been impaired and he was permitted to preach the word with wonted earnestness. But some months later he became the victim of a complication of diseases. Though none realized better than he the seriousness of his condition, he insisted on going far and near to do the work that was given him to do. More than once he was brought home desperately ill, but only a little later he would be found holding forth at some church or mission or house of sorrow. On his last Sunday on earth he preached twice at Evergreen church in Youngstown.

Mr. Kelley was born near Findlay, Ohio, in 1855, the eldest son of Ethan and Jane (Kennedy) Kelley, descendants of earliest settlers of Butler county, Pennsylvania. He was one of three brothers who forsook the carpenter trade to enter the Presbyterian ministry. He was a graduate of Mount Union College and Western Theological Seminary. He was well known throughout the tristate region as a preacher and pastor, having been stationed at Clintonville, Manor, Cadiz, Dayton and Youngstown. He married in 1882 Miss Arabella Russelle of Salineville, Ohio, who survives him, together with two daughters, two sons and two brothers—Alfred of Alliance, Ohio, and Newton of Osborne, Kan. He was a preacher the remembrance of whose thirty years of faithful ministry is an abiding benediction to those who knew him best and loved him most.

H. E. K.

Isaac C. Ketler, D. D., LL. D.

Dr. Ketler was the founder of Grove City College and for a quarter of a century was the center of its life. Nearly a score of years ago J. N. Pew, a lifelong friend, was chosen president of the board of trustees and was reelected each year until death claimed him. During this score of years these two men were recognized everywhere as the leaders in the development of the institution. Each had a strong and definite personality, but they supplemented each other as perfectly as did the different members of the noted Roman triumvirates. Dr. Ketler was a remarkable example of enthusiastic devotion to a great life work. He was not preeminent in intellect or in scholarship, but his intellect and scholarship were vitalized and energized in the white heat of a great purpose. His intense self-sacrificing devotion made it possible for him to enlist the sympathy and cordial cooperation of strong men and men of large means. The result was the rapid, healthful development of a great educational institution that will ever stand as the fitting monument erected by a great life.

Dr. Ketler's death came most unexpectedly. When told the end was very near he received the message with the perfect calmness that is possible only to the man who has the anchor of Christian faith. He realized that his life work for the Master and for his fellow men was finished, and he was satisfied. He spoke calmly and cheerfully of his plans for the college to the members of the faculty. To the members of the board of trustees he sent the following message that greatly touched every heart: "Dear Yoke Fellows: I love you. Stand true to the word of God; to Jesus Christ, the Divine Son of God; to God, the Three in One, I commit the interest of the college to the board of trustees and the faculty. It is a labor of love. Let it always stand for the best things." Then he asked to be alone with the members of his own family, ever nearest and dearest to him. In a little time the kind friend and great educator passed through the vale, and the mortal had put on immortality.

We sorrow most of all that we shall see his face no more, but he has left most fragrant memories and has left the world the better and the happier for his having lived in it.

Coe College contributed its second graduate to the Y. M. C. A. work of Honolulu with the departure of Glenn E. Jackson recently. Arthur E. Larimer, another graduate, has been the educational secretary of that association for a number of years.

Take Your Choice

No. 1.

To the Editor: In your issue of Aug. 23 you make reference to The Menace in no complimentary terms; in fact your smug "contempt" for this brave little paper makes true Presbyterians ashamed of The Continent. Perhaps you don't know that there are hundreds of good Presbyterians in and around Chicago that read this paper every week and defend it as well.

You either are guilty of gross ignorance of the demoralizing effect of the Roman Catholic hierarchy in every phase of life, or you are no better than they, as you condone and acquiesce in their nefarious work.

The Menace sometimes uses unpleasant language because it is engaged in trying to clean up a foul and dirty mess, and to have such as you stand on the sidelines criticising and detracting is enough to make good men disheartened.

CHAMPIONING SLANDER

Our Presbyterian contemporary, The Continent, has been at it again. Attacking the Catholic Church, through innuendo, misrepresentation and even downright mendacity, is no new avocation for The Continent. It is, in fact, a favorite recreation for the scurrilous pens that do the editorializing for that paper. In the latest issue to hand, however, we find it assuming a somewhat novel role in partially championing an official organ of slander, the vileness of whose pages has constituted grounds for proceedings to bar it from the mails. The Continent professes to see a danger to what it is pleased to call "the liberty of the press" in the measures taken by the Knights of Columbus to induce the postmaster general to exclude this filthy sheet from the mails, and says: "If a precedent were established for suppressing this paper by a blanket executive order, simply because it criticises Catholicism, no paper would thereafter be safe which pointed out the tyrannies of Rome in even the mildest terms." This is an attempt to evade the question by first dodging the truth, and backing that move up by the utterance of an expression of venomous bigotry.

The Continent knows that it is prevaricating when it intimates that the publication in question "simply criticises Catholicism," and it convicts itself of its own insincerity when, in the same breath, it says: "We have no confidence in this [anti-Catholic] paper at all—do not regard it as in any sense a credit or a strength to Protestantism. We both detest its spirit and doubt its sincerity."

The Continent shows its "consistency" by following up this statement as follows: "If Catholic influence should appear at all likely to accomplish its object in this direction every American loyal to the original ideas of the republic must stand up in defense of this publication, obnoxious though it is."

That is to say, if a vile, slanderous and obscene publication is to be denied the use of the mails, "loyal" Americans should rush to its defense. A fine occupation for "loyal" Americans truly.

Our Presbyterian contemporary says "there are laws sufficient to keep this or any other paper from printing slander and obscenity." True, and the law excluding such publications from the mails is one of them, but The Continent does not want this law invoked by Catholics, lest it might operate to prevent lying sheets from slandering their church and its ministers. In its pusillanimous and inconsistent effort to defend a publication so vile as to be unmentionable, the organ of Presbyterianism puts itself on a par with that which it champions.

FIRE! FIRE! WHERE?

In the hearts of
HURON COLLEGE STUDENTS

Who have gone to Japan, Korea, the Philippine Islands, Persia, and to every part of South Dakota and the Northwest preaching the gospel, healing the sick, establishing justice, teaching righteousness and living for the Kingdom of God and the good of their fellow men.

Seventy-one young men and women have gone out from this college. In almost as many places they are kindling the fires of good citizenship, unselfish service, pure devotion.

The College seeks to kindle a fire in the heart of a boy (or girl) that he may kindle a fire out in the world. But the fetters of debt hinder its work.

The following is a summary statement of our indebtedness as it existed on August 1st.

Total debt not provided for in any way . .	$14,533.35
Amount needed from August 1st to September 1st, for equipment, supplies, repairs, printing, labor, etc., (estimated)	2,000.00
Total needed by September 1, 1913	$16,533.35

May we tell you more particularly about it?

TWO churches in Owego, N.Y.—Presbyterian and Congregational—thought that they would be stronger if they combined forces. They did. The larger building was occupied and the other turned into a social center for the whole county. Here are rooms for farmers' wives in town, for clubs of girls and boys and for gymnasium. This happy union William T. Ellis describes in his pleasing style next week. In the same issue, among other good things, will be a suggestive discussion by Mrs. Newell Dwight Hillis of dreams and dreamers and what they have accomplished for the world. Mrs. Hillis has a special interest in the ambitions and practical perplexities of young women and is one of The Continent's most valued contributors.

PRESBYTERIAN TRAINING SCHOOL

of Chicago

for Christian Workers

Organized in 1908 by the Board of Church Extension of the Presbytery of Chicago

The demand for people who "know how to do it" is one of the conspicuous signs of the times.

Every trade and line of work is opening schools for training its workers.

It all means that we are awake to the need of people knowing how to do things and learning it in school instead of wasting time, and doing harm, experimenting on the public.

Shall we be less wise in our church affairs?

Don't you think it is time for us to undertake more seriously the training of church workers, other than ministers?

Directors of education, pastors' assistants, church secretaries, deaconesses, visitors—call them what you will or vary the duties as may be required—all should be trained in the School and come to the pastor ready for helpfulness.

That is part of the task of the Presbyterian Training School of Chicago. (Open this year to women only.)

If you are a prospective student, or if you want to help such a School, let us hear from you.

Around the Shop

If a law could be passed—and enforced — abolishing excuses for not doing things and putting a bounty on excuses for doing things, the Around-the-Shop man believes the world would be better off. Christian people do a lot of things they shouldn't do—everybody will readily admit that; it's because of what they don't do that the church so often lags.

Here is a press dispatch in the paper that has just come to the desk:

Goshen, N. Y., Sept. 7—The steeple of the Presbyterian Church was struck by lightning shortly before 5 o'clock this afternoon. No one was injured except the barkeeper at a local hotel, who was walking near.

Of course you know the moral the barkeeper will draw from his experience: "Keep away from churches." And plenty of excuses offered for not going to churches are about as absurd as this would be.

There are a variety of excuses in service for not subscribing to and reading a religious paper. "Haven't time to read it" is an old standby. "The price is too high" is another that has come down through the generations. The Around-the-Shop man could fill his little snuggery with the common or garden variety alone. Few of them have any real validity, except the one least frequently advanced—that the paper lacks quality.

Here is where the pastor's part comes in—to show his people reasons why they should take a good paper. They will supply their own for not doing it—and the ones most fertile in devising their objections are the ones who always have reasons for not doing other things he'd like to have them do.

Join the Anti-Excuse for Not Doing It Society. There are nearly 40,000 members of The Continent family who have qualified.

THERE are in the world 160,132,000 Slavs according to recent figures published in The Review of Reviews. Of these about 3,550,000 are in America. From their forefathers came some of the most zealous defenders of the faith known to Christianity. These Bohemians, Russians, Bulgarians, Poles, Slovaks and Slovenians are scattered thoughout the United States in city and country. They came here to seek homes and to become stable citizens. They have, however, few religious leaders and can be reached only by men of their own tongue. Dubuque German College and Seminary is training such leaders. A group of young men from Bohemia is planning now to come to this country to enter our institution. They desire to be pastors for their own people in America. Many Presbyterians are sharing in the work of training these and similar men from many nations.

We shall be glad to furnish further information on request—a postal card will do. Address

The Revised Hymnal of the Presbyterian Church

This new edition of The Hymnal has been prepared with the needs and beliefs of the Presbyterian Church particularly in mind: it teaches Presbyterianism.

A thorough revision has been made of the 1895 book, taking into consideration the need of the broadening responsibility of the Church, to provide hymns treating of brotherhood, social service and the reign of God in the entire sphere of Christian life, thus making from one-fourth to one-third of the book entirely new.

Hymns that have failed to establish themselves in popular favor have been removed, while both hymns and tunes that have proven most helpful, and are liked best generally, have been retained.

Many tunes have been set in lower keys or modified in harmony in the interest of congregational singing, but the general high musical standard of the previous book is retained throughout.

The new book has been issued that the Presbyterian Church may have for use in its worship the best book of spiritual praise. The Hymnal is the best; best musically, best from a literary point of view, best in convenience of arrangement, best in workmanship and material value.

Over 400 churches have adopted this new issue.

More than 62,000 copies have been sold.

You want the best; you want your musical service up-to-date.

WHAT ARE THE CHILDREN READING?

Quite probably you don't know.

Food on the dining table must be wholesome for the young folks—parents watch that narrowly. But of food on the library table they very commonly have no knowledge beyond the labels.

What the school teacher recommends, what the librarian recommends, what the bookseller recommends, what the publishers advertise most insistently, what the neighbors are talking about, what has the smartest popular reputation—these are the books and magazines that come into the house. On such second-hand authority father and mother accept them sight unseen.

To be sure, there is no other ready way. The young folks have much more time to read than their busy elders. It would be next to impossible to read ahead of them all the time and determine precisely what they shall see and what they shall not see in print.

But none of this excuses the parent for being too busy to take any care at all for the children's reading. Running a successful business or keeping an immaculate house doesn't for a moment begin to compare with the importance of raising a family of children And there is no right raising of children which does not take serious and studious account of their reading.

Let father neglect his ledgers and mother her cookbooks if they must, but let them not dare neglect the pages out of which their children are learning life's fixed ideas of what's worth striving for.

Grant that it is not practicable, even if it seemed wise, for father or mother to scan beforehand every book or magazine read by their growing boys and girls; yet this much is possible:

In every home with children the father or the mother should have definitely appraised in advance the temper and tendency of every author whom the children are allowed to follow and every periodical laid before them on the family reading table.

As for any adviser whom either children or parents consult about reading, the parents should make themselves fully aware that the teacher or librarian so trusted holds by the same ideals of character as they themselves cherish for their children.

In this way parents may not indeed foresee the exact words and clauses the children are to read, but they will assure themselves of the right effect of their reading on their lives. It is like sending a boy or girl away in company with a high-minded friend. One does not know what the friend will say to the child, but he does know that the child will come back nobler for the association.

This signifies, of course, that it is not specific terms and incidents which matter so much in young folks' reading. The thing of consequence is the view of life to which they are introduced—whether they are shown the spirit mastering the flesh or the flesh stamping out the spirit.

Some people have a notion that any book is immoral that exhibits the presence of gross sin in the world. These persons would not permit in the hands of a young reader a page alluding to any kind of evil more serious than passing childish misdemeanors. But that theory of shielding the young is as futile as the attempt of the Indian king to protect his princely son from hearing of death.

Before any youth is out of his teens he should have read what will make him know the location at least of the direst pitfalls that await his feet in manhood. Young women, too, should be similarly afforded the defense of a sufficient knowledge.

But both should have read the shuddering truth from authors who abhor the sin they tell of—who are bent on making visible its hideousness, deceit and ruinous consequences—who write to warn.

The most damning and damnable note in literature is that accent of curiosity which pricks on the reader to look a little closer at what ought instanter to repel him.

The slender, almost imperceptible thread of curious interest to know a little more, is a tiny snare, but there is strength enough in it to strangle a conscience to death and haul stout young feet into unescapable quagmires.

Just once to find an author toying with that subtle scarlet tangle of temptation is reason enough for forbidding any of his volumes entrance into the home thereafter.

And just once or twice to find a magazine printing stories stained with that mark is reason enough for ceasing patronage of it.

Very artistic and all that! But art can't atone for making evil alluring—or even interesting. Honest writing makes vice repulsive. Moreover, it does not omit to make purity attractive.

At the present hour this problem is peculiarly serious. Recent realization of the importance of telling boys and girls the truth about the wicked world they are going out into, is being appropriated for polite apology by sin-gloating vultures in a startling proportion of late books and magazines.

"We are showing your sons and daughters the temptations they must avoid," these precious hypocrites cry. But it's foully false. They are not caring for right and wrong at all.

In a glamourous and superheated air they play with the mock jewels of carousal and vice until the boys and girls of good homes get the glare of the deceitful baubles in their eyes and begin to crave them. Such writers have a terrific account waiting to meet them somewhere in a righteous universe.

It is especially distressing how authors of seemingly excellent quality are led off into risky imitations of this vile coquetry with wickedness. Even Winston Churchill, writing a novel whose moral earnestness in the large compels the praise recently given it in these columns, narrowly misses, in some episodes of his story, classifying himself with those who delightedly dally over scenes of immorality.

And Mrs. Inez Haynes Gillmore, who has so beautifully in times past glorified the sweetness of simple American home life, now in "Angel Island" debases her exquisite talents to the creation of pictures which, if not actually vicious, are at least so baldly sensual that they might all too appropriately adorn the vestibule to vice.

To keep out of his home the literature of sensuality and to bring in a literature that speaks for sanity, cleanliness and religion, no Christian household head can be on too rigid guard.

He who is not on guard is traitor to his children—traitor, too, in the longer reaches to church and state.

For children reading foul literature will soon be men and women making for a vicious society, an unstable state, a paralyzed church.

The World

Tariff Bill Passes; a Wilson Triumph

The first half year of President Wilson's term has seen the first big item on the Democratic program practically carried into effect in the passage by the house and senate of a tariff bill which materially reduces the tariff on nearly all imports and places many articles on the free list. By a vote of 44 to 37 the senate last week adopted the amended bill, which is now in the hands of the conference committees of the two houses, where the differences between the house and senate measures are being adjusted.

Broadly speaking, the senate cut the rates about 4 per cent lower than had been fixed by the house, and the house had made a reduction of 28 per cent from the existing Payne-Aldrich law. On the free list are wool, live stock, wheat and some other agricultural products, sugar in 1916, and other less important articles. It is estimated that the senate's additions to the free list will cut down the government's revenues many millions, but to counterbalance this a tax on cotton sold for future delivery has been added, likewise a duty on bananas, which latter impost has aroused objections at home and from Central America. A tax on incomes above $3,000, instead of $4,000, is provided and the surtax on larger incomes is made heavier. An objectionable feature injected into the bill would permit an evasion of the civil service law in the operation of the new income tax collecting machinery. A praiseworthy feature is the exclusion of goods manufactured chiefly by child labor. A commission to revise the tariff laws—which might eventually result in taking the tariff out of politics—is again provided for.

President Wilson has succeeded in putting through, in all but its last stages, a tariff revision measure in ample time to allow the country to experience its effects before the next presidential election. There will be three years before the voters have to give another decisive verdict, in November, 1916, and the workings of the Underwood-Simmons bill will doubtless be apparent long before that time. Republican predictions of disaster were freely made in the protracted debate in the senate, but the President and his friends think these forecasts will remain unfulfilled.

"A Fight for Free Business"—Wilson

"A fight for the people and for free business, which has lasted a long generation through, has at last been won handsomely and completely. I am happy to have been connected with the government of the nation at a time when such things could happen, and to have worked in association with men who could do them," said President Wilson in public comment after the senate had taken its action. Referring to the next great step which he wants Congress to take, the President added, "There is every reason to believe that currency reform will be carried through with equal energy, directness and loyalty to the general interest. When that is done this first session of the sixty-third Congress will have passed into history with an unrivaled distinction."

In the roll call on the bill Senator LaFollette (Republican) of Wisconsin furnished a surprise by voting "aye" with the Democrats, all of whom with the exception of the two Louisiana senators lined up in the affirmative. Senator Poindexter of Washington, the only "Roosevelt" Progressive, also voted for the bill, and the Republicans, aside from LaFollette, were recorded against it.

Lights and Shadows in the Philippines

The new governor general of the Philippines, Francis Burton Harrison, will find several problems awaiting him on arrival, one of the ugliest being that of peonage or slavery. It is startling to hear that slavery exists under the American flag, but Commissioner Dean C. Worcester, secretary of the interior in the Philippine government, not long ago reported that it is comparatively common "for Filipinos living in territory adjacent to that inhabited by Negritos, Tagbanuas, Ilongots or Ifugaos to obtain children or adults of these tribes by capture or by purchase and to hold them as slaves, selling them to others when it proves financially advantageous to do so. Such unfortunates are clearly chattels, and are often sold repeatedly."

Dr. Worcester cites a typical case of a Tagbanua who was sold three different times, and declares he could give the names of thousands of slaves from the non-Christian tribes. He places the blame for this condition upon the Filipino assembly, which body he says has refused to pass necessary remedial legislation. Assemblymen are said to have objected to giving the matter publicity, and it was also contended that the old Spanish code was sufficient to prohibit any form of chattel slavery. Commissioner Worcester, however, has asserted that there is no law in the islands prohibiting the sale of human beings.

In contrast to his dark stories, Commissioner Worcester paints a bright picture of the "sanitary miracles" wrought in the Philippine islands by the Americans, who have eradicated, in whole or in part, smallpox, Asiatic cholera, bubonic plague, beriberi, leprosy and other scourges. Hospitals have been established and insanitary customs wiped out—this in addition to the great work of public education and private missionary efforts.

Mexican Congress Meets; Rebels Harass Americans

The Mexican Congress reconvened on Tuesday and received a message from President Huerta—which is understood to have been prepared by the indefatigable foreign minister, Gamboa—presenting the American difficulties from a south of the Rio Grande standpoint. In Washington last week $100,000 was appropriated by the house and senate to be used for the relief and transportation of Americans in Mexico.

A large number of American refugees, including women and children, on an overland journey from Torreon to Saltillo, were reported to have been beset by rebels and bandits. The party was headed by a deputy consul general, J. C. Allen of Monterey, who went to Torreon to tell the Americans there of President Wilson's warning to leave the country.

Panama Canal Ready Within a Few Weeks

Rapid progress is reported in the final stages of the Panama canal. The dry excavation work was completed September 6 and all the equipment has been removed from the Culebra cut. The flooding of the trench is to begin October 9 and future excavation will be by dredging. The last barrier on the Pacific side, the Miraflores dike, was dynamited six days previously. Another dike on the Atlantic side remains to be dynamited in addition to the dike over which the railroad crosses at the Gatun locks, but these last obstructions are expected to be cleared away so that small vessels can pass through the canal by October 10 and general shipping in December. This is considerably in advance of the time originally scheduled.

That this tremendous engineering undertaking which the United States is bringing to a successful close is not on a large enough scale is the opinion expressed last week by Captain Philip Bunau-Varilla of Paris, who negotiated the sale of the rights of the French De Lesseps company to the American government. Captain Varilla is visiting in America, and in an interview in Chicago he prophesied that trade through the new waterway would be so enormous that twenty years from now the United States would be compelled to enlarge the capacity of the canal by deepening it and removing all locks and making a sea level channel. By that time, he said, the locks would be useless. Captain Varilla also predicted that the completion of the canal would change the equilibrium of power in the Pacific and bring a crisis in the relations of this country with Japan.

Memorials to Peace and War on Lake Erie

A notable celebration took place at Put-in-Bay, Ohio, last week in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of the victory of Commodore Perry on Lake Erie in the War of 1812. September 10 at 10 o'clock marked the hour when the fleets of Perry and the British Captain Barclay met each other in a battle which was momentous, even though the number of men engaged and the size of their ships were comparatively small. One of the speakers recalled that between the United States and Canada there is the longest international boundary line in the world, from end to end without fortifications and with no feeling on either side of the line that fortifications are needed.

Ex-President Taft was spokesman for the United States and Dr. J. A. Macdonald of Toronto for Canada at the ceremonies. Rev. A. J. Carey, colored, of Chicago, also spoke a word for the soldiers and sailors of his race. Governors of many states were among those who responded to toasts. The president of the Society of the Daughters of the War of 1812 also made an address. The central motive of the permanent Perry memorial just dedicated is to be when completed a column 335 feet high surmounted by a massive bronze tripod illuminated by a cluster of a hundred incandescent lights. Near the column will be a museum and colonnade, the colonnade inclosing on three sides a heroic bronze statue typifying "Peace by Arbitration." The three structures will stand in a plaza 750 feet in length extending from the waters of Lake Erie to Put-in-Bay.

China Allays Japan's Ire; Notes on California Law

Japanese anger toward China, which had been stirred to a fever heat at Tokyo, was allayed last week by the pacificatory attitude of President Yuan Shih Kai, who hastened efforts to comply with the demands of the Japanese government for full reparation and an apology for the killing of three Japanese at Nanking and the maltreatment of two army lieutenants. Chinese and Japanese soldiers later clashed on a section of the railway from Peking to the sea. President Yuan apparently has no intention of courting trouble with Japan, even though the recent uprising against him in southern China received Japanese aid.

Washington observers of the situation in the Orient regard it as rather fortunate that just at a time when negotiations between the United States and Japan were becoming delicate Japanese attention should be diverted by actual rather than theoretical outrages against Japanese subjects nearer at hand to Japan than is California. Four official notes have been addressed to this government by Japan, and though they have not been made public their language is said to have been strongly insistent on the point that the California legislation against aliens was an unfriendly act. In reply this government has upheld California's sovereignty and asserted that the treaty provisions between the two nations have not been contravened.

Mayor of New York City Dies in Mid-Atlantic

William J. Gaynor, mayor of New York city and an independent candidate for reelection, died suddenly on shipboard last Thursday. He had left New York on the Baltic a few days before for an ocean voyage which he hoped would improve his health, as since he was shot three years ago by a discharged city employe he had suffered from the effects of the wound in his neck. Mayor Gaynor's death had the effect of completely disarranging the exciting New York political situation, as he was looked to by his very numerous admirers to rout both the Tammany candidate, Judge McCall, and the fusion candidate, Mr. Mitchel. Although a Democrat and nominated by Tammany influences in 1909, he was distinctly not a Tammany mayor and for that reason the Tammany organization headed by C. F. Murphy refused him a renomination.

Mr. Gaynor was noted for his vigorous independence and political courage, as well as for keen wit, scholarship and originality. His aggressive honesty was universally recognized, along with certain temperamental faults, such as obstinacy, impetuosity and bitter intolerance of criticism. Born in 1851, Mr. Gaynor was one of a family of thirteen children. He made an excellent record at the bar and had a career of sixteen years on the bench previous to receiving his last office.

Colonel A. L. Kline, president of the board of aldermen, who is a Republican, will be mayor until the first of January. He announced that he would carry out the policies of the late executive.

Zionism Progresses Despite Dissensions

The Zionist congress at Vienna, an international gathering of those Jews who foresee their great racial hope in the reoccupation of their ancient homeland in Palestine, was very enthusiastic and optimistic. The progress which the movement is making in gaining American support was considered especially cheering. Nathan D. Straus of Brooklyn and Louis D. Brandeis of Boston were regarded as particularly influential recruits. Mr. Brandeis sent a letter urging an immediate worldwide organization to encourage Jewish emigration en masse back to the ancient fatherland.

A project was set afoot to raise half a million dollars to establish a Jewish university in Jerusalem. It is said that a quarter of this sum is already subscribed. There are some serious dissensions in the Zionist ranks between the Wolffsohn party from Germany and the Ussisschkin party from Russia. The latter faction is now in the majority. Nevertheless, to show the solidarity of the movement, the congress elected Wolffsohn president.

Lodge for Spirituality Against Materialism

The annual presidential address before the British Association for the Advancement of Science is always anticipated with keen interest by cultured Britons. But this year lively concern in it extended far more widely than usual to the general population, and especially to the rank and file of church people, because it was understood that Sir Oliver Lodge, the president, expected to speak of the immortality of the soul, a theme never before introduced in that scientific atmosphere. It had been rumored that Sir Oliver would present from his psychical studies what he regarded as a scientific demonstration of personality prolonged after death. When the association met, however, in Birmingham, Sir Oliver's home city, he contented himself with asserting his own opinion that psychical experiments have shown that "memory and affection are not limited to that association with matter by which alone they manifest themselves here and now, but personality persists beyond bodily death." He cited no specific proofs.

The main stress of Professor Lodge's discourse proved to be laid not upon this particular point of spiritual existence, but on the parity of spiritual fact with material fact. He insisted that materialistic scientists had no right to assume that they were handling the only real phenomena of the universe. Morover, he strongly emphasized the folly of considering the modern scientific age as the only age which has enjoyed valid and dependable knowledge. His impressive statement of faith in the immaterial realities of the universe, including religion, was summed up in the following cogent paragraph:

"Many scientific men still feel in pugnacious mood toward theology, because of all the exaggerated dogmatism which our predecessors encountered and overcame in the past. They had to struggle for freedom to find truth in their own way; but the struggle was a miserable necessity, and has left some evil effects. And one of them is this lack of sympathy, this occasional hostility, to other more spiritual forms of truth. We cannot really and seriously suppose that truth began to arrive on this planet a few centuries ago. The prescientific insight of genius—of poets and prophets and saints—was of supreme value, and the access of those inspired seers to the heart of the universe was profound."

Social Gospel Not Identified with Socialism

The Brotherhood of the Kingdom, a small group of ministers and church workers devoted to emphasizing the social gospel of Christianity, held in late August an annual meeting of unusual importance at its regular assembly place at Marlborough, New York. The most vital discussion was over the question whether the brotherhood should identify itself with socialism. On this theme the speakers were Professor Rauschenbusch of Rochester and Dr. W. H. Gardner of Newark. The conclusion was that there should be no active alliance between a political party working for an economic program and a spiritual organization like the Brotherhood of the Kingdom, devoted to promoting Christianity. But it was acknowledged that a large proportion of young ministers imbued with the ideas of social Christianity are individually entering the Socialist party.

One significant point developed in considering the place of the idea of sin in the social teaching of the church was the frank confession that so far the preaching of the social gospel has not tended to produce an individual conviction of sin. But it was insisted that this will appear in full strength as the social movement gradually develops a theology, which, according to the admission of this brotherhood, it has not yet done.

So far the Brotherhood of the Kingdom has established only four local chapters—in New York City, Boston, Rochester and Los Angeles. Plans were laid to multiply this number very considerably in the coming year. The formation of corresponding organizations in England, France and Germany is also hoped for.

The Cross as a Throne

THERE is a constant marvel in the variety of appeal which the cross of Christ makes to men. There are many books about it. Men who talk of it, either from theory or from personal experience, use widely varying language. No one phrase describes it. We do not note, however, a familiar use of the conception of the cross which makes it a throne from which Christ is ruling. One of the early church fathers in speaking of it said, "God is reigning from the tree." It is a profound observation which will bear much thought.

The cross is a throne of God's revelation. It is a custom of monarchs to present themselves before their subjects and other rulers in the full glory of their thrones. When the king of England opens the sessions of parliament his state chariot and his robes are still the wonder of the populace. He is showing himself there as king. Nowhere does God more reveal his true heart and character than in the cross.

The heavens do not declare his glory more than the cross; the firmament does not show his handiwork more fully than the cross; while neither the heavens nor the firmament nor the earth reveal his love as does the cross. More men have been drawn to God by what they have seen of him as he is revealed in the cross than by all other manifestations together. Men have known him as God more fully there than anywhere else. It is there that he has flashed out his glory until men who have seen it have bowed in worship and have said, God is here.

The cross is also a throne of grace. Its arms have been stretched out to inclose the world, and from it Christ has ruled the hearts of men as in no other way. It is suggestive that the surest note which our Lord ever sounded of his conquest is connected with his cross: "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me." He said this about his death. As a matter of fact, it has not been chiefly the teaching of our Lord, and not even his resurrection glory, which has made him winsome and proved to men the abounding grace of God. It has been his cross.

However it is considered, the cross has been the throne of grace from which Christ has ruled the hearts of men. It is in the light of it that men have understood sin and God's hatred of it. In its light men have known God's love and have felt that in spite of the heinousness of sin there is hope in him. Years ago Dr. James at Rugby pictured to the boys the great day of judgment in the terms of the Revelation and of Daniel. He made them feel themselves before the judgment seat where they would fall prostrate, expecting a sentence that would pronounce doom. When there came only silence instead, and they looked up, the pomp and the majesty of the judgment would seem gone, but "set between earth and sky there is a cross and on it hangs a Sufferer." This is all our hope. The cross is our only plea. It is there that we bow before the sovereign grace of God.

In the nature of the case the cross becomes also a throne of judgment. It is sin which ruins men, but sin never looks so sinful as in the light of the cross. The final judgment is based on the sin of men, but the word of condemnation is to be for the rejection of this grace which is revealed in the cross. It is the cross which makes selfishness seem condemnable as it is. Measured by any other standard it does not seem so hideous. It is the cross that makes all sin look to be what it really is. It is like a great flare of light that comes into the midst of darkness; it makes no evil, but shows what evil is already lurking there.

Christ in the cross condemned sin and of necessity condemned the man who so loves sin that he will not turn from it. From the cross Christ pronounces the judgment of the world. It must be so if it is also a throne of revelation and of grace.

Satisfying Outcome from Late Controversy

The Board of Publication at Philadelphia has put forth the first fruits of that revision of the international graded lessons which the General Assembly directed. The installment of the work thus published covers part one of the second year and part one of the fourth year in the intermediate series, as also part one of the second year in the senior series. The themes of study for these several parts are "Jesus the Leader of Men and His Companions," "What It Means to be a Christian," and "The Rise of the Hebrew Nation;" and the writers who have prepared the comment and teaching hints are respectively Dr. Edgar W. Work, pastor of Fourth church of New York; Rev. Louis B. Crane, pastor of Westminster church, Elizabeth, and Dr. James H. Snowden, editor of The Presbyterian Banner. For each course the pupil's textbook and the teacher's manual are provided separately, as has become the custom in all graded lesson literature.

Examination of the results obtained through the labors of these three wise and competent Bible teachers will assuredly gratify all progressive Sunday school workers. The agitation and criticism out of which arose this undertaking for revision of the graded lessons were obviously of a reactionary spirit—a spirit in some phases hostile even to scholarship and advancing educational ideals. There was implicit also in the objections raised much antagonism to the idea of grading Sunday school lessons in any form. Under such circumstances it was natural to fear that the revision ensuing upon and presumably aiming to satisfy such complaints might detract much from what had already been accomplished toward improving instruction in the Bible schools of the churches. But most gratefully must it now be recognized that the Board of Publication's judicious choice of revising editors has dissipated all such fear. By the token of these examples it is assured that the new Presbyterian edition of the graded lessons will not step downward to any lower level in scholarship, rationality or practical educational value. Indeed, there are elements of advance visible in all these particulars. Presbyterians may well be proud of the understanding, the sympathy and the true religious fervor which these little booklets evince.

By all friends of the graded lessons it has been conceded—nay, even by the authors themselves—that the first helps put forth when the system came into vogue would later require amendment in the light of use. It would have been pleasanter, of course, to see such amendment come about with other antecedent circumstances than the noisy attack which began nearly two years ago. But that may all be forgotten now in gratification at the present outcome. The Continent has no doubt that the productions of Professor Snowden, Dr. Work and Mr. Crane will be acceptable to the original advocates of the graded lesson idea, as on the other hand they have certainly removed points of reasonable objection from conservative teachers.

Beyond this personal acceptation, it seems not at all too much to expect that the syndicate of Methodists and Congregationalists who joined with the Presbyterian Board to publish the course first prepared will readily accept these substitutes, and so that economical partnership can be continued. Meantime, Southern Presbyterians and United Presbyterians will surely find no cause to reject work so simply true to fundamental Christianity, and thus will open up feasibly the proposed pan-Presbyterian syndicate. The solution therefore promises a wider fellowship in this work than had seemed at all to be dreamed of, and providential guidance through a tangled perplexity is manifest.

One Hundred Years in Newspaper Business

The Christian Observer, our live contemporary published at Louisville in support of the Southern branch of Presbyterianism, celebrates with a sumptuous issue under date of September 3 a hundred years of continuous publication. The issue includes a photographic reproduction of the "Volume I, Number 1," from which this centenarian lineage is drawn. The date of that is September 4, 1813. The title, however, is not "Observer" but "Religious Remembrancer." Later the name became "The Christian Gazette" and again "The Philadelphian." But through all these changes the present management of The Observer traces a consecutive identity as the property was sold from one owner to another, and from the time when the name "Observer" was adopted in 1836, a plain, though not altogether smooth, highway of newspaper history runs forward to the present hour.

As one of the names above quoted implies, the paper's original home was in Philadelphia. It was projected by Dr. Archibald Alexander, the pioneer luminary of Princeton Seminary, and begun by a young Christian printer, John W. Scott. In January, 1839, Rev. Amasa Converse of Richmond, Virginia, came to Philadelphia and took charge of the enterprise. It grew to great power under his control, but as the passions of conflict between abolition and slavery grew bitter, the editor's adherence to Virginian views angered many Northern Presbyterians.

In 1861, after war had broken out, Secretary Stanton suppressed the publication in Philadelphia, but Dr. Converse three weeks later resumed it in Richmond. In 1869 he removed the paper to Louisville, where he died in 1872 at the age of 77. He was succeeded as editor by his son, Dr. Bartlett Converse, whose service ended only with his life in 1907. The owner of the paper today is third in the succession of Converse generations—Harry P. Converse. Since the grandson's talent is rather for financial than editorial direction, he serves as business manager of The Observer while the editorship is in the competent hands of Dr. David M. Sweets.

In this centennial number Dr. Sweets discusses the delicate question whether The Christian Observer is rightfully entitled to the claim of being the oldest religious newspaper in this country. Its only serious rival for that distinction is The Herald of Gospel Liberty, published now at Dayton, Ohio. On the face of things the latter has the more plausible plea, since it is well established that the first "Herald of Gospel Liberty" was printed in Portsmouth, New Hampshire, in 1808. But the historian's question is whether that publication was identical with the periodical now surviving. Dr. Sweets thinks not.

In 1817 The Herald of Gospel Liberty of those early New Hampshire days solemnly announced its imminent giving up of the ghost. And die it did then and there. It had had a precarious existence for years before, appearing much of the time as a bimonthly and being twice suspended for periods of several months. What is now alleged to have been the continuator of The Herald of Gospel Liberty, called The Christian Herald, did not appear till seven months after the former was defunct. The existing paper came back years later to the original name. The Christian Observer considers that its own genealogical tree has thriven through the century much more substantially than this.

The Observer acknowledges The Presbyterian Banner of Pittsburg as its next junior, entitled to celebrate a centennial in 1914. Following that in order, The Congregationalist of Boston is due to arrive at centenarian dignity two years later. But the paper which is oldest under a current name is the Baptist organ, The Watchman, which continued from 1819 under an unchanged headline until just two weeks ago, when it was married to The Examiner of New York City. The merged journal now appears as The Watchman-Examiner.

A Warrior Not Afraid of Foes' Weapons

Professor Orr, who at a ripe age has just died in his lifelong home town of Glasgow, will be long remembered with gratitude for a steadying service which he did the American churches when their need for it was great. A superstitious dread of higher criticism had come to pervade widely all ranks of Christians in this country, not excepting the ministers. The very use of the term produced a shudder, as if it were the name of some horrid monster with uncanny power to eat up God's word before the eyes of its defenders. But deliverance from this panic came conspicuously through Dr. Orr. He appeared in America boldly wearing the dreadful lion's skin in defense of the Bible. He demonstrated that the sword which the destructive critics were using had an edge to cut themselves. He met criticism with criticism and brought off trophies of vindication for the word of God won thereby.

The refreshment for the American churches was notable. They lost their panic. Instead of secret dread that the battle for an authoritative Scripture might through higher criticism go against the Bible, they came to believe in the possibility of a criticism making surer than ever the supremacy of the inspired revelation from heaven. The disastrous suspicion of scholarship was arrested. Men's minds were liberalized with a new assurance that it can never be un-Christian to ask, listen and learn. The temper of average church thinking in America is far more steady and rational since Dr. Orr spoke, showing so clearly that a man with a critic's mind-habits can be in the best sense a "defender of the faith." He has been of course not the only example of the fact either in his own country or ours, but it chanced that he somehow impressed the public more than any compeer of the same stamp, and it is therefore to his memory that gratitude for this influence will particularly attach.

—Rev. W. E. McCullough in his recent booklet, "The Claim of the Gospel Ministry," discusses the question of pulpit power. He cites the testimony of an aged friend who used to hear Lincoln speak. On ordinary themes Lincoln did not impress this hearer, but when the statesman spoke of the wrong of slavery, it seemed to the listener that "his eloquence was overpowering." So only, Dr. McCullough says, can the minister attain true eloquence. He must at the heart feel something so burningly that his whole being takes fire from it. "Tremendous strength of moral conviction" is the sole secret of it.

—The reader of the current issue of The Century Magazine is heartened by the frank and wholesome way in which Robert Sterling Yard, the new editor, vows his fealty to the standards which his notable predecessors—Josiah Gilbert Holland, Richard Watson Gilder and Robert Underwood Johnson—have upheld for that clean and wholesome factor in American literature. He talks as a preacher's boy would be expected to—in real life, not in tradition. At a moment when several magazines of former good standing seem to be teetering on the brink of sensationalism's toboggan slide, it is a happy thing to learn from one editor that he is not going down. To be sure, this very issue of The Century Magazine has for its main fiction feature the craziest piece of whirling-dervish hysterics—decorated besides with a riot of vulgar "cuss words"—that has appeared in print since the last blue moon. If that kind of thing were to be kept up, Mr. Yard's good resolutions on preserving the standard of literature and taste would suffer severe discount. But we are happier to believe that he was not responsible for this item in his inauguration number, and that future numbers will silently attest that he has no liking for such eccentricities.

—In the winsome ability to "put himself in the other fellow's place" no official of the Presbyterian Church ever went to a piece of work better equipped than the new associate secretary of the Board of Colleges, Dr. French, who set up his headquarters in Chicago at the middle of the month. It is his commission to be a brother in arms to any college president anywhere in the West and Northwest who struggles in the throes of endeavor to keep going a crucial educational work on a little money—and to get more money. It is very sure that nobody can be caught in any pinch of that problem which Dr. French has not himself been in and got out of during the sixteen years that he was president of Huron. So when he arrives in a college town and says to the president, "I know just how this is myself," there is no danger that he will be disbelieved. And his sympathy, his counsel and his aid will be trebly inspiring on this very account. Experience is a dear teacher, but a highly efficient one, and Dr. French has covered his whole curriculum.

—Reports from Charlotte, North Carolina, that the school board of that town had refused to re-elect two young women teachers in the city's public schools for the sheer and sole reason that they were members of the Roman Catholic Church, have displeased fair-minded Protestants everywhere. Since Charlotte is probably the most Presbyterian town in the United States, Presbyterians have felt the matter especially keenly. But The Presbyterian Standard, published at Charlotte, denies that the young women were without fault. It says that the school board dropped them because they had discouraged their pupils from reading the Bible, and religious parents had complained of the effect on the children. This would put a different face on the matter, for such a complaint, if authenticated, would be reasonable cause for dismissal. Nevertheless, it is fair to say that in public mass meeting leading Protestant citizens of the town criticised the board severely.

—Out of the recent "citizenship congress" at Portland the man who undoubtedly reaped the biggest increment of personal reputation was Ng Poon Chew of San Francisco. People of the Pacific Coast have known for a long time that Mr. Ng is a big man. They know him as an efficient Presbyterian preacher and as editor of a daily paper published in the Chinese language in San Francisco. But on easterners he dawned forcefully in this Portland convention, where his pungent interpretation of recent events in his native land, his sparkling and cleverly turned wit, and perhaps most of all, his eloquent mastery of pure English, astonished the big audience which he addressed and made him one of the principal lions of the occasion. Now there are many demands for him to travel in the East and lecture.

—Both Protestant and Romanist journals have made themselves absurd by treating so ponderously Dr. Charles M. Sheldon's suggestion at Los Angeles of what has been called "the Protestant confessional." He was not "Romanizing" in the slightest. He was simply urging the importance of such close understanding between a minister and his parishioners as makes them feel perfectly free to "tell him their troubles." The privilege and duty of this confidential touch with his people have always been felt by every pastor worth his salt, and Dr. Sheldon was only enumerating it as an inevitable feature of pastoral duty.

The 500th Anniversary of John Hus

BY VACLAV LOSA

The author of this article, who is superintendent of work among the immigrants for the Presbytery of Pittsburg, speaks here out of a heart of loyal affection for his native land. As now a faithful American, Mr. Losa is anxious that his fellow churchmen shall appreciate the sentiments with which he, as well as all other Bohemians, looks forward to the year 1915, when they are to celebrate the quincentenary of their greatest national hero

THE LAST two or three General Assemblies of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America took notice of the approaching celebration in 1915 of the 500th anniversary of the martyrdom of John Hus and warmly recommended the Reformed Church of Bohemia to the good will of the churches in America. It was the first time such an action had been taken. Ever since this "little sister" of the Reformed churches came to its existence, she lay forgotten by the big and powerful Protestant churches and had to fight her fights alone, almost unobserved. And yet, if one but looks into her history, he is thrilled with a warm interest.

There are 6,000,000 Czechs now living in Bohemia and Moravia, and they are struggling for national rights in the Austrian empire. The Reformed Church in this, once a Protestant, nation numbers a total of 120,000 souls, members and adherents. To a Protestant visitor who stops for a day or two in Prague this church seems to be weak indeed and without influence upon the life of the nation. And it is a fact that this handful of believers is not as influential as the Protestant church of Bohemia was 300 years ago, when nearly the entire nation was confessing faith in Christ. The Protestants now represent only 2 per cent of the nation, are dispersed and poor, and are not undertaking mission work on a large scale in their nation.

Bohemian Protestants Proud of Their Wounds

And yet as one Bohemian minister said, "We are proud of our wounds. We have been wounded when struggling for the cause of the gospel. Only a man who has studied our past understands our present conditions. Remember that it is not our fault that we are so few and so poor and have to struggle with many difficulties." After the battle on the White mountain, the antireformation has exterminated Protestantism in Bohemia by executions, dragonnades, by driving Protestants into exile, by confiscating Protestant fortunes and properties and by burning Protestant books.

The Bohemian martyrdom has no parallel in history. Waldensians and Huguenots, taken as churches, have suffered equally with the Bohemians, but in the case of the Bohemians the Protestant church comprised the whole nation, and that a whole nation should become the prey of antireformation has no parallel in history. Such is the case of Bohemia. Nowhere has the antireformation lasted as long, having exterminated Protestantism entirely and bringing a nation of several millions to 800,000. This happened in Bohemia, in the country of the cup and the book.

After 160 years of persecution Joseph II. issued an edict of toleration in 1781. The Lazarus of Czech Protestantism had been called forth by the grace of God to rise from his grave and the Protestants established a new church amidst a totally changed national environment. The Catholic education lasted 160 years. The morals of the Jesuits had impaired the national character. The nation had lost its interest in religion and become a blind slave and follower of Rome, and hated the Protestant faith.

It is apparent that under such conditions it was impossible for the Protestants to make any successful propaganda of the gospel in their nation in the early part of the nineteenth century. They did not enjoy liberty but merely toleration. And yet new congregations were organized, houses of worship and manses built and ministers called. But since 1861, when religious liberty and equality were granted, a new period in the history of Protestantism in Bohemia commenced. And this history of the last fifty years is remarkable in many ways.

Recent Advance of Bohemian Reformed Church

Is the Bohemian Reformed Church weak and uninfluential today? Far from it. Let us take a glance at the past of the last thirty years. Bohemia and Moravia are as large as Scotland. Thirty years ago there were but seventy congregations there; now there are eighty-eight. There had been almost no preaching stations; now there are 64 such stations and 13 affiliated congregations The number of houses of worship has been doubled and is three times larger than fifty years ago. A protestant minister in Bohemia or Moravia of today is overburdened with work. He has to preach and also give religious instruction in the schools, some of these being very far from the residence of the minister. Some of them have to give as many as sixteen hours a week in perhaps a dozen schools in the neighborhood. He has to superintend the Sunday school, to be active in young people's societies, to give lectures on different matters, and to go about on his individual pastoral mission. This overexertion makes ministers short-lived. More ministers are needed in these times of wonderful opportunities when the doors for work are being opened everywhere, especially in the larger and smaller cities, but lack of funds retards the work and one minister has to serve several congregations, though his principal one needs all his energy, as it has from 1,500 to 2,000 souls.

Religious Interest of Nation Increasing

With all this lack the progress of the congregations is wonderful and illustrates what might be done with more means. When the writer was a student in the capital of Moravia—Brunn—over twenty years ago, Rev. Mr. Pokorny held his first worship in a private house. Even the pews that the worshipers sat in were borrowed. Today a congregation of more than 1,100 souls is located there and owns its own church, manse, a great meeting hall, and is striving to get a copastor for Mr. Pokorny. And all are working people and servants with but few exceptions.

Many illustrations such as this could be enumerated from Bohemia and Moravia. The opportunities today are great. An immense work will be done in these lands as soon as the Protestant world will take special notice of this small but historical country. The religious interest of the nation is on the increase. The year 1915, when the 500th anniversary of the death of Hus, the Bohemian reformer and martyr, will be celebrated, will be a critical year. It will be a decisive year, for many of us of the Reformed Church of Bohemia will be able to honor the memory of Hus according to his spirit and to show to the masses what we are and what we wish. There may come from this celebration a movement which may become a great blessing for the whole nation.

The Reformed Church of Bohemia is going to build a house which is to be a spiritual center of the Protestants. It will cost about $100,000, and $25,000 has been collected thus far.

When the monument of the reformation was planned in Geneva, the whole Protestant world was participating in it. Even the little Bohemian church sent to Geneva her mite of 2,000 crowns. The little church of Bohemia has never asked for any help from foreign friends until now. This is to be a monument of the reformation, too, and will be built in Prague. The church is only a small one, and yet, after reviewing the work of the last thirty years, it must be acknowledged that she has done not a little for the cause of the Gospel.

Efforts to Decry Life of John Hus

Another reason for asserting that the year 1915 will be a critical one is the almost abnormal activity of the Roman Catholic Church in its preparations for that John Hus year. That church is publishing many religious papers, and all of them contain articles regarding John Hus. Some papers were started purposely to prepare their readers for this event. Books are being printed now and many will be issued during the two coming years picturing John Hus in the worst colors or making of him simply a patriot who left the church and served his country.

Why is it that this great heretic, as they call him, should receive such attention from the Romish press? There is no better answer to this question than to state that that church realizes the great unrest in the Bohemian nation, which gradually takes away the people from Rome. There are large communities in Bohemia, nominally Roman Catholic, that are making great preparations for the John Hus celebration, and this in spite of the agitation against it of the local priests and bishops. Though the percentage of Protestants in Bohemia is a very insignificant one, the number of educated and influential men among them is disproportionately large. If a Bohemian minister or an educated layman announces a lecture in any city, the audience is always large and enthusiastic.

It is to be hoped that a large number of American friends will attend the John Hus anniversary celebration, and if Americans will be in attendance they will undoubtedly see how wonderful is the opportunity in this beautiful land in a missionary way. May God grant that Bohemia may become again the land of light.

Paying and Giving—a Difference

BY EVANS WOOLLEN

MY THOUGHT was expressed on the mount in these words: "Whosoever shall compel thee to go one mile, go with him twain." The reference was to the law of that time. The law was that whoever traveled on the king's business could require any citizen to accompany him and point out the way for one mile. In going that mile, on request of the king's messenger, the citizen was paying—paying the debt of a citizen.

But it was said, "go with him twain." In going the second mile he was not paying. He was giving. He was not paying the debt of a citizen. He was giving the service of a Christian. He was not paying under the obligation of law. He was giving under the impulse of love.

The thought as to the difference between the first mile and the second mile, the difference between paying and giving, I wish to apply to our financial relations with the church.

As members of the church we have assumed obligations. Certain of those obligations do not differ essentially, as I see it, from the obligations we assume in becoming members of a club.

We become members of a club knowing there are certain expenses of maintenance and operation. The club home must be heated and lighted. The salary of the superintendent and the wages of the janitor must be paid. None of us would tolerate the thought of retaining membership without paying each his share toward the expenses of maintenance and operation. To do otherwise would not accord with the ethics that prevail among self-respecting men and women. Now there is only one difference, in this regard, between the club and the church. The difference is this: In the one instance the amount of the payment by each is predetermined. In the other instance the amount of the payment by each is left to his own conscience. In the club we can discharge our obligations only by equal payments. He who cannot afford the payment stays out. However, no one need stay out of the church. The payment of a cent may discharge my obligation as fully as the payment of a dollar will discharge your obligation. But in neither the club nor the church will the ethics of self-respecting men and women tolerate no payment.

And again, in the church as in the club, no one, as I see it, may properly complain that the fact of his payment or nonpayment is known to his fellow members.

Thus far the first mile. Thus far the law of Cæsar. But Christ said "go with him twain." And as we pass out of the first mile into the second mile we pass out of the realm of law into the realm of love. We pass from paying to giving. We pass to the free-will offering of the Hebrews. We pass from obligation to privilege, from considerations of self-respect to considerations of grace. From the church, built of men, that must be heated and lighted we pass to the church built of God. Now we are out of the realm in which men pay bills. We are in the realm in which Christians cherish the spirit that gives. We are out of the realm of subscription lists and quarterly accounting. We are in the realm in which the words fittingly recur: "Let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth."

If, when we have paid in the sight of man for the heating and lighting of the church, we can then rest, we may be self-respecting men and women, but we are not Christians. The Christian cannot rest until the love that is in him has expressed itself in giving.

Perhaps the distinction I have sought will be illuminated in this way: Think of one who comes into his church conscious of having theretofore paid his share for its maintenance and operation. He then yields himself to the influence of a worshipful service. Under that influence, under the impulse of a love that must express itself, he puts his undistinguished gifts on the plate. He has paid and has therefore not lost in self-respect. He has given and has therefore grown in grace.

This, then, is the thought I present—the difference between the first mile and the second mile; the difference between paying, which is a man's duty, and giving, which is a Christian's privilege. The one out of self-respect, the other out of love for that forgetteth self.

Fathering Young Sunday Schools

BY GERRIT VERKUYL

IF IT IS unnatural for little children to be separated from their parents, it is unnatural for young Sunday schools to be left to their own devices. To put a newborn baby on the doorstep on a winter's night means murder. To leave a newborn school to its own care or in the hands of a single worker spells neglect and promises death. Both the young school and the consecrated worker need constant backing from the home base.

Up in our northern country we have a cloud of witnesses to this rule, from which we may select our work at Wausau, Wisconsin. Almost as soon as organized the Wausau church began extension work. Much of it was done under the direction of Dr. W. O. Carrier, now president of Carroll College. The fact that 90 per cent of the points then organized are still alive, some of them now as churches, is proof sufficient for the principles that were observed. Similar opportunities are beckoning still in many places. Let us note, therefore, how it was done.

Work at the various points was started by our regular Sabbath school missionary. His is the time to make a thorough canvass and the tact to interest the people. His share in getting things afoot will also insure his constant sympathy when enthusiasm calms down. But no missionary can place his entire service at the disposal of one school. Somehow there must be workers secured from the home church. The pastor had his man picked out for superintendent and in many cases a second man for companion and teacher. Jesus, you know, suggested the two by two idea, for it is not good for a man to work alone. The lonely worker is subject to discouragement and a sense of inadequacy. But in case no helper could be found, the pastor took care to make the worker feel that church and school were with him.

Every Sunday afternoon Dr. Carrier went to one point. He would address the school after the lesson. However badly out of style that may be in your city schools, it is exceedingly in place in districts where sermons are rarely heard. After his address the pastor would innocently turn to the lay worker and suggest, with the blandest smile, that he give some account of what is being done and what he expects to do. The layman might scarcely have spoken in his pastor's presence had he prepared his speech with ever so much care, but in the joy of the moment he would arise and speak with untrammeled ease. It was Dr. Carrier's unsuspected way of training his men for public service. As a result today a dozen of them can give strong religious addresses, while one is devoting his entire life to the oversight of a group of little schools.

Every Sunday evening, when the pastor gave out his announcements, he spent a few minutes in picturing to his people the work he had observed during the afternoon. That made it more easy for him to nail the second man he wanted for that place.

One Sunday a year the little schools were made the guests of their parent. The preceding Saturday was a busy day for the good Wausau people, but they worked with cheer. About 10 o'clock on Sunday morning the families began to arrive. The livery stables stood ready for their teams. The main body of the church was reserved for the visitors, who came in almost countless numbers. For the day the entire church with all her dependencies united in one great Sunday school. There was not much class study, but a general program in which each school had its part. At their latest gathering—for the custom is still observed—there was a contest in singing, at which a smaller school carried the prize.

During the winter months, when many schools are tempted to discontinue, the Endeavorers came to the rescue. They arranged for bobsled parties to make visits to one neighborhood after another and thus kept up a hearty spirit. Recitations and songs, both by the guests and the hosts, formed the little program. The rural friends had their refreshments ready, and country and city Christianity happily mixed and mingled. It kept the schools alive through the winter. It inspired some boys and girls to attend the Wausau high school, and it saved the Endeavorers from religious deadness.

During the twelve years in which Dr. Carrier was pastor of the Wausau work the membership grew from ninety to over 400. The growth was largely due to the extension work, because it provided health to the members and drew others in. As for the men who rendered that splendid service, some are still living in Wausau, doing that same work from Sabbath to Sabbath. They are the kind that have given a name to their church and honor to their Saviour. Others have moved away. But as one meets these men, no matter where, the mention of that service touches their deepest feelings. Their testimony is unanimous that the days with the little schools were the most blessed of their lives.

HOW TWO YOUNG MINISTERS

OWEGO'S MERGER AND WHAT FOLLOWED

Rev. L. R. Howard

THIS is a story of the kingdom of heaven in Owego, New York. Like Christianity itself, the news seems almost "too good to be true." Because of its many-sidedness, and of what it signifies, the narrative must be set down leisurely and in detail.

The central fact of the story is the union, less than a year ago, of the Congregational and Presbyterian churches of Owego. This amalgamation of the two thriving congregations was not accomplished under the lash of necessity, nor for the sordid purpose of economy, nor because of the grim specter of fear and impending defeat, but simply because the spirit of the kingdom in the hearts of the ministers and people gave them the vision and the judgment needed to effect this church union, which is probably without parallel.

The union was accomplished quickly, and without dissension. It has resulted, incidentally, in a social service work, with the discarded church building as its basis, which fulfills all the conditions of, say, the great Men and Religion program.

As the facts unfolded themselves to an investigator in Owego, one source throwing light on this phase and another source throwing light upon that phase, it all seemed like a tale out of a book—a chapter from Charles M. Sheldon's fiction.

David and Jonathan in the Ministry

Like every good story, this one begins in human life. It tells of two young preachers turning to each other, as David and Jonathan, and dreaming the high dreams of the Christian ministry together. One of these men was Rev. Arnold W. Bloomfield, now pastor of the Presbyterian Union church of Owego, "the youngest oldest pastor you ever saw," as his situation is laughingly put, for he is senior Owego minister in point of service, though he is but 32 years of age, and has been only three years in the city and five years in the country. British-born, trained in London University, but most of all in an architect's office, Mr. Bloomfield learned to preach chiefly by preaching; he has had no theological course, although he took the examinations in the Wesleyan Methodist Church across the sea, where he labored in the gospel for seven years. After coming to this country, he served for two years in his first settled pastorate, that of the Congregational church at LeRoysville, before he was called, less than three years ago, to the Congregational church of Owego.

The other young minister, of old New England stock, was Rev. L. R. Howard, son of General Charles Howard, who once was the editor of The Advance, and nephew of General O. O. Howard. He is five years the senior of his friend Bloomfield, and he entered the ministry by way of Williams College and Union Seminary. Before the Presbyterian church at Owego called him, he had been for nine years pastor of the Congregational church of Plainfield, New Jersey. Last fall he gave up the Presbyterian pastorate at Owego to become Congregational student pastor at the University of Nebraska. For, as his best friend in Owego says, if any man was ever gifted for the work of a student pastor, it is Howard.

A Typical Street in Owego

These two young ministers, both in love with their work, both thinking long kingdom thoughts, talked as young men will of the golden day of possibility. To them it seemed ideal for Owego so to reorganize its churches that one man could preach, one could do the pastoral work, and one take care of the executive and organizing end, instead of having five men muddling at all three tasks, irrespective of their special qualifications.

Not that Owego was overchurched or cursed with factionalism. Quite the contrary. This beautiful town—and a traveler would be glad to submit Owego to the world as a sample of American community life at its best—is especially rich in the spirit of American neighborliness and saving common sense. This narrative halts to record how the four Owego pastors have a working arrangement, whereby the city shall never be left without a resident minister in charge. Vacations are so arranged that the neighborhood's needs, be it a funeral or wedding, a sick bed or an unpredictable calamity, finds a minister of the gospel ready for service.

Indeed, this church union harks back to the joint week of prayer services in 1912, and the subsequent cooperative vacation plans. It was last summer that Mr. Howard was called to the University of Nebraska. He told his friend Bloomfield, who was about departing on his vacation, that he would go to the student pastorate if the churches could unite. They agreed to talk the matter over privately with a few of the most discriminating laymen. When Mr. Bloomfield returned he found union "in the air." The scheme was being discussed by the community. There was at first a general incredulity. It was desirable, but surely impossible. Such a project was too utopian for Christian denominations. The more the subject was discussed, the more possible it seemed. Whenever any practical objections were made, the laymen took them up, and as the county judge and many lawyers were in the membership of the two churches, it was easy to face in advance all legal complications. According to Mr. Bloomfield, the union "just naturally evolved," and "the laymen really did the work."

Right here the chronicler must record another story-book condition. Instead of disparaging remarks and criticisms, and shrugging of the shoulders concerning one another, he found layman and preacher each glorying in the other's excellence. Mr. Bloomfield brags shamelessly of the Owego laymen. He points out that it was their finesse, and their knowledge of one another as neighbors, that enabled them, with subtle worldly wisdom, to anticipate all obstacles, and thus to prepare for them in advance. Their broad-gauge, sanctified common sense, according to this testimony, was the fundamental factor in the transaction. According to the pastor's version of the union story, there is nothing to it except that the people had the requisite grace and wisdom, and the merger naturally grew of itself.

On the other hand, the laymen—a hard-headed, sophisticated, legally trained body—talk of this diffident, boyish pastor, with the smiling face and deep, quiet eyes, as if he were the one supreme factor in effecting the union. To a man in whose sagacity I had confidence I put plainly the question, "Can Bloomfield preach?" His eyes glowed, and he bent earnestly toward me as he said, "I have heard Jowett in his pulpit, and I am just back from England, where I heard Campbell Morgan in Westminster chapel, and I tell you that our pastor preaches better sermons than either of them. He is just a born preacher, with a native gift for spiritual discernment."

Of course, when that spirit is in the pulpit and in the pews of a church anything is possible.

To merge two churches of venerable lineage takes planning. A mere impulse of good will will not do it. Conferences that lasted far into the night were held in the law offices of Hon. H. A. Clarke. This building, by the way, is the oldest in town, having been built for an academy. Here John D. Rockefeller and his brother William went to school, as well as Washington Gladden, who followed a divergent stream, and became an arch-critic of the Standard Oil Company. All three of these men in boyhood attended the Presbyterian church, which long, long before had begun life as a Congregational body.

One comes upon curious interweavings of human life and events in connection with this church union story. Sixty years ago Washington Gladden left the Owego Presbyterian Church when a faction to which his family belonged split off and formed the Congregational church, which is now a party to the union. Dr. Gladden would doubtless have been a Presbyterian minister had it not been for this congregational division. He was in at the separation of the church and again he was in at the reunion. It is Dr. Gladden's usage to return to Owego for his vacations (and there are few towns in America better worth returning to) and he was taken into conference by the laymen concerning this proposed union. Of course he advocated it and wrote a strong letter which appeared in the local newspapers. Quite naturally, when the union had been consummated, Dr. Gladden was called to preach the first sermon before the united congregation.

After the general feeling of the community had been learned with respect to union, the first step was to call informal and then later formal and official meetings of the two congregations concerned. The Presbyterians were unanimous for it from the start. The Congregationalists had a few members who were not convinced. One woman protested that they would lose their identity in the merger, whereupon the gentleman who was presiding reminded her that she had already once lost her identity and that it had been good for her. "Yes, and she has mastered the situation ever since," spoke up her husband whimsically; so that opposition was not serious.

Where the United Churches Now Hold Service

The proposal for union went hardest with the old folk, who had been sitting in the same family pews for decades and generations. One old couple, both over 80 years of age, who had been occupying the same pew in the Congregational church for more than half a century, could not bring themselves to consent to the surrender of these dear associations. They are absolutely the only members of either church who failed to enter heartily into the union, and concerning them all the church people speak most kindly and sympathetically.

These intimate, sacred, personal ties with a church building and a church body are really the most important factor in a union; but the members of both congregations in this case proved that they had not been occupying church pews under the teaching of the gospel for all these years in vain. They had learned the lesson, "in honor preferring one another." When it was decided that the amalgamated church should move into the larger edifice, the Congregationalists without murmuring gave up their lifetime church home, with all the tender memories that cling about it.

Not to be outdone in generosity, the Presbyterians surrendered their family pews. Some persons who had been sitting in the same pews for more than fifty years, in the center of the church, surrendered them and moved to the unoccupied pews at the side of the church, in order to make room for the incoming Congregationalists. There was an embarrassment of graciousness on both sides, and the best pews were the easiest to get; for everybody seemed bent on taking the lowest seat. The united church does not have the rented pew system, but sittings are apportioned, as is really necessary on an occasion of this sort.

Many cynical remarks have been made about the human nature that creeps out in church affairs; but a preacher could find a long sermon upon the manifestations of grace that were revealed in the progress of this union transaction in Owego. All officers of both churches resigned. Each insisted, with finest courtesy, that the others hold the offices. It did seem as if nobody sought the places of honor. The board of trustees and the diaconate were enlarged in the new church, and every former Congregational officer was put into office in the new organization, as well as most of the Presbyterian officeholders. Now the elders, deacons and trustees hold joint monthly meetings to consider together all the affairs of the church.

A Union Church, but Not Undenominational

The sensible decision had been made in the conference that the new church should belong to one of the big denominations. They wanted some vital relation with the general Christian work of America. They preferred to be a part of a worldwide work. So the decision was made that the new church should be called the Presbyterian Union church, there being already a Union Presbyterian church in the presbytery. All occasions for stumbling were removed, so far as possible. The form of service that had been employed in the Presbyterian church was given up, and an entirely new order adopted. A new hymn book issued by neither denomination was installed. The benevolences are distributed between the boards of the two denominations. In all tactful ways the leaders avoid any suggestion that this union is a case of absorption by one church of another.

The full Presbyterian form of government was adopted. The congregation went to presbytery with its project and I was told that, in historic Presbyterian fashion, pretty much every man present expressed his own view as to how the union should be perfected. There was long discussion of this subject, until an ex-pastor of the Owego church persuaded the presbytery to let the local congregation work out the details of the union in its own fashion, which sensible course was adopted.

When the Congregationalists went before the Congregational association, unanimous and hearty consent was given to the project, and there was no discussion, except the speeches by the mover and seconder of the resolution.

The details of calling a pastor worked out interestingly. There was only one mind in the community as to who should succeed to the pulpit of the united church. Mr. Bloomfield formally resigned his charge, but he was straightway called, first by the Congregational church, then by the Presbyterian church, and then by the new Union church. His home remains in the Congregational parsonage, and the large Presbyterian manse is rented.

As a result of the union, the new church has a membership of more than 350 persons. And this is a vital membership. The lists were pruned relentlessly before the merger. An efficient church was the first desideratum. The trustees found that eighteen hundred dollars a year was saved in operating expenses. A budget system has been adopted. The benevolences are increasing, and missionary suppers have been abandoned for straight-out giving.

To have a transaction of this sort going on in a town of 5,000 inhabitants insures a local discussion. Church union became the chief topic of talk, a real community interest. Religion took its proper place in the thought of the people. Those weeks of discussion did more to create Christian comity than years of sermons. The solidarity of all Christians in Owego was promoted. While the first and only loss was the two elderly members of the Congregational church, yet before the union was really complete, seven families came forward, with the statement that while they had not been prepared to join either of the old churches, they would be glad to unite with the new Union church. It was a great day in the history of Owego when, on the first Sunday of November, Dr. Gladden preached the first sermon before the legally united bodies.

If this story ended right here, it would have been abundantly worth telling. But the best is yet to come. This church union was the occasion for the banding together of the Christians of the town and county for social service. There is now an "Owego Social Service Association," with a large and adequate membership in town and auxiliary members throughout the town and county, three and four in every village.

What Was Done with the Empty Church

Of course, the union left empty a church on the Congregationalists' hands. Did they sell it for factory or warehouse purposes, and invest the money as an endowment? Not in Owego! The old structure was deeded to all the churches in town, through a board of trustees, especially constituted, to be used for Christian social service. That is probably a unique action in all the diversified history of social service. One does not realize, until he sees what has been done in Owego, how good a gymnasium a church auditorium makes. The Congregational house of worship has been refloored for that purpose. The pipe organ will be removed and probably sold to some other church. A swimming pool will be installed in the basement. Upstairs in the church parlors a day nursery is being established with an outside porch. Here, too, a girls' club will meet in the evenings.

The problem of the country woman who has come to town for a day's shopping, and who has no place to rest, has been met by establishing a rest room in the church. Owego is the county seat, and every day there are women coming in who do not feel enough at home in hotels to utilize them, even if they cared to meet the expense. The advertising committee of the Owego Social Service Association is making known to every home in its field that a warm welcome, and all facilities for comfort, for rest and for recreation, are at the disposal of the visitors to town.

One can imagine what a stimulus this simple service is to the rural churches, in helping them to understand their unity with the larger bodies in town.

A trained social worker, Miss Jane Barclay, has been employed by the Tioga County Social Service Association, with which the Owego Social Service Association is affiliated, who was secured through the charities organization in New York. When I heard the story of Miss Barclay I again ran into that Owego fashion, then becoming monotonous, of praising fellow workers. According to the Owego estimate there is no other social service worker on earth who is such a wonder as Miss Barclay. At present she is making a tour of the homes of the entire county, drawing up a tuberculosis survey. The intention is to define accurately and to meet adequately the presence of tuberculosis in the community. The assistance of one of the state tuberculosis experts was secured, and his exhibit and lectures stirred the people throughout the county.

Miss Barclay has talked to the schools of the county on the care of the children's eyes, teeth and general hygiene. The milk supply has been investigated and improved; medical attention has been given to children in need, and homes provided for orphans.

Within the city of Owego ground for gardens has been furnished for families who live in flats. These are supplied at the cost of the taxes, about 50 cents a person per season, and agricultural experts have been brought down from Cornell to show the families how to farm their little plots most successfully.

In a word, as a direct effect of this one church union, the social welfare idea is abroad in Owego. Trained brains and loving hearts have been put at the service of every form of need. Applied Christianity has gone hand in hand with the adoption of a principle of church union.

Day Dreamers Versus Dreamers of the Day

BY MRS. NEWELL DWIGHT HILLIS

ALL OF US, practicalist or sentimentalist alike, are more or less dreamers. It seems to be in the nature of the human mind to dream dreams, the difference being chiefly in the power to dream dreams true and to make dreams which shall have lifting power, instead of dreams which leave confusion and disturbance in their wake. There are dreams of the day as well as dreams of the night, when the mind is awake and alert, able to see things as they are in their true relations, and these are the dreams which may come true.

We are told that a scientist who is well versed in natural history can imagine—that is, dream—the size and shape of an entire animal the like of which he has never seen, from the size and shape of one bone which may be brought to light in his excavations. That is the power which is needed if life is to be lived in a way which shall realize its fullest possibilities. Most of us go through life with our eyes only half open, our heads turned to look at something over our shoulders, and without having studied our map or chart enough to have learned the situation of our goal, or the way to reach it. Sometimes it almost seems as if there were some germ, some contagion, which creeps into our system, which causes us to see little things big and big things little, and which makes us care most for the things least worth while; deliberately to choose the things which are of the least use and which are soon done for and overlook the things which have real value and which last.

If this seems doubtful, consider our slavery to fashion which, not content with choosing things which are easily destroyed and unsuited to their purpose—which is, of course, the fashion maker's and the fashion seller's aim and design—has reached, it is to be hoped, the utmost limit of bizarreness and startling effects. The contrivers of these designs had their dreams (nightmares, some of them might be called) and they dreamed them true, because they had a definite purpose. They wished to create styles and materials which could not long endure, or be endured, because they had a future for themselves in mind. They looked about them and studied human nature, and observed that most of us were very silly and like sheep would follow a leader, and then they chose leaders who were willing to appear as guys for the sake of the remuneration, and the results followed. We, who had not been observing, or dreaming true deams, came like sheep, not to be slaughtered, but to be sheared and fleeced.

Matthew Vassar and the Closets

There are other dreamers, however, who also see things as they are, for these are dreamers of the daytime, with open eyes, who see the laws of nature, how they work and how they can be made to serve man in his work, and they dream out the how and why, and when their dreams have come true we have the inventions which have turned the world upside down and have given us an environment entirely different from that which surrounded our mothers and grandmothers. The inventions of the past forty years have absolutely revolutionized the life of both men and women, but more especially that of women. A generation ago most women's work was done in the home. Few factories were there to supply ready-made garments, from hosiery to the latest thing in jabots. Women knit the hose and spun the yarn with which they were knit; if material for the garments of cotton or silk were supplied the garments must be made at home. Women did not have gowns for every occasion of the day, to say nothing of days in the week. The story of Matthew Vassar has become very familiar—how, when he had his plans all made for Vassar college and showed them to his friends, there was not a closet in the building, and when this was called to his attention he exclaimed with surprise, "Why do they need closets? There can be two hooks on every door—one for the everyday and one for the Sunday gown. What more do they need?"

The housekeeper of today is little disturbed by unexpected guests, since she can go to the telephone, call up a bakery or a caterer or a department store and on short notice supply a dinner the elaborateness of which is modified only by her pocketbook. She need not lay in supplies of pickles, preserves and jellies for her winter table like those delectable pantries of our grandmothers, because somebody saw an opportunity and dreamed of fruits growing in quiet country places and falling to the ground in heaps and piles of wasted lusciousness, and dreamed of the coming days of winter with its leafless and fruitless trees in town and village alike, where hungry boys and girls and weary, home-coming fathers must be fed with something which should more than meet the bare necessities of hunger, and so again the housekeeper telephones and at her command is a variety from the four corners of the earth such as our grandmothers—famed though they were for their tables and their cooking—never even heard named.

Even outlying places in districts remote from neighbors and travel have lost the terrors of loneliness and fear, since a ring and a "hello" summon the voices of friends, the help of physician or nurses or protection from fire and those who would break in and steal. Elevators carry us up and down, locomotives draw us to and fro, and electric trolleys even leave the motive power at a stationary center while we traverse the great city from end to end.

But not content with giving us food and raiment, invention has made the home itself not only a thing of beauty with reproductions of great masters on every wall, and ornaments and draperies correct in harmony and color which are to be had for little more than the asking, but it has supplied us with every contrivance to make the keeping of the home easy and light. Running water, gas ranges and ice chests, such as are a part of even inexpensive flats, were not to be had even at great price by our grandmothers. Flats themselves, with rooms on one floor and no stairs to be climbed or swept and dusted, are the result of invention, and so one woman —the mother—can attend to the flat and the daughters are free to go into the world for pleasure, or education, or work, as the case may be, so greatly has invention revolutionized the woman's world.

And this has set the woman's mind to dreaming to such purpose and effect that where a generation ago but two vocations—teaching and sewing—seemed open to her, today there is hardly a field which is entirely closed. Art, manufactures and the learned professions alike are hers in which to wander, and it would seem that it is only herself who shall say how far afield she may go.

Spirit of Knighthood in Modern Guise

There have been other dreamers. In the days of the middle ages there were knights in armor who sallied forth to meet and conquer any and all enemies, known or unknown. Hundreds of tales, legendary and true, have come down to us of their wondrous deeds and victories; of how they rescued fair maidens and women in distress and other knights who had been set upon and wounded. The old chivalry has passed away, but the spirit of knighthood still exists, and men still dream of helping and healing. Our knights do not wear the armor of steel, nor carry sword and shield, and perhaps their portraits would be less attractive to the artist's eye, but they go forth to succor the sick and the distressed, only they do not slay—they sterilize instead.

They are dreamers, too, and their dreams come true—have lengthened the life of man, have exterminated disease and are even now making the white enemy retreat before the tactics which their dreams have shaped.

Then there were the men and women who, seeing that ignorance meant limitation and slavery which kept men down in narrow spheres of hard, uninspiring labor, dreamed dreams of educating little children in kindergartens and public schools, our boys and girls in higher schools, so that they could go forth with broader views of life, increasing their power both of enjoyment of living, of self-support and the maintenance of others. General education is not the natural state of society. Only in the last century have public schools been common, and in our own country, not much more than a hundred years ago, the town of Northampton voted not to be at any expense for schooling girls, and another town permitted its girls to gather for instruction in the public school only from 6 to 8 in the morning, during the summer months.

But there were dreamers, and in that very town of Northampton one of our largest and most famous colleges for women—Smith College—provides for hundreds of our American girls that higher education which our ancestors looked upon with such dismay and scorn.

Those, too, whom we deem most practical—the homemakers and the mothers—have their dreams. Sometimes their dreams come true, and sometimes their dreams are shattered. They deal in the value of others' lives, in the wills of other people, and nothing is so uncertain and nothing so potent to mar or make happiness. Yet it is the power of those very dreams, the mother-dreams, which have had most to do with making possible the fulfillment of those other dreams of which we have been speaking. Faith in a human being and a steady belief in his future is the most powerful stimulus in the world, and this is the fruit of mother-love. A beautiful tree is this, bringing forth fruit every month and whose leaves are for the healing of the nations.

Of course, we readily understand that they are dreamers who give us our books—our novels and our stories and our poems. But the first requisite quality in even these dreamers is to be able to see life as it is, and then life as it should be. The power of the story lies in the picture with all that it lacks and all the possibilities which hover about it—we are not satisfied with the picture which shows only sordidness. That is to misrepresent life. But the writers must first be seers—seers of the events already enacted, and seers of the possibilities which surround and develop from them. It is in this that the magic lies. Harriet Beecher Stowe, in her great novel, "Uncle Tom's Cabin," opened the eyes for multitudes and they fought and bled and died, and the chains fell away from the feet of slaves. Dickens worked many reforms not by direct attempt but by his pictures of existing abuses.

The Choice of Dreams and Roads

And what have we to do with dreams, dreams of the day, not idle, so-called day dreams? It is like this: One may travel in different ways. If you take a railroad train and go through a section of country you will pass through many towns in a narrow, straight line. You may learn their locality, their distance from other towns, on what road they lie, but you go through the dreariest part. But look beyond those hills; there are homes and gardens, there are streams winding their way like shining ribbons through the flowery meadows, dotted with all sorts of pleasure craft. Will you close your windows or shut your eyes or keep them fixed upon the day's report of accidents and crime, or will you look out and drink in inspiration and learn what is in God's beautiful world and seek to find what is beyond those hills which shut the farther valleys from sight? Sometimes we must walk. Shall we then find out all the ways of going, and choose the pretty places and the restful spots, or shall we continue to go up hill in the burning sun when we might as well have walked along the shady river path? It is by the choice of the road we take that we prove ourselves day-dreamers—dreamers of useless, futile dreams, or dreamers of the day, the dreamers who have open eyes and see their opportunities and how to use them.

And the difference in the two things is the difference between success and failure. It is the difference of being prepared for some event to happen and then to recognize the opportunity when it comes. The chief value in the study is not so much in that one learns how to do one more thing, but that by the knowledge of how to do one more thing the world is enlarged by so much, and there is a larger field of vision, a wider platform on which to stand, on which one can reach and be reached. There is nothing which makes so great a difference in life as the habit of acquiring knowledge and skill. The man or woman who knows many things, or how to work in several lines, has multiplied his or her chances over and over. Every time he enlarges his circles it takes in much more than the simple branch which he has been studying. It is not simply a particular art which he has acquired; he has enlarged his own capability so that he is in contact with a larger part of the world itself and makes possible the coming of more opportunities. It is not simply that he knows how to do more things—which is of great value in itself—but he has put himself in harmony, in touch with a great number of the world's people, and it is through people that opportunities must come.

And the opportunities are sure to come. We de not always recognize them because they frequently come disguised. But if your eyes are open, if you have prepared yourself, your fitness and the opportunity will meet—and no one knows the issue.

"No man can choose what coming hours may bring
To him of need, of joy, of suffering;
But what his soul shall bring unto each hour
To meet its challenge—this is in his power."

Tokyo's Population Growing Fast

The population of Tokyo is increasing by leaps and bounds, and the city now boasts of 1,900,000 persons, at a modest estimate, says the Honolulu Star-Bulletin. The number of married men and women has also increased. The percentage of divorces in 1901 was 17 in every 100 marriages, and 20 in every 100 marriages in 1904. Yet the cases of divorce in Tokyo are fast decreasing; the latest figures show there are 16 divorces in every 100 marriages There were 50,000 births in 1909, 53,400 in 1910 and 54,900 in 1911. The figures represent three births to every 100 persons. Statisticians make complaint in regard to an increase in the births of illegitimate children.

THE HOME COUNCIL

Earning Church Money Systematically

BY LEE McCRAE

THE AID SOCIETY of a church small in numbers but great in energy and consecration is quietly and systematically earning $5 a week by serving the noon lunches in the ward school. The School Improvement Society, which furnishes all the supplies and takes in the nickels paid by the pupils for their meals, pays this stipulated sum for the work.

The ladies take turns in the serving, with hours from 10 to 11:30 each school day, two of them assigned for a week. They make the sandwiches and chocolate or prepare whatever they have planned for the simple lunch. A basement room has been fitted up for this special purpose in the school building, and all needful utensils are at hand.

The improvement society buys the best in the market at wholesale prices, aiming simply to furnish nutritious lunches for the children at a nominal price to the little ones, and just "come out even" after paying the church ladies for their labor.

Of course it requires some sacrifice for two busy women to give two hours of the morning for a whole week, but they feel it is better thus to earn their funds systematically than to worry over semibegging bazars or entertainments, with uncertain profits. They have $20 a month, and no extra duties or calls upon their time and strength.

How Would You Train This Child?

I am greatly interested in the child of one of my neighbors. She is over 9 years, of a happy, carefree nature, and while she is not unusually attractive, she has good traits. But she seems unable to tell the truth. Her mother says she has scolded, punished and coaxed. I have wrestled with her, all to no purpose.

For instance, a neighbor comes in and begins telling me of some packages she has sent off for Christmas. I say, "Yes, I have heard of the pretty clothes, especially the beautiful kimono you made for your niece's children." The other regards me with a blank look. "Who told you that?" she asks. I name the child, adding that she said she was sent for nearly every day to try them on. My friend said she never sent any clothing, and that the child hadn't been in her house for weeks. I speak seriously later to the child. She doesn't show the slightest shame or confusion, but laughs. "Well, I guess she tried them on sometime," she says easily.

She tells me that when her mother, father and the baby are in bed, she stays up, washes dishes and puts the whole downstairs in order, and never goes to bed till 1. I doubt the late hour, but she insists, and adds, "Just ask my mother. She was so surprised when she came down next morning!" I was tempted to believe her and asked her mother before the child. There wasn't a word of truth in it except that once, early, she had washed the dishes. She smiled and didn't seem in the least abashed.

She also told me the most plausible tale of getting such pretty Christmas wreaths at a 10 cent store. Upon asking there for them, I was told they never had kept them. The child insisted that she meant another store. She had been in the basement with her father and there were holly and mistletoe wreaths for 10 cents. At the store they declared they never had had wreaths and had no basement.

I came in once from calling and found my little girl trying to keep from crying from a bad cut on her finger. The neighbor's child spoke quickly: "Yes, your boy cut her with his knife." Before I could speak, my little girl turned about and said indignantly: "How can you say such a thing! He never came near me. I cut myself." This was more serious, for she wanted another to be punished.

One pleasant afternoon my husband was out and I was shopping, my boy at school. Evidently the child thought no one was at home. But my cook was there. She was startled by sounds as she swept the back piazza, and there was the child, her dress skirt full of my choicest grapes, and many on the ground. The old aunty scolded. "How could you do such a thing when Mrs. C. is so kind to you?" she ended. "Oh, I'll pick up the ones on the ground," she said easily; "then she won't know."

What is to be done with such a child? She is not what I should call a degenerate. She is quite polite, is a usually pleasant play companion, is generous and affectionate. She doesn't seem to plan her untruths maliciously, but to say whatever comes to her mind. It seems a grave problem. How deal with it?

Verses Old and New

IN THE GARDEN.

Drowsy, dreamy poppies bend and bow
Under a soft, gray, quiet sky; each bud
Droops low, its closely fitting cloak of frieze
Weighted with crystal drops; while every leaf
Drinks in the blessed moisture, proffered by
The multitude of tiny hairs which clothe
And finish every curve and point of all
The wondrous fashion of the sea-green plant.
It is a day of tranquil peace and growth.
Faint hint is there of coming splendor, yet
Upon the morrow, rough cloak thrown aside,
The flower will fling its silken petals wide
To sun and breeze, fulfilling Nature's will.
So let me rest content, in shade or shine,
In storm or peaceful haven. God is love.

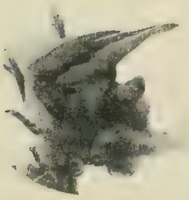
"Clark's Crow" Identified by Home Councilors



It gives me great pleasure to reply to the inquiry concerning "Clark's crow," mentioned in my little story. This description is taken from "A First Book Upon the Birds of Washington and Oregon," by William Rogers Lord, and published by himself. Office of the J. K. Gill Company, Portland, Oregon.

"Clark's crow, sometimes called the Oregon crow, is one of the striking and famous birds of the northwest. He is one of the three birds discovered by the historic explorers, Lewis and Clark, and named for the latter. He is called a crow, and yet in his noisy habit he seems more like a jay. He is a permanent resident, and found in large flocks in the mountains.

"Particular Description—Bill, long and slender; head, white on forepart, gray on the rest, and on the back, breast, sides and abdomen; wings, glossy black, with large white patch; tail, white except two middle feathers, which are black." ELIZABETH E. SCANTLEBURY.

Spokane, Wash.

Mr. Barbour's inquiry about "Clark's crow" in your issue of August 21 sent me to my shelf of bird books. The bird referred to is in all probability the Clark nutcracker, Nucifraga columbiana. If Mr. Barbour will consult Ridgeway's "Birds of North and Middle America," bulletin of the U. S. National Museum, number 50, Part III., pages 281-283, he will find that the scientific name was for years Corvus columbianus, or Picicorvus columbianus.

I am pretty sure, too, if the family who spent the charming "Red, White and Blue Day," saw mountain bluebirds, and might have seen a Clark's crow, saw also a tanager, it could not have been the scarlet tanager. The common tanager from the eastern base of the Rockies to the Pacific coast is the Louisiana or western tanager, whose head only is scarlet, body yellow, wings and tail black, like his scarlet cousin's. It is possible that if the story was laid in Colorado or Wyoming they might have seen the eastern bird, but it would have been a rare sight, and one which it would have been their bounden duty to report to the nearest ornithologist who knew where to send a record of it. FLORENCE BAKER HAYS.

Tacoma, Wash.

Clark's crow, the name given to the American nutcracker, is a bird of the coniferous forests carpeting the various mountain ranges of western North America, and from Alaska to Lower California and New Mexico.

He delights in the sky-line ridges and peaks of our most rugged mountains, and at timber line he makes his home and rears his young. He is a brave, rugged fellow, seemingly delighting in the warfare waged so ferociously by the elements, especially in the winter time.

Clark's crow is a far handsomer bird than his sable hued cousin of the lower altitudes, his form being more graceful, and the coloring of his plumage more attractive. "The feathers of the body are smoky, or ash-gray, whiter on the forehead and chin; wings black with white patch on secondaries, tail with middle feathers black, outer ones white."

The bird has a long, sharp beak, well calculated to serve the purpose demanded of it in the tearing apart of pine cones, digging in the earth, and searching in the crevices of the bark of the pine for concealed insect life.

His long, pointed and powerful wings enable him to perform some remarkable aerial feats with ease and safety. He will fold his wings close to his body, and pitch from the top of some tall tree, or a beetling cliff hundreds of feet high, dashing earthward with a velocity calculated to convert his body into unrecognizable pulp, when suddenly like a flash of light the wings unfold, producing a sharp, explosive report from the impact with the air, and the feathered meteor gracefully alights upon the earth.

The difficulty of discovering the nutcracker's nest, which is constructed of a proper arrangement "of white sage bound together with strips of the inner bark of the juniper tree, with a lining of fine strips of bark, grasses and pine needles," and located on the outer end of an evergreen bough, is great. The reason is that the bird nests very early in the spring in regions almost inaccessible on account of the deep snows, and far from the haunts of man. Its nesting home is in skyland, and unless a sky-scraping bird lover seeks it out, it is undiscovered.

The fact that the nutcracker visits a camp in its mountain home almost as soon as it is established has given rise to the error of calling it the "camp robber," whereas the white-headed Rocky mountain jay is the genuine pest of camp life. However, the nutcracker assumes cordial relations with the camp, and helps itself to any article of food convenient to its reach.

The nutcracker is quite sociably disposed, and after the young are able to take care of themselves is found in small flocks, moving from place to place in search of its favorite food—pine nuts, various kinds of insects, grasshoppers and butterflies, which it deftly catches while on the wing. Mice offer an attractive dinner, which it captures and disposes of by commencing with the eyes and

Two Birthdays and Three Boys

BY SALLY CAMPBELL

PART II.

PATSY WAS VERY little larger than Billy or Charley, but he had had three more birthdays. "I don't know as I ever celebrate one any way at all," thought he, seeking to avoid a certain inner reproach. "No person ever gave me a birthday present to go shares with or take turns on."

But he went downstairs instead of up, renouncing with a pang the plan that had been taking shape, to "swipe" Tom Nolan's newly painted pushcart, with all its stock, while Tom was taking a free lunch at the saloon, and to store it in a shed by the river.

"Start Tom to spluttering and stuttering and to weeping with rage, and he's wonderful!" mused Patsy regretfully. "It might learn him a lesson. But let it go."

Patsy was to reap a speedy reward, for presently his tame and aimless wandering brought him to a tall office building with undeniable curls of smoke issuing from its roof. Joyfully Patsy realized a long cherished ambition and turned in the fire alarm. Several hours of splendid excitement followed. The crowds, the streams of water, the fire engines, the shouted orders—Patsy dashed in and out of the thick of it all with heartfelt enjoyment. And he managed to make himself of use.

Waiting for a moment on the outskirts, in the vicinity of an ambulance, happily not needed, he overheard some of the talk of the young doctor in charge.

"We are short of hospital attendants," the doctor was saying. "It is hard to get just what suits us. They must be reliable and strong and good-tempered. If you hear of just that combination, let me know, will you?"

Patsy did not listen for the answer. Some one was shouting, "All over!" and promptly he wormed his way to the front again.

"Pretty work, I call it!" croaked a voice from under a dripping helmet. "A good lot of money's been saved from going up in smoke. Now we can beat it, I guess."

The speaker had many smudges on his face. Also, he had a star on the sleeve of his uniform. Patsy gazed upon him with solemn respect. The broad chief caught the look on the boy's smoke-grimed face and stretched out a hand.

"Shake, partner," said he. "You are worth your salt. I like a spry boy with brains in him. You may be on the fire department some day. I say," with a sudden thought, "how would you like to ride the machine to the barns?" He laughed at Patsy's shout of rapture. "All right. Climb up. You will have to foot it back, but I suppose you won't mind that."

Oh, no, Patsy did not mind that! He would gladly have walked twice as far for so glorious an experience.

"This makes two free rides today—this and the kid's," mused Patsy. "Looks like it was a day for passing out good times. I don't hardly suppose, though, that Jake Lester thinks it is."

There! The memory had popped into view that had been buried under the rush and excitement of the fire and the distinction of whizzing aloft through space to the clank and clatter of the engine.

"But it might just as well go back and stay buried," Patsy's thought ran on. "I can't get anything to hand out to Jake. When I had the swelled face Mrs. Lester brought me an orange. The Lester family's all right. It's too bad they're up against it."

Patsy was getting tired, and he was impatient to "head up the fellows" and tell them his story. While he prodded on an ambulance rolled past him. It was not the ambulance that had been at the fire.

Patsy stopped short. Twice he said, "Cracky!" And then he said, "Cracky doodle!" After which he turned around and walked back.

"The hospital is half a mile there and half a mile back," he muttered. "But Mrs. Lester brought me an orange when I had the swelled face. I can taste the taste of it now. They're a nice family, all through, and they are up against it. And——" His sentence ended in a vision of two boys talking shrilly over a story book.

"But," young Dr. Lapsley was objecting some fifteen minutes later, "we are not looking for men that have lost their jobs."

"Maybe you ain't and maybe you are," retorted Patsy. "If you don't count on bad luck ever, you'll make a whole lot of mistakes. You want a big man, and Jake's bigger than you—wider. And he's as honest as you are—that is, providing you're real honest," qualified Patsy, with a wink across the office table at his companion.

"You are a saucy youngster," returned the doctor.

"That's what they tell me," Patsy acknowledged. "Folks get whopping angry at me for it. You want a man that's good-natured. Once I was playing a little trick on Jake Lester with the other fellows, and I slipped on some ice or something and he got me. Well, sir, I guessed he'd lick me good, and all he did was to shake me enough to get the mud off me and let me loose. Don't you call that good-natured?"

"I do," answered Dr. Lapsley. "Why didn't the excellent Jake come to see me himself?"

"He hasn't even heard of you yet. I thought I'd tell you about him before I sent him, so as you'd know what you were getting. Jake's no talker, don't you know," said Patsy confidentially; "he'd tell you he had been fired from his job and there he'd quit. And quit it would be. See? Jake dresses up and goes to church Sundays, regular. His minister would speak for him. Do you care for ministers?"

"Very much."

"Do you know any?" pursued Patsy, with suspicion.

Dr. Lapsley reached for a framed photograph on the mantelpiece and set it before his interviewer.

"There's a minister that I have known all my life. I keep his picture here in the office with me for inspiration, if you know what that means."

Patsy did not know, but he wasn't going to say so.

"I keep it here to remind me," continued the doctor, "when I come across a chap like you, to tell him that he's at good work trying to help a neighbor out of his hard place."

Patsy rose hastily.

"It's just a streak I've got on me," he explained, "on account of the kids' birthday. I'll be all over it soon."

"Don't you," said Dr. Lapsley. "It's the joy of living. "My minister"—touching the photograph—"is the happiest man I know, because he is the best neighbor."

Patsy scrutinized the strong, wise, pictured face. "He don't look as if he'd get fooled," he said; a remark which stirred Dr. Lapsley's misgivings anew. But, while he doubted, the office bell rang, the telephone sounded, and Patsy disappeared, promising that he would send Jake around.

"But it ain't so easy to do," he reflected. "Jake will think I'm guying him. He isn't feeling good, anyhow, and he'll growl over any such a proposition like the wild beast show."

But Jake did not growl. His voice was ominously gentle as he said to Patsy, "When I want to go hunting moonbeams I'll let you know. Up till then, if I was you, I'd keep still, if I wanted to keep healthy."

"All right," said Patsy. "I've told you; I've told you where it is. If you'd rather stand around and call names than take a short walk and find out, seeing you ain't very busy right now, it is just as you say. It's no lookout of mine. It's your own and Mrs. Lester's and the children's. You can suit yourself."

Having thus spoken, Patsy marched away without once turning to look back.

When he was quite gone Jake straightened up. He could but acknowledge the justice of Patsy's observation.

An hour later Jake came back from seeing Dr. Lapsley, another Jake.

"Patsy! Patsy!" cried he. "I don't know what to say to you! You are a jewel of a kind boy! I won't ever forget it for you. None of the Lesters ever will."

"Oh, say, cut it out, will you?" protested Patsy, beaming with pleasure, nevertheless, as he tried to pull his hand away from Jake's grip. "I didn't spend more than a hundred dollars on you. That's nothing," said he.

"Dollars!" shouted Jake. "Dollars ain't the best you can spend on a person. Nor they don't always get the most for him."

Patsy grinned and squinted a humorous eye. "It's not for you or me to say just what all dollars can get, I guess. We don't know. So they'll take you on, will they?"

THE BIRDS' BIG BROTHER

If you should be in Chicago some day, and should call on the editor of the Young America department, and standing with her at her office window, look out into the street below, you would perhaps see just what you are seeing now in the picture. But you would also see on the seat of the cab to which this gentle horse is harnessed the driver waiting for a customer. And if you were fortunate enough to reach the window at just the right time, you would see this man climb down from his cab, plunge his hand into his pocket, and bring it up full of grain. At once the air would seem full of birds and a flock of pigeons would circle down and settle about the driver, an occasional one bolder than the rest lighting on his arm or shoulder. Down they would fly, from eaves and window ledges, dotting the dusty street, eager for their lunch, picking up the grain with hungry little bills, and then, when the last bit had disappeared, soaring back once more to their dizzy hiding places. The pigeon in the picture lingered, one day, after all the others had gone, hoping, perhaps, to find a grain overlooked, for dessert. Every day the cabman drives up and waits at the same place for trade; and every day the little feast takes place.

Everyday View of the Lesson

By J. L. Scott

Golden Text, Neh. 9:17: Thou art a God ready to pardon, gracious and merciful, slow to anger, and abundant in lovingkindness.

Three months ago we began the "exodus" period of Old Testament history. This is really the beginning of history, so far as it touches the Jewish Church. Before the exodus everything centered in the family or tribe. Israel entered Egypt as a family, but went out as a nation. The patriarch had disappeared, and a lawgiver in direct communication with God had taken his place.

But what is history? A record of events, and more. Many regard history as resembling a string of beads. The beads are so many events, moved along one by one as they transpire. But no account is taken of the string. The thing that holds those beads in order and establishes a relation one to the other is forgotten. Events are more than mere happenings. They occur because something has occurred before, or as in the case of sacred history, is to occur hereafter. There are two ends to every bead string, and much depends upon the end on which we begin to string the beads. Jacob marks an epoch, and so does Moses. Did Moses go out of Egypt because Jacob came in, or did Jacob come in because Moses was to go out?

God Sets Apart Nation to Be Exponent of His Will

The invasion and the exodus were far apart, but they belonged to the same purpose. The last three months have been practically lost if we have seen events and nothing else. They record a history not of incident so much as of an idea. That idea was God's interest in life. He would set apart a nation, as he had an individual, and make it the exponent of his will. That nation was Israel. But Israel was subject to another power. Pharaoh was its master and had been for centuries. Israel might have remained in Egypt, even as Abraham might have remained in the Chaldees, but God elected to develop his purpose under a different sky. God's approaches are built far in advance. Moses was born eighty years before he was needed, just as Lincoln preceded the civil war by a half-century. Pharaoh sought to frustrate God, but our first lesson, you recall, told us how the child Moses was saved from death. God would protect his purpose by protecting his human instrument.

The child Moses was like other children. There was nothing unnatural about him. He must grow into a fitness for his mission. Every great man once went to school. That school may have been simply life, but it was a school to him. Hence the second lesson gives in vague detail how Moses prepared for his work. The years pass on and this child of destiny has become a resident of Midian. He is not only an exile from his people, but an exile, also, from all possibility of fulfilling God's purpose. But the arm of God is never shortened. It reaches far across the earth and draws every man back to his work. When Rome needed a leader it is said to have found Cincinnatus at the plow, and God called Moses to deliver Israel as he watched his flock on the slopes of Horeb.

Pharaoh's Heart Hardens as Result of His Punishment

In the following lesson he and his brother Aaron are in Egypt, pleading for the liberty of their countrymen. But the king's heart only grew the harder under their pleadings. Their request was refused, and as a result came the plagues of Egypt. Punishment may break the heart, but it seldom melts it. Pharaoh's penitence was of the enforced kind that fails to change the man. At last death stalked through the streets and lanes of the city, and from every home went up the cry of despair while a nation in sackcloth mourned for its dead.

But the Israelites were strangely preserved. The blood spots upon their doorposts served to turn aside the destroyer. It was the Passover of death, the first flush of real life. For the upper chamber in far off Jerusalem was being made ready for that other service which, in the form of the Lord's supper, remains still.

Again the king relented, and this time seemingly to a purpose. The pale, upturned faces of the firstborn made a plea to which there was no answer. "Go," said Pharaoh unto Moses, "serve Jehovah . . . and bless me also." There was a great commotion throughout Goshen, as the hosts of Israel took up their line of march back to the land from whence their fathers had come centuries before. They reached the borders of the desert and there were once more confronted by the cross purposes of God. Before them lay the Red sea, and hard behind rode the pursuing hosts of Egypt. But Moses was there and the invisible Jehovah stood near by. The lawgiver reached out his rod and the waters parted at his word. Israel passed over in safety, and the Egyptians, following, were drowned. The first triumph had been won and the crossing of the sea lingered long in the songs and memory of the people.

Man's Ways Are Not Always the Ways of God

Three ways led to Canaan, and the one at the north Moses had determined to follow. But my ways, said Jehovah, are not your ways. The pillar of fire moved on toward the south. Hunger followed close behind, until the bread from heaven fell. The Israelites passed the wells of Elim, and on until the cliffs of Horeb came in sight, and encamped at Mount Sinai in the very presence of God. Then followed the giving of the commandments on their two tables, one dedicated to the service of God and the other to man. Sinai proved to be the birthplace of Israel as a nation. There God met the people face to face. Their fall and the golden calf for a time held the center of attention; but the mills of vengeance soon ground the idol to nothing. Israel had the mind of God embedded in stone, which they guarded as an oracle from heaven. It was carried in the ark, together with the rod and the pot of manna, down to the temple; but when the ark was opened, nothing remained but the two tables, as Moses had placed them at Horeb. Egypt became a name, but the law of Moses has survived the ages.

Review Lesson by Lesson

By Hermon D. Jenkins

The history of Israel, its origin, development, ideals and great men, is in a very true sense the history of mankind, for the reason that its conceptions and sense of duty are the controlling forces in the civilization of today, millenniums later.

The greatest living Egyptologist said recently, "I have not the same passion for the Bible as revelation which my friends seem to possess, but the more I find out of the past the more I see that all history worth recording turns round the lands of the Bible."

Maturity of New Generation Necessary for Experiment in Palestine

When Israel came out of Egypt, where as a race it had been subjected to cruel oppression (Ex. 12:51), a new nation was born. It had a troubled morn, as of a dawn black with driving rain and with clouds hung low upon sea and shore (Ex. 14). The way was short in miles but long in discipline (Ex. 16:35). Had the people been led directly across the short intervening space it would have brought into the land of promise more of Egyptian vices and customs than of reformed life and religion. Israel was to learn that God could supply its streams of living water (Num. 20:11); could feed his people with bread (Ex. 16:15); give them fiesh to eat (Ex. 16:13); scatter their giant foes before them (Ex. 17:9-13), and cause the opposing river to stand as on a heap (Josh. 3:14-17). Just as in American history it took eight years of hard fighting to cause our jealous and suspicious colonies to form one republic, so it required the practical extinction of the slave-born generation and the maturity of a new generation to furnish seed for the new experiment in Palestine (Num. 14:11-24).

Exodus 1—The question of whose was the greatest mind in all biography has often been debated. Alexander was irresistible in the field of war; Cæsar marvelously combined the soldier, statesman and author, and Napoleon swept Europe like a hurricane. Yet how little of the work of either survives the slow attrition of time! But the ideas of Moses are more potent today than in any age of the past. His conception of a state composed of united provinces; his ideal of a free commonwealth in which there should be neither king nor peer; his basing the state upon a conception of God and of man which has not been set aside by any later philosophy, is the miracle of history. He came out of a land where bulls and cats and crocodiles were worshiped, but he taught a pure spiritual monotheism which all the civilized world seeks to claim as its own today. He was the first great writer in the history of the world. When the time had arrived for a clearer revelation of God the most wonderful of human children of human sires was born on the banks of the Nile in a slave's hut.

Israelites Had to Decide Great Issue for Themselves

Exodus 13—But no man, however eminent his gifts, can make a nation. Moses might lead Israel, but he could not be Israel. The best mother that lived cannot save her boys. They must decide the issue, the one great issue of life, for themselves. Dwight L. Moody could, with power and pathos unsurpassed, present the Saviour to a tabernacle crowded with thousands of hearers, but every one of the thousand had to decide for himself, "Shall I accept Christ tonight?"

So when Moses brought the children of Israel to the shores of the Red sea, he could, by the favor of the Almighty, cleave the wave, but he could not lift a foot except his own.

In all such cases there are probably "great searchings of heart" (Judges 5:16). When a corps marches for the front of the battle there are always some looking for an opportunity to slip out of the line, to hide behind some chance obstruction or to "play possum" on the field. Probably there were some Israelites who hid behind the sand dunes or skulked into the sea growths that covered spaces of the water here and there. But if there were, Moses did not want them hunted out. The work before them required volunteers, just as religion does in every age. We are told that when Clovis, the pagan king of France, was converted, he ordered all his army to be baptized. Moses uttered his warnings and proclaimed his promises, but he left the people to decide the great issue, "Forward to Palestine, or backward to Egypt?" for themselves. Not even the greatest of men can give his soul a ransom for his brother (Ps. 49:7).

Nation to Rest Its Life Upon Newly Revealed Law

Exodus 20—The ten commandments were in a sense the fundamental constitution of the new state. They were taken back to the land of their fathers not to found a new commercial or agricultural or military colony, but to erect a state devoted to the worship of the only living and true God, exhibiting that life of God in a morality and benevolence not known to the heathen world from which they came out.

Our archæologists have of late years made the most remarkable discoveries in the land of the Nile in the history of its excavation. The thousands of tablets and manuscripts dug up which exhibit so much of the life of Egypt for a period of at least three thousand years make plain that whatever the religion of Egypt was, it was not monotheistic and it was not spiritual. The religion Israel was to set up in Palestine was emphatically both. Israel's moral code, expressed in the last six commandments, covered, not in detail but in general principles, the whole round of human conduct between man and man.

We may well feel as we read the lessons of the past quarter in review that these few chapters carry with them the conviction that the book of which they form so important a part is of God, and that to possess these oracles of God is to possess an incalculable advantage in life's battle (Rom. 3:1-2).

DEVOTIONAL SERVICE

BY EDWARD ARTHUR WICHER

Week Beginning September 21, 1913

TOPIC—The pounds. Luke 19:12-27.

The similarity of this parable with that of the talents has already been noticed. Both of them contain the story of the disposition of property made by a man who was about to leave home for a long journey. In both he distributes his possessions to his servants that they may invest and employ them for his benefit. In both the conduct of the servants has a varying degree of excellence, from that of the good and faithful servant down to that of the faithless craven. In both parables, upon the return of the master, rewards are given for worthy service. This is the extent of the likeness of these two parables. From this likeness some scholars have concluded that we have here only two versions of the one original parable.

But the differences are important. A large part of the material of the parable of the pounds has nothing at all to correspond to it in the parable of the talents. The introduction (v. 11) giving the reason for its utterance is peculiar to the present parable. The representation of the chief personage as being of noble birth and as going away in order to be invested with a kingdom is a new feature, as are also the hatred of him by his fellow countrymen, their sending of an embassy to try to thwart his preferment, and the terrible doom that overtakes them because of their rebellion. The historical conclusion (v. 8) is also the peculiar property of this discourse.

Even in the material which the two parables have in common there are differences in detail, which are carried consistently throughout the two narratives. These are as follows: In the talents we have a householder going from home for a time; in the pounds a nobleman going to receive a crown. The talents are distributed unequally according to the several abilities of the servants; the pounds are distributed equally. The value of the talents is enormously larger than that of the pounds. In the talents we are shown equal reward for equally faithful service in unequal opportunities; in the pounds we are shown unequal rewards for unequal improvement of an equal opportunity. In the talents the slothful servant is punished; in the pounds he is merely deprived of the sum with which he had been intrusted.

We are told that Jesus spoke this parable because he was nigh unto Jerusalem, and because they supposed that the kingdom of God was immediately to appear. The parable has a twofold lesson. To the disciples it teaches the necessity of patiently waiting and at the same time energetically working for the coming of the kingdom of Christ. To the Jews and all who adopt their militant, rebellious attitude toward Christ it points to the coming punishment which they must surely suffer for their sin of rejection.

Jesus was about to go away to obtain a kingdom. The whole of the parabolic story is entirely in keeping with the customs of the age. It was part of the policy of Rome that every minor prince, and every provincial king, should receive his investiture directly from Rome. A crown could not even be transmitted, as a matter of right, from father to son. It must in every case be conferred by the authority of Rome. Inasmuch as Jesus speaks in the vicinity of Jericho, there was an obvious instance in point in this very city, where Archelaus had built his radiant palace. His father, Herod the Great, passing over his son Antipas, had willed his kingdom to Archelaus, a younger son by the same mother. The Jews revolted from Archelaus and sent an embassy to Rome to protest against the confirmation of his title. Augustus listened to the Jews, and decided against them. But he also refused Archelaus the title of king until he should first have proved his worthiness.

Such is the framework of the illustration.

Before this nobleman went away he intrusted his property to certain of his servants. Ten are mentioned, but evidently there were others besides. Every one of the ten received the like amount, one pound. But of the ten the cases of only three are followed up to the end of the story. These are typical and may be allowed to stand for the rest. Let us look at each of these in order.

The first man came and said: "Lord, thy pound hath made ten pounds more." This servant stands as the type of the highest productivity of the follower of Christ. He has been energetic, eager, resourceful; and his gains have been great. He is the servant of Christ who labors late and early, who uses his full intelligence, who marks every opportunity as it approaches and seizes it before it has gone by. He is honored with a reward that is truly kingly. "Have thou authority over ten cities." His faithful work in an obscure and difficult field is crowned with a rule over the splendid cities of the dominions of the king.

The second servant has also served deservingly, but not with the devotion of the first servant. He has been interested in his lord's work, but not engrossed by it. He represents the average Christian. He stands midway between the extremes of the excellence of that servant who has consecrated to his lord's service all his powers of mind and soul and strength, and the idleness of that other servant who has done nothing at all. He might have done more, and he might have done less. He is the average servant.

The third servant is a timorous, fearful man. He is afraid of his master. Because his master judges according to a righteous law, and not according to a weak sentimentality, he regards him as an austere man. He cannot meet this master with the honest confidence of a brave endeavor. He is shifty and evasive. Because he is afraid of making a mistake, he never does anything at all. His lord's pound, given him for use, is laid up in a napkin. And his lord is justly indignant with the man. He denounces him as a wicked servant. To be merely negative in Christ's service is to be wicked.

And this servant's punishment is that his pound is taken away from him and given to the man who has ten pounds. Even the angels, who are spectators of the scene, marvel at such a justice; but their lord disregards all comment. His justice stands by its own right.

As for his enemies, who had rejected his authority, and tried to prevent his assumption of kingly power, he will destroy them utterly. No man can resist Jesus Christ. The Jewish nation was rooted out of the land of Judah because its people refused Jesus as their king.

And when men today oppose his authority and say, "We will not have this man to rule over us," they are preparing the way for their own ruin. He that cometh shall come, and his kingdom is invincible. In that day the open opposition of his enemies shall not be tolerated any more than the secret failure of his professed servants. The punishment of rebellious subjects is far more severe than that of neglectful servants. There is no severity so terrible as that of the God of love. There is no wrath so overwhelming as that of the Lamb.

It is not, after all, a question of the quantity of what we do, but the quality of it. God knows of how poor stuff our dreams and deeds are woven; but if it is the best we can give, if we desire with all our hearts what is noble and pure and beautiful and true—or even desire to desire it—he will accept the will and purify the deed.—A. C. Benson.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SERVICE

COMMENTS IN BRIEF BY WILLIAM T. ELLIS

September 28, 1913

THE SERVICE THAT COSTS

TOPIC—Missionary esentials, home and abroad. III. Giving. II. Corinthians 9:6-15.

The Blanks are cultivated folk, careful to observe all the usages of polite society. Their summer and winter homes are attractive, and their automobile is a beauty. Since they have no children, and plenty of time for social life, one would expect them to be popular with a wide circle. The fact is that they receive few guests and have few friends. Their life is singularly restricted and devoid of larger interests. Why? The answer is old-fashioned, but true to the facts of the case—they have left the element of giving out of their lives. This does not mean that they are not nominal subscribers to a church; they are too conventional to neglect this. But they have missed entirely the secret of being lavish with their interest, their sympathy, their possessions, themselves. Life to them is a reservoir, not a spring. Their first and mastering thought is always of themselves. Because they have never risen to the heights of self-forgetting vicariousness, their life has been lived on such a commonplace plane that it has failed to draw unto it any of the influences which enrich and ennoble existence. A little of the missionary spirit would have saved them from losing their lives in the mire of self-centeredness.

Only the giving are the living.

Half a dozen words hold the secret of lavish living: "God so loved that he gave." Love that partakes of the divine quality always gives. It cannot help doing so; that is its very nature. Why does a mother rejoice to deny herself that her child may have? Simply because she loves. All unconsciously, she is obeying the higher law. If we do not love enough to give, we do not really love at all.

Every well-informed person knows somewhat of the accomplishments of Christian missions. The facts of the mission story are staples of religious discussion. The other phase of the same question, namely, what missions have done for the church at the home base, is equally worthy of consideration, for the church's missionary activity has saved her from self-centeredness, small views and general selfishness. She has been taught the glory of giving, the sanctification which comes by sacrifice. Thus has she become prepared for this new day, with its vast views and profound problems. Liberal gifts have begotten a liberal soul.

"The gift without the giver is bare." Money in the collection box is inadequate unless there be also interest in the cause. Every bounty that really enriches is baptized with sacrifice and devotion. The heart love which has accompanied gifts to missions is the richest part of the offering.

Money, it is often said, is the smallest thing a person can give to missions. Time, thought, actual service and one's real self—these are the gifts beyond and above all gold.

It was the gift of a Son that began missions; and only by the gift of sons and daughters may they be continued.

Conventional missionary literature often fails to impress readers because it is conventional. A clearer understanding of what the work is may sometimes be gained by a person of imagination through reading routine "dry" documents, such as minutes of mission meetings, which are never offered to the public. The multiplicity of the problems, man-size, with which a mission grapples; what the real obstacles and burdens of the work are; the definiteness of the needs and appeal of the field; the detailed nature of the difficulties due to short-handedness—all these shine out with a new light when read in a mission report.

Giving to missions is giving for many men and to God.

Judge not;
What looks to thy dim eye a stain,
In God's pure light may be
A scar, brought from some well won field,
Where thou wouldst only faint and yield.
—Adelaide A. Proctor.

MISSIONARY WORK

Christianity and Japanese Spirit

Dr. Kozaki, a pastor in Tokyo, has just published a book on "Religion and the State" which is the first treatise appearing in the Japanese language which undertakes to give the Christian position in regard to Japanese national loyalty. Inasmuch as there runs through Japanese public life at the present time an undercurrent of objection to Christianity on the ground that it is an imported religion and not consonant with the native Japanese spirit, Dr. Kozaki's argument is considered in Japan peculiarly opportune.

His book comes first of all to this preposition. The author meets the objection by laying down bluntly the proposition that true religion can never be in any proper sense national. The nature of religion is to be universal, just as universality is a necessary note of all true science. Dr. Kozaki turns the tables on his critics by referring them back to the time when the very argument that they use against Christianity was used in opposition to the introduction of western science into Japanese schools. Fifty years ago there was, for example, a noted Japanese physician who seriously argued that the practice of medicine in Japan ought not to be conformed to medical practice in America and Europe because the physical constitution of the Japanese was essentially different from that of other men. This absurdity, of course, is long since exploded for all Japanese minds, and western science is welcomed by the most stubborn nationalist. And Dr. Kozaki insists that Japanese souls are likewise of the same stuff as the souls of Americans and Europeans, and that therefore any religion which helps Americans and Europeans is bound to help Japanese also.

To those who fear that Christianity will destroy patriotism Dr. Kozaki points out how adjacent nations in Europe and America profess in common the Christian religion without losing the self-respect of their own nationality. He further argues that the effect of Christianity is not to level all men to one type but to develop individual characteristics and mold many types into harmony.

The most crucial point in any discussion of religion in Japan comes on the question of accepting the long-time Japanese tradition that the ruling house of the empire is descended direct from heaven. This the author meets by saying frankly that he has no difficulty in believing in the heavenly descent of the imperial house. So far from being obliged by his religion to deny this proposition, his religion instead enables him to make the same affirmation for all humanity. Yet he would not be understood thus simply to classify the Japanese emperor and his family on a par with the rest of mankind. All men in the Christian view are appointed to particular service and station in the world, and the service which the Japanese Christian believes to be laid upon the emperor impels him to regard the person of his imperial majesty with supreme respect, and to offer up reverent prayers daily in the emperor's behalf.

In his final chapters Dr. Kozaki compares the Christian ideal with "bushido." As to this, he holds that the ideals of "bushido," except those that are peculiarly feudal, are readily taken up into Christian character; but very positively Dr. Kozaki insists that "bushido" is not an adequate moral standard, and it requires the baptism of the Christian spirit before it represents the true ideal of a gentleman as known to Christian thought. Amplified and transformed in this way, however, the ancient standards of the Japanese samurai will meet the demands of life upon not military men alone but also on politicians, scholars, business men and all other classes.

Metet Boys' School Crowded

Rev. George Schwab, who, with Mrs. Schwab, was transferred a short while ago from the Elat station in the Kamerun district of West Africa to Metet, writes from the latter place that the work of the boys' school there has been marvelously increased. He says: "We had a special two weeks' service of prayer, and God more than answered our pleadings. In no other way can I explain the inrush of boys to school, the new confessors, the heart cleansings we have heard of and witnessed. We long believed that the Bulu would be in the majority in the school, and of the 600 enrolled this semester the proportion of Bene to Bulu is as one to four. I have always been sure that with the advent of a German-speaking teacher Metet would rival Elat in numbers in time, but I must confess that my faith was unequal to this 'landslide' so soon. It took about all last semester for the news to spread that the German teacher had come, and then God took a hand in it also. At the close of the first semester last year we enrolled 250, the second 400. Now the unlucky '13 brings 600."

A new feature has been initiated in Metet which is proving to have good results. The schoolboys are sent out to various points every Friday and Saturday to bring in the people for Sunday, and in some cases hold meetings themselves. From the girls' school the older girls and women, with their teacher or some Christian woman, go from house to house and hold meetings for the women. One of the questions the missionary hears often is, "How should a woman of our tribe walk?" meaning, What should a Christian do every day?

Fruit of One Conversion Among Laos

Rev. J. S. Freeman, itinerating among the Laos in Siam, has been vastly ecouraged by the wonderful recent growth of the gospel in Ban Pa Bong. This town had long appeared absolutely impervious to religious ideas. The pioneer Dr. McGilvary in his constant travels through this region was frequently in Ban Pa Bong, and though its leading men always greeted him cordially and showed him the most liberal courtesy, they seemed absolutely unaffected by the talks in which he explained Christianity to them. For a considerable lapse of years no missionary went near the place, but three years ago when Mr. Freeman passed by the town he was delighted to discover that one of its most substantial residents had decided for Christianity and stood before the community openly as a follower of Jesus. Three long years elapsed before the village could be visited again. Then, to his surprise, Mr. Freeman found that this one citizen's faithful testimony had given the gospel free course in the village and this original Christian of the community had, without ordination or any contact with the missionaries, become the pastor of a very considerable Christian church. It is this man's custom to speak of Christ almost constantly to his neighbors, "in season and out of season."

Missionary Brevities

—A Christian Korean who has been recently traveling through Guatemala on business told Mr. Allison, who is in charge of the Guatemala City station, that in his opinion the pure gospel and Christian schools are more seriously needed in Guatemala than in his own country or in any of the other so-called heathen countries which he has visited—and this Korean has seen a very great portion of the earth. The Korean said he could not understand why the Presbyterian Church should be sending so many missionaries to his land and so few to Guatemala.

—The Japanese government has transferred the bureau of religions from the home department of the cabinet to the educational department. The Tokyo Osahi interprets this change to signify that the government means to emphasize definitely the religious factor in all education that it supervises.

—One of the few occasions on record where a person has been admitted to the Lord's table of the Presbyterian church without first having been baptized is that told by Rev. A. L. Wiley of Ratnagiri, India, who is in this country now assisting in the campaign preliminary to the every-member canvass. A child came under the notice of the mission station, the daughter of a daughter of Rahab, and by order of the local judge the girl was separated from her mother and given into the care of the mission. In entering the decree, however, the judge ordered that the child should not be baptized until she became of age. She developed a beautiful Christian character and pleaded a number of times that she be permitted to join in the communion. Although against the practice and rules of the mission, she at last was permitted to do so and the case reported to presbytery, which sustained the action of the mission. She was baptized as soon as she became of age.

—Rev. Paul R. Abbott, writing from Chefoo, says: "The time has come for us to work for the men of education and means as well as for the farmer and coolie. The scholar and the gentry are willing to have something to do with us now. It is our opportunity. But they are not willing to sit in our street chapels with the lower strata of society; they must be caught with different means. They like to come to our homes, and we are at present having pleasant social relationships with the most influential families of the city."

—One of the difficulties in the work of mission schools of Siam is the indifference of many parents to the necessity of regular attendance on the part of their boys and girls. As a rule, the children come to school when they please and stay away when they choose. Long vacations are always demoralizing, and after the opening of the term it is usually some little time before the enrollment reaches its proper mark. But in spite of all, the work progresses continually.

—One of the closing sessions of the annual meeting of the Japan mission at Karuizawa this summer was a social evening in which greetings were given to all the thirty or more missionaries who have been in the work over twenty-five years, and to Dr. and Mrs. Thompson, who have been in Tokyo fifty and forty years respectively, beautiful presents were given—a gold-headed cane of ebony and a silver bowl.

—Further news from Mexico indicates that the fire on the grounds of the Presbyterian mission at Coyoacan did not harm the main college building nor any of the professors' houses. The damage was confined to the destruction of two lesser buildings, one containing the dining room and kitchen and the other the dormitory of the theological students.

—The kaiser of Germany has recently presented the German mission in Nagpore, India, with a beautiful Bible in which he has written: "The blood of Jesus Christ, the Son of God, cleanseth us from all sin." His signature follows.

—Dr. Hunter Corbett, the veteran missionary at Chefoo, has been ill with rheumatism for some time and it is feared that he will have to give up his fall itinerating trip into the country about the station.

Board Notes and Announcements

—In the Friday morning meeting of the Board of the Northwest, Chicago, led by Mrs. Bryan Y. Craig, mission band secretary, Mrs. Berry, chairman of the candidate committee, spoke of the need of a woman physician in Tsinanfu, capital of Shantung province, to be with Dr. Caroline S. Merwin in care of the Louise Y. Boyd hospital for women. Dr. Merwin herself, two years ago, and later our own Miss Boehne of that station, told of this need, which each year makes more urgent. Though the money is fully provided, the doctor is not yet found. Reading a letter from Dr. Weber of Efulen, Mrs. Berry quoted Milligan's words: "There is no such thing as a female cannibal!" Mrs. King, mission study secretary, told of the four new foreign missions textbooks, one of which, "The New Era in Missions," by Sherwood Eddy, will not be ready until October. Speaking of the need of efficiency she said: "Let us push 'The King's Business' as hard as we can. If possible, get the officers of every society into a little group to study this book."

An Explanation of Syndicalism

American Syndicalism: The I. W. W., by John Graham Brooks (Macmillan Company, New York. $1.50 net). Mr. Brooks's book together with a much smaller and more general one written from the philosophical socialist standpoint, Syndicalism: A Critical Examination, by J. Ramsay Macdonald (Open Court Publishing Company, Chicago; 50 cents net), should make between them the situation and methods involved in syndicalism as clear as they can be made in a book.

Just what, precisely, is syndicalism? It is a movement which, although outlawed by socialist and conservative alike as an impudent, lawless, revolutionary upstart, can claim rather distinguished philosophical justification just at present. Of course it is not true, as has been stated, that Bergson's philosophy is the father or even the godfather of syndicalism, although Georges Sorel (one of the French defenders of syndicalism, whose philosophy is briefly summed up by Mr. McDonald) does use much of Bergson's general line of thought in his own polemic. Syndicalism is, as a matter of fact, simply the application in practice of an idea now becoming a possession of more than one modern philosophic school, and happily phrased by the celebrated Danish philosopher, Harald Hoeffding, in the aphorism that whereas we live forwardly we can only think backwardly. He means by this, of course, that we can think only in terms of past experience and cannot predict by means of thought. Now the distinguishing point about the socialist is that he has attempted to think forwardly—in terms of a coming cooperative commonwealth—and has based his present political and social action on the certainty of what was to come. Tired of this method, and disillusioned in regard to its ultimate success, the syndicalist throws away the whole baggage of forward thinking and substitutes forward acting.

The factories, he says, belong to us and not to the owner. Therefore we will seize them. We are not yet ready to do that at one jump, but we will provisionally regard them as ours anyway, and if the owner will not give us the hours and pay we ask for a beginning we will not give him so much work. We will temporarily disable the machines; and this "sabotage," as we call our method, will not destroy them permanently—that would be shortsighted. Ultimately we will get such concessions as to eliminate the employer, and then we will run the works cooperatively. But we will not postulate how that shall be done or when it shall be effected, in advance. Let the employer do the thinking. We only act, nor do we bother with such ethical justifications as our socialist friends.

How far this school of direct action has gone in America is ably recorded, and with a fair mind, by Mr. Brooks, and he also makes some very pertinent remarks on our own duties in the situation—a situation that may develop into a most tragic one unless the leaven of a very real love and a burning sense of justice be injected into it by those who are without the environs of the actual fighting which is rapidly inducing fanatical madness on both sides of the battle which the Industrial Workers of the World are waging on wealth.

Travel and Description

Home Life in Russia, by A. S. Rappoport, tells in a most intimate and interesting way of the people and customs of the much-written-about but little-known empire of the czar. Knowledge of the peasant life is especially hard to gain, because of the suspicion entertained of all visitors to the country districts and villages; but it is to these country people that the author, while not neglecting the life of the cities, devotes most of his attention. He describes their houses, their work, their family life, marriage ceremonies, religion, education, superstitions and recreations, and his book is both entertaining and instructive. [Macmillan Company, New York. $1.75 net.

Highways and Byways of the Mississippi Valley, by Clifton Johnson, is a new edition of a popular work. Mr. Johnson has given us many sketches of the "common people" in many lands, but no one of his books is more distinctive than this. It makes one who sees "the world" from a Pullman window realize how much escapes his observation. The chapters on the mosquitoes and alligators of the southern bayous and on "Mark Twain's Country" are worth the price of the book. [Macmillan Company, New York. $1.50.

Black's Guide to Ireland appears in its twenty-fifth edition, having been revised and brought up to date. We venture to say that the visitor to Ireland who possesses so complete a guidebook to that country as this recognized authority will be surprised to discover its value. By all means have it at hand when planning your European tour. It is altogether adequate in information and maps. [Macmillan Company, New York. $1.75 net.

The Russian Empire of Today and Yesterday, by Nevin O. Winter. Mr. Winter is an indefatigable traveler and observer, and he has performed the service for Russia which he had hitherto performed for Mexico, Brazil, and other American countries—that of going over them thoroughly with open eyes and attentive ears, and reporting only what he sees in picturesque detail, with a solid buttressing of history and geography. In the case of Russia, the author has given especial attention to those problems which are of interest to the American reader, and has explained dispassionately the Russian side of the dispute with America regarding Jewish passports. In his general treatment of the Jewish question, however, he occasionally shows prejudice; and in his incidental remark as to their "physiognomy for which nature is responsible" he appears to be repeating a popular error. As a matter of fact the hook nosed type which does duty with caricaturists is only present in from 12 to 14 per cent of the chosen people. But it would be ungracious to single out any one defect in a book of such a wide compass as the present one. The chapter on the present status of government and governed in Russia are especially interesting and fully justify the revolutionary activity of which we hear so much. [L. C. Page and Company, Boston. $3 net.

The Different West: As Seen by a Transplanted Easterner, by Arthur E. Bostwick. The "superficial" impressions of an observant traveler, containing a great deal of interest on the fundamental differences between east and west. [A. C. McClurg and Company, Chicago. $1 net.

New Drama and Poetry

Daffodil Fields, by John Masefield. Not so big a thing as his "Story of a Round-House," this long narrative poem is still an achievement of great interest and beauty. Its theme is the love of two English youths for a girl—the old, old theme of love's affinity for that which is charming but worthless instead of that which is unattractive and strong. The story rises passionately to a climax that sweeps one away with its force, and there is line after line that must be classified as the highest type of poetry. [Macmillan Company, New York. $1.50 net.

Tradition, by George Middleton. The first of these six one-act plays by the author of "Embers" is a poignant and unexaggerated rendering of a well-known situation. A farmer welcomes home his daughter who has been struggling, against his will, for success as an actress. He thinks her homecoming is an acknowledgment of defeat. Her correction of his impression makes it perfectly clear that such ideas as self-expression, the creative passion, and art as an activity rather than as a pastime have never entered his mind. The other plays in the volume deal with situations having more directly to do with the demands of society at large upon the individual, especially as these affect the functions of the wife and mother. They are all dramatic without being sensational, and all leave the reader with a heightened sense of the irrationality of contemporary life. [Henry Holt and Company, New York. $1.35 net.

The Mortal Gods, and Other Plays, by Olive Tilford Dargan. The first of these three poetic dramas by the author of "Lords and Lovers" and "Semiramis" deals with the attempt of the king of an imaginary country, the climate of whose capital city, however, is like that of New York, to help in the subjugation of a province of another and more southern climate which we may well liken to that of Mexico, especially as the revolutionists of the play are Spanish in type. It is told in rapid and dramatic blank verse of fine quality. The second play is a delightful comedy of Athenian and Spartan politics and manners, and "Kidmir" is a tragic study laid on the southern coast of Asia Minor during the later crusades. All three are alike characterized by clever dramatic structure and verse that, whether dignified or humorous, is always of the highest finish. [Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. $1.50 net.

Recent Fiction

O Pioneers! by Willa S. Cather. After the subtleties of "Alexander's Bridge" this new novel is a little disappointing. It is a story of some Swedish settlers in western America, told with a simplicity and perfection that mark it as very good work. But it is not the kind of thing we like most from Miss Cather. We hope she will revert to the type of her first novel. [Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston. $1.25 net.

Brass Faces, by Charles McEvoy, contains more idiotic complications than one cares to follow out. A hysterical girl, eloping, is trapped in a house from which a freakish young man, an utter stranger, rescues her. There is very little of truth, cleverness or imagination about the book. [Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston. $1.25 net.

De Garmo's Wife, by David Graham Phillips. Three short stories, each of which has a heroine who reflects the new economic order—one of them even to the extent of accepting regular wages as her husband's housekeeper. [D. Appleton and Company, New York. $1.30.

Religion

The Apostles' Creed and the New Testament, by Johannes Kunze, professor of practical theology, University of Greifsvald, Germany. Dr. Kunze's work was undertaken because of "insistent attempts" by some theologians of Germany to force the omission of the creed from the church order. It is his task to show that the creed has so early an origin in its substance, if not in its form, that it deserves continued place. The familiar method for proving the scriptural authority of the creed is to begin with the Scripture and find the elements of the creed there. Dr. Kunze begins with the creed and pushes back by periods until he finds the formula out of which the present creed grew not only in Pauline but in pre-Pauline history. His argument that the creed is not of Roman origin is interesting. He makes it a development of the baptismal formula. [Funk and Wagnalls Company, New York. 75 cents net.

The Road of Life, by John Kelman. We owe much to John Kelman for his classic work on the faith of Robert Louis Stevenson. In this new volume he makes the same careful and complete study of Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress" as far as Vanity Fair. We trust the two other volumes, completing the work, will soon follow. Dr. Kelman has been a long and loving student of the Puritan period, and of its greatest literary product, which he properly describes as "one of the everlasting books." Not chiefly as a book of history but as a book for present guidance Dr. Kelman's volume is to be prized. We do not recall any substantial book on Bunyan to which adequate reference is not made in this volume. Its footnotes will serve as a bibliography, while its pages are full of suggestions. In these days of strong social emphasis on religion it is well to give some accent to its personal phases, as "Pilgrim's Progress" does. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.25 net.

Elements of Spirituality, by George Hooper Ferris. Dr. Ferris has done a commendable piece of work in contributing to the clarification of the idea of spirituality by an analytic investigation which discloses the fact that in order to be complete the spiritual mind must contain an affectional, a devotional, an intellectual and a moral element. It must not be understood, however, that the investigation is carried on along psychological or philosophical lines. The volume is a collection of sermons and Dr. Ferris is a practical pastor who approaches his subject from the practical point of view. [Griffith and Rowland Press, Philadelphia. 50 cents net.

My Creed, by Howard Arnold Walter. This slender and modest little book of verse mirrors the moods of a life which, though scarcely past youth, has already seen the world widely and divined its meaning deeply. Mr. Walter's devotion to the mission of his Lord is expressed on nearly every page, and now that that devotion has taken him as a missionary to India, his poetic gift will doubtless have even richer flowerings out of the mystic soil in the land of Buddha. [Gorham Press, Boston.

Happiness Haven, by Amos R. Wells. The editor of The Christian Endeavor World here speaks of "Christ's command which is oftenest broken." He finds that command in the words of the Master, "Let not your heart be troubled." Seven gentle and beautiful little sermons against worry follow, and these are supplemented by ten exhortations to happiness, based on the beatitudes. Altogether, it is a most comforting little volume. [United Society of Christian Endeavor, Boston.

Miscellaneous

The Masked War, by William J. Burns. This is Detective Burns's own story of what he calls the organized warfare against society waged by leaders of the iron workers' national organization, which ended in the life sentence of one man, fifteen years' imprisonment for his brother and long-term penalties for thirty-eight others. As related here, Burns's persistence and dogged determination in the face of obstacles from friends and foes alike were remarkable, and in uncovering the masked war he rendered society a notable service. The main features of the dynamite conspiracies culminating in the Los Angeles Times explosion are familiar to readers of current news; but the extent of the cold-blooded plots, the devilish cunning and daring with which they were carried out, as told by Mr. Burns, are indeed surprising, even astounding. He gives a tabulated list of eighty-three explosions from the date of the declaration of the strike in 1905 to the Los Angeles outrage in 1910. The material of Mr. Burns's narrative is sensational in highest degree, but the story is in the plainest matter of fact style—distinctly unliterary and unvarnished. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.50 net.

Oliver Hazard Perry and the Battle of Lake Erie, by James Cooke Mills. The wide interest recently exhibited in the Perry centennial makes timely this life of the Lake Erie hero. The volume is not intended as a eulogy, nor is it confined within the limits of biography, but includes a full history of the Lake Erie operations in 1813. The illustrations are highly interesting as well. [John Phelps, Detroit. $1.50 net.

The Victorian Age in Literature, by Gilbert K. Chesterton. Every page of Mr. Chesterton's brilliant summary of the Victorian novelists and poets is quotable. Despite the untrustworthiness of some of its judgments it is eminently stimulating. Volume 61 of "The Home University Library." [Henry Holt and Company, New York. 50 cents net.

Peace! When There Is No Peace

The battle-scarred field of Gettysburg recently bore upon its breast many of the men who fifty years ago tramped over its sod in bloody combat for a nation's honor and good—this time in peace and not in war. Blue and gray met as friend to friend and slept under the common tent of a preserved nation.

This nation knows peace today as no other nation does. Especially is this true in the aggregate. We realize, however, in the concrete, this is not true. Organizations are at war with each other; communities are at war, families are at war. True, not in open combat, but underneath the surface there is war and hatred, bickering and backbiting.

What shall we say of the church? It preaches the gospel of peace, but the church of all organizations is far from peace. When I use the term church I speak collectively. The church is divided by denominations that are seriously at war with each other; sometimes with themselves. On the surface there seems to be in many localities harmony and unity of effort, yet underneath the surface is the same strong and bitter feeling and jealous guarding of "the faith once delivered to the saints," all trying to cover up the unpleasant disposition by "preaching peace."

Why not establish a "Hague" for the denominations, where all matters would be settled by prayerful arbitration, and then pray for grace to live up to the agreement? Why not meet on old battlefields as friends? Why not live and work under the common tent of a united church, facing and crushing the great enemies to mankind? The church is one organization praying "that they may all be one," then living and practicing open opposition to the prayer. If the church wants peace it can have it. What is retarding peace and unity? We feel that it is not coming from the pew. The call today from the pew is for united effort. Our church courts are largely presided over and governed by the ministry. It is in their power to bring peace and unity. Why not? Who can answer? Some say too much to give up. If that is true, then it is time to stop preaching unity.

In the Old Testament there is a man called the "apostle of peace at any price." His name is Isaac. When some came and disputed about the well he just picked up and moved on rather than have a fuss. How much happier, stronger, would the church be today if really we could follow the Prince of Peace! We are working and praying for the day to come when we shall stand as one united front against the great evils of our time. C. F. Ensign.

Applause for The Menace

The Continent thinks The Menace is not helping Protestantism any. That may be from your standpoint, but it is hurting Romanism a great deal. It is well understood that if the Roman church could safely institute libel proceedings against The Menace it would lose no time in doing so. But the very fact that the church does not is sufficient proof that The Menace is telling the truth and laying bare the facts. Any procedure in the courts on the part of the church against The Menace would necessitate so much exposure of the church's secret life that it would never think of making out a case gainst The Menace.

The trouble with the Protestant church and press has been too much leniency and compromise. "Don't stir up feeling in the Roman church; nothing gained by it" has been too much the motto. Yet every one knows that the Roman Church is gaining all the time and the Protestant church is trying to carry on a kind of surface sociability and recognition which is purely hypocritical and to no purpose whatever. The Menace is doing a work which the Protestant press generally has failed to take up. There are a few papers and magazines like The Christian Herald of New York that have stood with The Menace in calling attention to and in interpreting the infamous teaching and enunciations from Rome concerning the government and public institutions of this country. There can be no compromise with Rome, nor toleration of her attitude towards the Protestant church.

R. E. L. Hayes.

The Patrons of The Menace

As a patron of The Continent under its various names for more than thirty years, I was greatly shocked on reading your opinion of The Menace of Aurora, Mo. I am a reader of The Menace also and believe in what it advocates—free speech, free press, free schools, and entire separation of church and state. Any paper that advocates these principles and warns the people against the enemies of them is loyal and patriotic and is imbued with noble purposes.

The 700,000 subscribers and two million readers of The Menace are typical indorsements of all its advocates. This aggregate is augmented weekly by from 15,000 to 20,000; and this spirit which you "detest," and whose "sincerity" you doubt, will rise to the million mark in another year.

And why this vast host of subscribers—the greatest number of any paper in the United States, if not in the world? Simply because the blood of all patriots is stirred at the exposure of so many tricks, plots and plans to destroy our government. The Menace has the courage to publish the tricks and the tricksters, while the great dailies and little dailies and smaller fry have not.

An Old Soldier.

Dislikes Both "Protestant" and "Roman"

It is a great wonderment in my mind that the Christian ministry and the church still persistently retain the names of "Protestant" and "Roman."

In my humble opinion, these nominal appellatives should no longer appear in our ecclesiastical vocabulary except in reference to the past. More than a thousand years before the Christian era the psalmist exclaimed, "Behold, how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity!"

The apostle Paul, soon as he discovered the beginning of divisions among the disciples, expressed his strongest dissent against it, when, reminding them, he said, "We are laborers together with God."

The new republic of China openly expresses its desire for a united Christianity with all the differing religious denominations eliminated.

A similar message comes to us from India, Korea and Japan.

Just across the border the final consummation in a denominational merger seems to be assured for one Christian church in the Dominion of Canada.

Meanwhile, the world conference on faith and order which the Episcopalians are promoting grows more strongly important and a favorable outcome is hoped for in the near future.

If it is true that Roman Catholics are going astray from the teachings of Holy Scripture and departing from the "Holy Catholic Church," it should be clearly seen that we cannot, by merely "protesting," win them back to our faith and practice. R. C. Crittenden.

"Princeton 1910" Not Rebellious

No wonder that the motive of the distinguished 1910 class of Princeton Seminary has been misapprehended by many good men outside the seminary, seeing that one of its members even is so helplessly compassed about with so great a cloud of misunderstanding.

In his article (Continent, August 28), under the title of "Princeton's Rebellious Class," Rev. F. Z. Browne appears to be rather out of countenance with his class respecting the movement it vigorously stirred and headed toward "progressiveness in methods." Brother Browne is good-hearted and sincere in his remarks; however, I cannot but join issue upon his penitential handling of this labyrinthian situation.

The class of 1910 was not rebellious. Neither was the seminary injured by its progressive movement. The whole religious world was informed by that class that the grand old seminary was still throbbing with ardent life. There may have been a small number of mollycoddles in the student body who aimed at securing a "snap" course by lowering the standard of the curriculum; but the large majority were impelled by a decidedly high motive.

The movement did not end in failure, either. The members of the faculty very courteously promised to comply with those of the demands they deemed reasonable, as far as circumstances would allow; and they have honorably kept their promise.

The class of 1910 has always been loyal to Princeton Seminary and to her sacred traditions; nevertheless, our desire and hope were and now are:

1. That a good, practical course of sociology be introduced into the curriculum.
2. That the curriculum itself be so arranged as to allow the students more time for practical work, instead of expanding itself, as it did then, from 7 in the morning to 9 or 10 at night.
3. That all the lectures be audibly and articulately delivered, so that every man in the class can take notes.
4. And that dunces and dullards—if there be such—be permitted to take only as much Hebrew as their feeble wits can digest.

K. A. BISHARA.

Cut It Out!

Far enough removed from the General Assembly of 1913 for a dispassionate survey there are two features haunting the memory of a commissioner which this writer wishes could be cut out from all future Assemblies.

1. Nominating speeches in behalf of candidates for moderator.

This deponent went to the Assembly prepared to vote for one of the excellent men who were one and all fully qualified for the office, and were, to all appearances, free from any undue attempt to influence the votes of their brethren. But the nominating speeches overdid the business. The fulsome praise bestowed upon each of the four candidates might have been duplicated for a hundred others, so that after listening to four such speeches, with four more from their seconders, we felt like throwing them all overboard, and so we welcomed the nomination of Dr. Stone as a relief.

In the future let each commissioner write to the stated clerk in advance of the Assembly giving his vote for first, second and third choice. Then let the stated clerk announce the result, and the ballot be taken without nominating speeches. We may depend upon the church press for the information as to the prominent men who are to be named by their friends, even as we do now to some extent.

2. The useless presentation of numerous gavels.

If someone has an extraordinary piece of timber, the handle of which is a splinter from the north pole, the head from a tree in Timbuctoo, with gold bands from the mines of Ophir, let him express it to the moderator, but please do not take up the time of the Assembly with a lot of eloquent moonshine! Let there be an official gavel, and let that only be orated on after the address of the retiring moderator. Then get down to business. JOHN E. DAY.

Reading Matter for Remote Places

I noticed in The Continent of Aug. 14 mention of the great need among fishermen and others of good papers and magazines as given by S. Hall Young of Alaska, but no post office addresses are given. We are interested in him and could help him in that way. We have many periodicals going to waste for want of some stimulus. I never let a Continent be torn or destroyed and want others to have no excuse for such a sinful waste. Can you not put in a few addresses as a help?

MRS. S. I. ELDER.

Ways of Working

To Check Results of Every-Member Canvass

The plan adopted by Assembly's joint executive committee to get to the churches news of the plan of the every-member canvass may well be adopted by individual churches or by presbyteries in handling the same subject. The joint committee named men to visit presbytery meetings and tell of the plan. They also appointed agents to act as correspondents in each synod to report what is done by the churches about adopting the plan and how many of them have put it into execution by next spring.

In a similar manner churches can appoint a committee to visit the different societies of the whole organization and explain the method of uniting all the finances which may have been adopted by the congregation. Another committee can be appointed to check up the canvassers by districts and report to the missionary committee of the session, which is recommended as the committee in charge, how many members have pledged something through the new system and how many have not been seen by the canvassers.

Publicity for Rally Day

In small towns and cities or in large cities where there is a local paper the interest in Rally Day can be augmented by judicious use of the news columns. Editors are usually glad to know and get church news which does not consist of mere announcement; and the church which can inject most life into its preliminary notices of Rally Day services will get the largest attention from those who don't usually go to Sunday school.

If there is to be a graduation in connection with the exercises, or if any of the pupils are to take a special part which will justify the use of their names, let the editor know who they are. He will be glad to have the names, because the parents and friends of each one mentioned will want to see the paper. The same parents and friends will also want to come to the exercises to see Mary and Jimmie do their little parts.

The editor also will probably be glad for an item about the exercises after they have taken place. At any rate it is hardly fair to ask him to print something to stimulate interest in a forthcoming program and then not give him the opportunity to have something about it after the exercises are over. It seems a little ungrateful for what he has done. Such a "follow up" notice will also serve to urge those who didn't come to Rally Day to visit the school other Sundays.

Special notice in the church calendar and by posters in the back of the church should be included in the publicity plans.

Help Students Starting to College

Rev. J. W. McDonald of Second church, Decatur, Ill., through the cooperation of pastors and parents who have sent him names of students coming for the first time to James Millikin University, has been able to assist the newcomers in forming church ties. He suggests that similar cooperation between pastors in the home towns of students and in the cities to which the young people go to school would be a practical way of doing pastoral work.

Hold Services for Shut-Ins

Social worship meetings are being held by First U. P. church, Chicago, Rev. James E. Walker pastor, during the vacation months in the homes of the sick, aged and shut-ins, the meeting taking the place of the Wednesday evening church service. To those unable through sickness, age or affliction to attend any church service these meetings have given much comfort and pleasure.

What the Postman Brought, One Morning

I HAVE FOUGHT A GOOD FIGHT · I HAVE FINISHED MY COURSE · I HAVE KEPT THE FAITH · PRESBYTERIAN MINISTERIAL RELIEF AND SUSTENTATION · WITHERSPOON BUILDING · PHILADELPHIA · PA.

The postman laid many letters upon the desk, one morning, among them two.

One was from the private secretary of one of America's wealthiest Christian women, who out of a sympathetic heart had directed her secretary to send an unsolicited check of generous proportions for the disabled ministers and the widows and orphans of deceased ministers of the Presbyterian Church.

The other was from the pastor of a German Presbyterian Church, who said in substance: "I am enclosing you a dollar bill which was handed me by one of my parishioners. He is a man 82 years of age and he still cobbles shoes to make his living. This dollar has been earned by hard work and represents sacrifice and loving sympathy for the aged minister and the dependent widows and orphans."

Ministerial Relief and Sustentation thanks God for what the postman brought one morning, from rich and poor.

Why not make your pastor your postman and let him send your gift; whether large or small, for the disabled servants of the church? Address

Deacon Sanders on Ministers' Vacations

In The Continent of August 7 "Elder Jones" raised some questions about ministers' vacations, notably the advisability of the minister's engaging in a busy round of preaching and lecturing during the period when he is supposed to be resting and recuperating. The writer of this article, who speaks from inside experience and observation, takes exception to some of "Elder Jones's" conclusions.

"Say, elder——" Deacon Thomas Sanders was going into the post office just as Elder Silas Morton was coming out.

"Mornin', Thomas," said Silas.

"Are you ridin' out my way?"

"No, I was goin' to walk out home."

"Well, ride 'long o' me," responded the deacon. "I want to talk to you some."

Soon the two were seated in Deacon Sanders's wagon, and were jogging out through the town toward the country. The deacon drove slowly; he did not wish the drive to end too soon.

"Yes, I want to talk to you. Did you read that piece in the paper 'bout what Elder Jones had to say 'bout preachers' vacations? Didn't? Well, you ought to read it. It just about puts that side of the argument right."

Elder Silas Morton was interested.

"What's the upshot of it, anyway?"

"Well," the deacon replied, "Elder Jones don't see no sense in a minister's 'takin' a vacation,' as the sayin' is, and then, when he gets clear of his own congregation, just a-preachin' every Sunday same as usual, only in somebody's pulpit 'sides his own. Elder Jones says 'tain't fair to his congregation that gave him the leave to go, and pays for it, fer the minister to go right ahead workin' and not restin' and then makin' extra money besides. Don't look right, Elder Jones says."

Elder Morton looked at the horse's ears thoughtfully. "Same's I often thought," he said, and added, "But I ain't never said so. Where'd you read that piece?"

"In The Continent," replied Deacon Sanders.

"Well, I'll bet they wouldn't 'a' printed that 'less there were considerable folks thought the same way." The elder was meditating deeply. "Was that our Elder Jones? Always knew he felt that way."

"Guess so," said the deacon. "But I'm surprised, elder, to know you think so too."

"Yes," said the elder, "how'd it look if I'd pay my farm hands for a week's rest, and then they'd go streakin' off to the next county and work their life out that week, and come back to my work all played out, so's I'd lose my money and their strength, too?"

"Elder Morton," said the deacon, with apparently an entire change of subject. "Was you a friend, or was you not, of Rev. Mr. Sitchfield, that left our church last year 'fore Dr. Talcum come here?"

Elder Morton's face grew a deep red. "It was time he quit," he muttered.

"Didn't answer my question, but I'll ask another. How much time did the session give Mr. Sitchfield to find another pulpit? Hey? I didn't hear."

Elder Morton's face was still flushed. "Thomas Sanders," he burst out, "what you drivin' at, anyway? Did you ask me to come out here just so you could get me all wrought up over that old business? I don't want to talk about that. That's done with."

"Where is Mr. Sitchfield now?" queried the deacon mildly.

"I dunno, and what's more, I don't care. Don't care to talk about him, anyway. I'm a friend of Dr. Talcum's. He's a good man, and a fine preacher, and I'm workin' for him, and everything he wants, except this vacation business, goes with me, and that's all I care to say on the subject of preachers in our church—and that's all I'm going to say, too." Elder Morton spoke sharply, and there was irritation in his whole demeanor.

"Well," said Deacon Sanders, still mildly, "I expect you'd be considerable upset if anybody'd tell Dr. Talcum that they'd give him just six weeks to git! Now, wouldn't you? Oh, o' course you said it some polite—you only recommended to the board of trustees that the salary quit the first of October, and it was middle of August then. Oh, yes, o' course you didn't say it in so many words, but that's what it means, and it stuck a knife in his heart, I tell you. He was game, and he left prompt all right. But——" There was a long pause, broken only by a grunt or two from Elder Morton.

"Now," the deacon resumed, "how much thought did you and the rest of the session give to the question of where Mr. Sitchfield would go when he got kicked out of his job here with six weeks' notice? Oh, I know you all talked polite. Said he needn't hurry himself and so on; but that man's heart was breaking—every bit of feeling that a man could have when a congregation that he'd served as faithfully as he knew how turned on him, was seethin' in him. Was he goin' to take his time, when you'd told him how long he could stay and welcome? Not he! He didn't have a rhinoceros hide, he didn't. He was a man, so he lit out. Did you ask where? Not much—it was none o' your business where he got to, so he quit your pay roll." The deacon's eyes were blazing.

"Thought you brought me out here to talk about the minister's vacation," said Elder Morton, sharply.

"So I did—I ain't forgot. I'm coming to that. Now, s'pose Mr. Sitchfield in the five years that he was here had never preached anywhere but right here in our church. He's got a family to support, has to pay his grocery bill and dress himself same as other folks. If he didn't pay his bills I guess he'd hear from it. Now, when we gave him his vacations, what'd he do? Why, he used his Sundays to get acquainted with other churches. Seems most as if he knew you were going to kick him out, don't it? Yes, sir; he went to other fields, and when the ax dropped on him, it just happened—happened, mind you—that he had somewhere else open to him, a place he'd preached in during vacation time, that liked him, and wanted him as their pastor; otherwise—well, I s'pose he could 'a' taken to farmin', or gone to live with her folks while he hunted a place."

There was satire on the deacon's face.

"Huh! So you want the preachers to use their vacations to hunt new jobs, do you? Well, I'd been less in favor of it than ever if I'd thought o' that." Elder Morton was belligerent.

"Well, I believe in the square deal for both sides," the deacon said. "If Mr. Sitchfield could 'a' felt sure that our session was lookin' out for his interest some, maybe he could have felt more secure about it. But the way it's fixed, a preacher that settles down and never moves out of his tracks, so that he isn't known except in his own place—well, he may find himself like Mr. Sitchfield, up against the cold fact that he hasn't a fighting chance at home, and no acquaintances away from home—so there he is."

"Well, Dr. Talcum's safe, anyhow," said Elder Morton dryly.

"Yes, durin' good behavior, and until he stirs up somethin', and if he does his duty he's bound to make enemies. Then let's see what the session will do. Anyhow, let's think what the session can do, because we know what it has done."

Deacon Sanders paused in his speech, "Whoa!" he said, They had stopped in front of Elder Morton's gate. The elder got out somewhat stiffly. "Well, there's room fer differences of opinion," he said. "I'm goin' to get that article and read it, though——"

"Yes, and there's one other point" (the deacon, like Daniel Webster, said 'p'int'), "and that's the question of salary. A minister must think about providin' for the increasin' needs of his family. Now, if he could be sure that his own church would be thinkin' of that too, and raise his salary sometimes, and not wait to do it till they get a new man, why, he'd be easy in his mind. He wouldn't need to be thinkin' 'bout the future, because his people would be doin' it. When they call him, they tell him his salary is paid so's he'll be freed from worldly care. If it could be that, honest Injun', and if the congregation and session could be depended on to deal as square with him as they expect him to deal with them, why, then the minister could use his vacations like old Elder Jones says, lazying in the country."

The deacon gathered up the reins. "Good-by, elder; glad to have had this chance to talk to you. When does Dr. Talcum get back from his vacation? Oh, in two weeks? Well, let's talk this question over with him sometime. Get up, Bill!"

GROWING STRONGER
Apparently with Advancing Age

"At the age of 50 years I collapsed from excessive coffee drinking," writes a man in Missouri. "For four years I shambled about with the aid of crutches or cane, most of the time unable to dress myself without help.

"My feet were greatly swollen, my right arm was shrunken and twisted inward, the fingers of my right hand were clenched and could not be extended except with great effort and pain. Nothing seemed to give me more than temporary relief.

"Now, during all this time and for about 30 years previously, I drank daily an average of 6 cups of strong coffee—rarely missing a meal.

"My wife at last took my case into her own hands and bought some Postum. She made it according to directions and I liked it fully as well as the best high-grade coffee.

"Improvement set in at once. In about six months I began to work a little, and in less than a year I was very much better, improving rapidly from day to day. I am now in far better health than most men of my years and apparently growing stronger with advancing age.

"I am busy every day at some kind of work and am able to keep up with the procession without a cane. The arm and hand that were once almost useless now keep far ahead in rapidity of movement and beauty of penmanship."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Write for copy of the little book, "The Road to Wellville."

Postum comes in two forms:

Regular Postum—must be well boiled.

Instant Postum is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water and, with the addition of cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly

Would Have a Children's Court

Ministers Hear of Modern Judicial Methods—Dr. Hutton Buried from Greenwich Street Church—Sunday School Building Started.

PHILADELPHIA—At the opening session of the Presbyterian ministers' Monday meeting tribute was paid Judge Ben Lindsey of Denver for work in behalf of the boys by Isaac C. Sutton, who asked the ministers' support towards establishing a children's court for Montgomery county. The principal speaker of the morning was Dr. E. J. Moore, new state superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League. Sept. 15 a sermon was preached to the ministers by Dr. R. T. Jones. On Sept. 26 Rev. R. C. White of Delanco, N. J., will speak on "The Heroism of Saint Paul," and on Sept. 29 Dr. George H. Hemingway of Camden will tell of "Vacation Thoughts and Experiences in Old England."

The funeral of Dr. William H. Hutton, late pastor of Greenwich Street church, was held in the church Sept. 8. The services were in charge of Rev. S. W. Steckel, who has been supply of the pulpit during the illness of Dr. Hutton. The principal addresses were by Dr. William H. Roberts, John Wanamaker and Rev. M. J. Hyndman. Prayer was offered by Doctors Greenwood and L. Y. Graham.

START SUNDAY SCHOOL BUILDING

The Second church of Germantown, Rev. J. Harvey Lee pastor, has started work on a Sunday school building adjoining the church edifice. It will be of stone, two stories, and will cost $26,000 together with the alterations necessitated in the church.

The city's newest Lutheran church was organized in a vacant store in West Philadelphia recently under the name of "The People's Church." Two hundred families are said to be prospective members of the congregation.

The one hundredth annual session of the supreme council of the Scottish Rite Masons of the northern jurisdiction was opened with services on Sunday morning in Tenth church. The sermon was preached by Bishop Berry of the M. E. church.

The Young Men's Christian Association of the city is arranging for the introduction of the "P. S. A.," or "Pleasant Sunday Afternoon," as it has been observed in England for some years. There will be twenty minutes of speaking of an attractive character, supplemented by varieties of music. The speakers will be men of distinction from different denominations. Among them is named Dr. John Grant Newman of Chambers-Wylie church.

The Presbyterian Home for Aged Couples and Aged Men at Bala will dedicate a new building Sept. 25. It will also be donation day and gifts for the $100,000 endowment and the $100,000 mortgage liquidation are earnestly hoped for.

SUNDAY SCHOOL MISSIONARY ABROAD

Philadelphia Methodism is much interested in the first Sunday school missionary sent out by the church to China. He is Rev. Wallace H. Miner. He will sail from San Francisco Oct. 1 to be superintendent of Sunday school work for the Foochow conference.

Wilson May Be at Grove City

Tentatively Agrees to Attend Inauguration of College President -Prominent U. P. Minister Retires After Long Service.

PITTSBURG—President Woodrow Wilson has tentatively agreed to the first public official engagement since his inauguration. It is to attend the inauguration of Professor A. T. Ormont as president of Grove City College. The date is to be fixed within three or four weeks when President Wilson shall determine that he can get away. He will also be urged to address the Pittsburg Chamber of Commerce after his visit to Grove City.

Dr. J. T. McCrory, who has been pastor of the Third U. P. church for thirty-three years and who has almost reached 70 years of age, has resigned the pastorate. His church has made him pastor emeritus at a salary of $2,000 a year for life. Dr. McCrory has been a power for good in this community in his crusade against vice and intemperance.

The Ministerial association has resumed the Monday morning meetings. At the first meeting Attorney W. F. Treadway read a paper on the "Nonpartisan Ballot Law."

Presbytery at its opening meeting elected delegates to synod to be held at Waynesburg, Pa., next month. Dr. C. S. McClelland, stated clerk, leads the delegation.

In the majority of Sunday schools in this vicinity Rally Day will be observed on the last Sunday of September.

Miss Jeannette McClelland, daughter of Charles S. McClelland, D. D., pastor of Mount Washington church, who was graduated from Wooster University last June, sailed from San Francisco Sept. 11 for Kwang Ju, Korea. She goes out with Mrs. C. C. Owen, a missionary of the Southern church, as teacher for her four children.

Second Offshoot from Norwood

Mission Formed Into Church in Suburb of Cincinnati The Congregation of Third Church Moves Again to Temporary Quarters.

CINCINNATI—Oakley church—the second child nurtured by the mother church at Norwood—was organized Sunday, Sept. 14. This church is now in charge of Rev. Horace E. Orr of Lane Seminary and request for the organization was made by over forty Presbyterians of this Cincinnati suburb—Norwood's nearest neighbor on the east. Dr. F. N. McMillan presided at the meeting and the sermon was preached by Dr. D. R. Moore of Bond Hill. Oakley was the mission in which the late E. F. Evans, whose recent death at Bay Bridge was a vacation-time tragedy, was so intensely interested. Evanston church is the other Norwood outgrowth.

The Italian church is in real distress—regretting the departure of its loved pastor, Rev. F. Borglione, for his old home at Rome. Mrs. Borglione left for Italy some months ago in poor health, which did not improve when she reached there, and it was a summons to her side that caused him to leave his charge and start back to his native land. The Italians of Cincinnati bade him Godspeed at a dinner at Caproni's. The Italian church occupies old Central church—once a Gibraltar of Presbyterianism in the West End.

The old Third congregation, which was burned out on West Seventh street and then went to the old Fifth church, has secured temporary quarters at the Deaconesses' Home, formerly Wesleyan College, on Wesley avenue.

Dr. Edward T. Swiggett, who has been stated clerk of the Presbytery of Cincinnati for over a quarter of a century, took part in the centennial celebration of Troy church, of which Dr. R. H. Dunaway is pastor.

The every Friday noon class of Sunday school teachers has been resumed at old First church. This old landmark no longer claims the tallest spire in the city, for the hand and steeple have been taken down. These weekly gatherings are largely attended. They are held under the auspices of the Sunday School Association of Hamilton county and are taught by Dr. John F. Herget.

REN MULFORD, JR.

Dr. Mason Cleared of Charges

The judicial commission of Los Angeles Presbytery appointed to take final action in the matters at issue between O. H. L. Mason, D. D., and Long Beach church has unanimously declared Dr. Mason guilty of nothing calling for censure. The commission also reaffirmed presbytery's findings that the resignation of the pastor should take effect Oct. 1. This is the third time Dr. Mason has been vindicated. He was cleared by the elders of the church, by presbytery and by the judicial commission. The latter body commended him to any church which might call him.

Rev. Robert Strong, chairman of the committee, said: "The findings are positive and unanimous. Our commission was vested with full authority from presbytery and our verdict is final. Our action, per se, is the action of presbytery itself. We believe absolutely and unanimously, as stated in the paper we have signed, that Dr. Mason has been guilty of no offense of any nature deserving even censure. While we have found Dr. Mason guiltless of any act or intent calling for censure, we have also refrained from any expression which by utmost distortion might be misconstrued into censure of the resigning elders of his church."

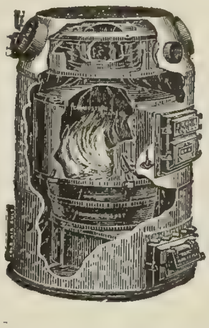
BOVEE FURNACES

At Manufacturers' Prices



THE BOVEE FURNACE HAS DOUBLE THE HEATING CAPACITY OF OTHER FURNACES FOR AMOUNT OF FUEL CONSUMED. They are made very heavy, of the best of material.

Measure the fire pots and combustion chamber and then note the long travel of heat through the compound radiator before reaching the chimney. Compare these measurements with those of all other first-class furnaces, and you will see WHY the Bovee Furnaces require so little fuel and last longer.

Send plans for our special winter prices. We save you about one-half on the price of a first-class heating plant.

Members of Chicago Presbytery Who Spent Several Days on the Shore of Lake Geneva, Wisconsin, Conferring on Church Work

UPWARDS of 100 members of Chicago Presbytery spent parts of three days last week in Olivet camp, Lake Geneva, the guests of friends who provided a special train both ways from Chicago. The mornings and evenings were spent in devotional meetings and conferences. One of the most significant results of the meeting was a gathering of the dozen elders who were in the party, and their determination to interest more men in the work of presbytery. E. S. Ransom of Sixth church was appointed by the men to have charge of preliminary efforts to obtain a larger attendance of elders at future retreats of the same sort, and to obtain representation of elders on the program of future meetings of the same sort.

Moderator Selden characterized the retreat as the best conference presbytery ever held. Coming as it did at the opening of fall work the men went to their churches with consecrated energy. Among the inspirational speakers during the conference were Dr. John Timothy Stone, Dr. George N. Luccock, Rev. Frederick I. Selden, Rev. H. S. Brown and Rev. D. H. Cornell. Dr. J. J. Rae, as chairman of the evangelistic committee of presbytery, had general charge of the conferences. Dr. F. M. Fox, associate secretary of the brotherhood, gave the men practical pointers on work with men.

A quartet of McCormick Seminary students led the singing. Three members of Olivet church who have been working at the camp this summer were received by presbytery as candidates for the ministry.

Olivet Camp Popularity Growing

Nearly 1,000 Persons Entertained at Lake Geneva During Past Season—Mrs. Berry Heads Woman's Board.

CHICAGO—Olivet camp at Lake Geneva is proving its popularity by increasing attendance. This season there were 989 people entertained, of whom 320 were from Olivet church. Last year the attendance was 727 and the year previous 438. Plans are under consideration for the purchase of additional land for tents.

Mrs. A. L. Berry has been elected president of the Board of the Northwest to take the place of Mrs. John Balcom Shaw, who has removed to Los Angeles. Last winter Mrs. Berry was in charge of the Presbyterian Training School for a time, and several years ago was president of the Board of the Northwest for two years.

Dr. John Balcom Shaw was in the city several days last week en route to Los Angeles and conferred with members of the committee of Second church in charge of obtaining a new pastor.

Dr. G. N. Luccock will address the ministers' meeting next week. Last Monday Rev. W. H. Head gave a dramatic interpretation of "Pilgrim's Progress."

Dr. Hugh T. Kerr was strongly praised as a presbyter and as a pastor by presbytery Monday in connection with his request for the dissolution of his relations with Fullerton Avenue church. He goes to Shady Side church, Pittsburg, this month.

RAISE MORE THAN ENOUGH MONEY

At the dedication of the new $29,000 church at Chicago Heights last Sunday Dr. E. P. Hill preached twice. There was a debt of $11,000 and pledges were received at the service amounting to $12,800. The structure was started through the energy of the pastor, Dr. J. B. Fleming. The building will seat 650 and is furnished with a pipe organ.

"Using Newspapers as Allies in Promoting Christianity" will be one of the subjects considered in a conference in connection with the convention of the Christian Endeavor societies of Cook and Lake counties in the University building Sept. 19 and 20. Mrs. Catherine Booth-Clibborn will be one of the speakers at the general meeting.

Several hundred converts of Pacific Garden mission celebrated the thirty-seventh anniversary of the founding of the institution last Sunday. "Mother Clarke" greeted the converts who came from many cities.

The baseball club of Harvey church last Saturday won the game which made them winners of the pennant in the contest among teams of six churches. Every member of the Harvey team attends Sunday school and abstains from Sunday baseball. Rev. F. A. Johnson is pastor.

Members of presbytery and other friends of Dr. George B. Safford gathered in large numbers Tuesday evening in his honor at a dinner at the Kimball cafe. There were addresses of appreciation of his diversified services in the city and expressions of regret at his departure to Minneapolis.

Prospects for the Presbyterian Training School, which recently reopened, were, it is asserted, never brighter nor its future more fully assured. The federation with Chicago Training School is proving entirely satisfactory. Students of the two schools are finding their relation to each other and to the federated leadership an illuminating experience in real Christian fellowship and cooperation, without loss of denominational loyalty.

The Church Extension Board held its first meeting Monday afternoon to plan the work among the weaker churches of the presbytery for the coming season. Several days previously Dr. Hill, the superintendent, took Rev. W. E. Parker, Jr., and Rev. W. C. Smith, new members of the executive staff of the board, on an automobile trip about the city. They visited practically every Presbyterian church, taking special note of the missions and the sociological conditions surrounding each.

The September issue of The Illinois Trumpet Call, the organ of the state Sunday school association, is a memorial number for W. B. Jacobs, for many years identified with Sunday school work, who was killed some time ago in an accident on Wabash avenue.

Clergy and Laity

Rev. William S. Jerome of Detroit has accepted a position with the library of the University of Michigan.

Charles H. Marsh of New York has been appointed organist of First church, Pueblo, Colo. Mr. Marsh for three years was with Dr. Wilbur Chapman and has also accompanied Dr. Henry Ostrom on evangelistic tours.

Dr. Edward B. Wright, pastor emeritus of First church, Austin, Texas, is living at the Bible Teachers' Training Institute, New York, for the current month, renewing old New York associations. Dr. Wright fifty years ago was a classmate in Union Seminary of the late Dr. Charles Augustus Briggs and of Dr. David R. Frazer, pastor emeritus of First church of Newark.

Work for Early Closing of Stores

Pastors Champion Cause of Shop Girls — Ministers Relate Vacation Experiences — Two Fortieth Anniversaries.

ROCHESTER—This city is emphasizing practical religion by a wave of enthusiasm for early Saturday night closing of stores for the benefit of thousands of overworked shop girls and other employees. A small number of business firms are opposing the movement, but pastors and churches of the city generally have thrown their influence into the fight; civic organizations, women's clubs and labor organizations have indorsed the movement; the city papers have printed two-page broadsides showing the "honor roll" of firms agreeing to close at 6 o'clock, and citizens are urged to adopt the slogan, "No more Saturday night shopping." As a result the first Saturday night of September found closed nearly half a thousand business places of all classes; while a monster parade and a mass meeting in Convention hall inaugurated and celebrated the first Saturday night early closing. The movement is hailed as fundamentally religious, obeying the command, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself."

In curious contrast, the Rochester Florists' association the following Monday night debated hotly whether florists ought not to be free to keep their stores open on Sundays.

The ministers' association resumed weekly meetings Sept. 8, with "Vacation Experiences" as topic. Practically all the pastors had returned, except Dr. William R. Taylor of Brick church, who after serving in the Aberdeen council traveled widely in Europe with his family. He is expected to be in his pulpit Sept. 21.

Two fortieth anniversaries of interest have just been celebrated: The one, forty years of faithful work by the Women's Missionary Society of Caledonia, Rev. James L. Jewell, pastor; the other, the anniversary of Salem German Evangelical church, whose Sunday school was founded forty years ago by Thomas Dransfield, now city clerk of Rochester, and a prominent Presbyterian layman. Though a Presbyterian, Mr. Dransfield was superintendent of this school for its first five years; and appropriately he was chief speaker at the fortieth anniversary.

Central church, which Dr. Charles C. Albertson left to take the pastorate of "Dr. Cuyler's church" in Brooklyn, has not yet announced his successor, but work "goes on forever." Dr. John Balcom Shaw stopped on his way to his new California field to fill Central's pulpit Sept. 7. ROBERT C. HALLOCK.

Summer Meetings Attract 570,000

Evangelistic Services in New York Grow in Interest—Reception for Outgoing Missionaries—Dan Crawford to Speak.

NEW YORK—The annual converts' rally held at the close of each summer's tent, open-air and shop campaign by the evangelistic committee of New York city took place last Monday evening in Carnegie Hall. The floor of the auditorium was reserved for converts and their friends. Picturesque delegations from Little Italy, with other companies of Roumanians, Bohemians, Slovaks, Finns, Swedes, Poles, Germans, Spaniards and French, each responding with some form of testimony or salutation, made incontrovertible witness to the comprehensive character of the work and to its fruits. Dr. Arthur J. Smith, superintendent, reported that the expense of the campaign this year has been about the same as last, while the attendance at the meetings and the results of the services this season had far exceeded that of any previous summer. He said that 570,000 persons attended the various meetings. That is an increase of 200,000 over 1912, while the expense has been $2,000 less.

A farewell meeting was held in the assembly room of the Foreign Missions Board Sept. 9 in honor of ten missionaries who sailed the next morning en route to India. Those returning from furlough were: E. E. Fife, D. D., Mrs. R. H. H. Goheen with her two children, Mrs. J. H. Goheen, Miss A. A. Brown, Miss Mary C. Helm and Miss Matilda C. Rebentisch. Going for their first service in the field were Misses Ada D. Ayers, Mary E. Paisley, Emily L. Peterson and Lucy F. Bittinger.

Dr. Parkhurst will preach in Madison Square church Sept. 28. The church reopens next Sunday in charge of Dr. George R. Montgomery, assistant pastor.

Rev. W. N. Lawton, who has been supplying St. James' church (colored), has been invited to become its pastor. This church is working to wipe out a mortgage of $3,200.

Union Seminary announces the appointment of Dr. Henry Preserved Smith as the librarian. Some comment has been created by the fact that Dr. Smith comes to Union from the Unitarian seminary at Meadville, Pa., but Dr. Smith, though he has been teaching in a liberal school, is not a Unitarian in church connection, but a Congregationalist, and moreover, he is not to be a member of the faculty nor a teacher in Union.

Dan Crawford is coming to New York and will speak Sept. 21 in Bedford church, Brooklyn, in the pulpit of Dr. S. Edward Young.

The National Bible Institute's School for Christian Workers will open for its sixth season of work early in October. The teaching staff will include Don O. Shelton, Dr. C. I. Scofield, Hugh R. Monro, Joseph A. Richards, Rev. Henry W. Frost and many others. The institute office is at 156 Fifth avenue.

BUILD MEMORIAL TO PASTOR

The trustees of Spring Street church, with the aid of other friends and admirers of their late pastor, Rev. H. Roswell Bates, have purchased a corner lot adjacent to the church and will erect a neighborhood house which will be dedicated to Mr. Bates's memory.

Officers of Madison Avenue Reformed church found it possible to resume their services last Sunday, when Hugh Black, D. D., preached. Next Sunday the preacher at both services is to be Charles F. Aked, D. D., of San Francisco. Arrangements have already been made for the supply of the pulpit for every Sunday until the end of June, 1914.

Charles H. Wicks has recently returned from four years' residence in China, where he was professor in the Canton Christian College. He is a member of the Church of the Covenant and during the absence of the pastor, Dr. G. S. Webster, on Sept. 14 and 21 supplied the pulpit. He enters the senior class in Union Seminary to complete his theological studies in preparation for permanent work in Canton College.

Last Sunday was a happy day for Central church, Brooklyn. Its pastor, Dr. John F. Carson, who has endeared himself to his parish by nearly thirty years of service, came back to occupy his pulpit after a year in which he has preached there only once. He suffered a complete nervous collapse after his year's service as moderator of Assembly. Dr. Carson now returns with the assurance that with reasonable care he will be able to go forward with his work.

The Ministers' Association at its first meeting after the summer holiday last Monday discussed vacation experiences. Next week Dr. Simeon B. Dunn will talk on "The Bible Chromatics—a Study in the Religion of Colors." Sept. 29 Dr. J. C. Rauscher of the Astoria Reformed church will speak on "The Kingdom of God."

Farewell Service in Old Church

Merriam Park Society Moves to New Structure—Minneapolis Congregations Unite—Many Freshmen at Macalester.

ST. PAUL-MINNEAPOLIS—Most interesting valedictory services were held in the old church building by the congregation of Merriam Park the last Sabbath of August. Elders Magnuson and Doty spoke of the past and the future, while Professor Caroline Austin spoke of the present. Norman B. Block, publisher of the Times-Herald of Grand Forks, returned to St. Paul to participate in the service of song. Two members of the original quartet in the earliest days of the church when occupying the present building were also present. The first Sunday in September the inaugural services in the splendid new church were held in the first floor social rooms. The pastor, Dr. George E. Davies, preached an appropriate sermon. The old church building has been sold to a newly organized Baptist congregation.

Rosedale church of Minneapolis, under the pastoral direction of Dr. T. H. McCleland, has sold its present lots and will soon remove to a much better location at 48th and Lyndale streets.

Another movement in the interests of efficiency is that of the union of Elim and Vanderburg Memorial churches. The united church will occupy the site of Elim and be called Vanderburg.

Elder Cooper of Westminster church is the leader of the committee that is completing the raising of $25,000 for debt-paying in needy churches. The work so sanguinely pushed by Rev. Moses Breeze of the Home Board will thus be sooned crowned with success.

Macalester college opened with suitable ceremonies Sept. 10. More than 100 freshmen were welcomed. Baldwin preparatory school in connection with the college received no freshman class, as the trustees determined that the time had come when Macalester should cease to do preparatory work. The College of Music has been greatly enlarged and its faculty strengthened.

Zion church of the colored brethren, St. Paul, hopes to dedicate the new building during October. A most creditable house of worship has been built under the wise leadership of the pastor, Rev. George W. Camp.

Enlarge Work for Portland Men

More Accommodations at an Adjunct of First Church—New Buildings Progressing—Dr. Marcotte Will Wed Elder's Daughter.

PORTLAND—One part of the First church which not only has kept up its work during the "quiet" months but has enlarged its activity is the men's resort. This undertaking, which looks after men out of work and discouraged, has added to its dormitory facilities during August and has helped a large number of homeless men and men out of work.

Piedmont and Westminster churches have been pushing their new building projects during the summer and the former is now under cover. Westminster, being a larger and more substantial building, sees its work go more slowly. It was the hope of the pastor to have the building in shape for the meeting of synod in the fall, but if that is not possible, synod will meet with the church in the old building. Not only a new building, but a new wife for the minister is also one of the "blessings" promised Westminster congregation, for Dr. Marcotte is soon to wed a daughter of Robert Wiggins, one of his elders.

Millard Avenue church has been for more than a year under the care of Rev. Levi Johnson, superintendent of the men's resort of First church. He has been able to give them only a morning service, but the work has so prospered that the congregation has recently extended a call to Rev. W. H. Amos of Ida Grove, Iowa, who will give it all of his time as stated supply for six months. This church has just completed an expenditure of $1,200 to enlarge its building.

School and College

F. R. Babcock of Pittsburg is the successor of the late J. N. Pew as president of the board of trustees of Grove City College and Dr. Ormond of Princeton has been chosen president of the college and professor of philosophy.

Western College for Women opened its fifty-ninth year Sept. 10. The unusually large enrollment necessitates the occupation of an additional cottage dormitory. Nineteen states, besides the District of Columbia, Canada, Japan and Syria, are represented. The new gymnasium, a handsome brick building, is opened this fall with full equipment.

The 102d session of Princeton Theological Seminary will be opened by exercises in Miller chapel at 11 o'clock, Friday, Sept. 19. The opening address will be delivered by Dr. Oswald Thompson Allis, instructor in Semitic philology. The annual alumni religious conference will be held during the evening of Monday, Oct. 14 and all day Tuesday. It will be addressed by a helpful company of speakers upon topics of personal and practical interest to ministers and students for the ministry. The seminary extends an invitation to the ministry of all churches to attend.

Blackburn college's opening was postponed until Sept. 18 on account of the extensive improvements being made to the college buildings. The large increase in new students consequent on the adoption of the self-help plan has crowded the accommodations in the young men's dormitory and only a few rooms remain for young women.

From Various Fields

Indiana

Growth of Indianapolis Churches

Churches of this city received more members on profession last year than the year previous, but they were more generally distributed. A comparison of the four highest is as follows: In 1912—Seventh 38, Second 35, Memorial 29, East Washington Street 22; 1913—First 33, Seventh 31, Grace 21, Memorial 20.

Rev. A. L. Duncan of Brazil church spent a portion of his vacation with relatives in the city, a sad incident of which was the funeral of his brother, who was run down by an automobile.

At the last meeting of the local Christian Endeavor union the new state field secretary, R. A. Walker, made his inaugural address. He comes from Illinois and succeeds Miss Florence Lanham of this city, who has lately been appointed religious work director of the local Y. W. C. A. She spoke at Sixth church Sept. 7, in the absence of the pastor, Dr. David Van Dyke. Dr. Van Dyke has announced that he would retire from regular labors with next Sabbath, after fifty-one years of active ministry.

Dr. P. E. Powell, national representative of the Knights of the Holy Grail, was in the pulpit of the East Washington Street church on a recent Sunday, preliminary to the organization of a castle of that boys' society.

Synod's foreign missionary committee was in conference here recently with Dr. J. C. Garritt of the Nanking station, relative to a statewide China campaign among the churches.

C. R. S.

Pennsylvania

The old Upper Octorara church, Presbytery of Chester, Rev. W. H. Taylor pastor, is enjoying a period of prosperity and of a greater activity on the part of the workers.

Rev. A. M. Guttery of Washington, Pa., who will soon leave for China as a Y. M. C. A. secretary, was entertained by the people of Third church, Washington, a few days ago.

The celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the admission of Rev. J. B. Reed to the ministry and the twenty-fifth anniversary of his pastorate of Laurel Hill church were recently observed by a large gathering of his congregation on the church lawn.

It is expected that by the end of this year the remainder of the cost of the $14,000 new church building at South Altoona will have been paid. Rev. E. L. Hallett, pastor, came to the field from Odessa, Del., three years ago and has largely increased the membership. There are 260 in the Sunday school, and the school and church are up to date in every particular.

Five towns in Delaware county have organized against the saloon and will inaugurate a campaign to drive it from the county. In Swarthmore the committee is headed by Rev. W. M. Woodfin, pastor of the Presbyterian church, in Chester by Dr. H. L. Latham and in Darley by Rev. J. R. Kerr. A recent meeting at the latter place was addressed by Dr. W. R. Laird of First church of West Chester and Elder Cole of Mendenhall.

Michigan

All of the Detroit pastors returned in time for the meeting of presbytery Sept. 15 at Northville.

An evangelistic campaign under the auspices of the Protestant churches opened at Caro Sunday, Sept. 7, in a tabernacle seating 1,500, recently erected on a vacant lot. The meetings will continue four weeks and will be addressed by able evangelists.

Irving Bradfield of the last class of McCormick Seminary, son of E. H. Bradfield, general missionary, is supplying the church at Harbor Beach.

A new site has been obtained and plans adopted for a new church at Howell to cost about $45,000. Four McPherson brothers have shown their loyalty to the church of their youth by subscribing each $5,000. This church has made a steady advance during the more than ten years' pastorate of Rev. L. S. Brooke.

The Pray law, enacted by the last Michigan legislature, became effective Aug. 15 and forbids the importation of liquors into "dry" counties, of which there are now thirty-five in the state. Attorney General Fellows has ruled that the law applies to exclude liquors from other states as well as from Michigan. This is a hit at Milwaukee beer, which has been enjoying a large trade in the "dry" counties of Michigan.

The Central Methodist church, Detroit, has been gradually encroached upon by business houses and its property has become very valuable. It is now facing the question of endowment in order to insure its permanency. To meet this necessity it is proposed to erect a modern office building on the site now occupied by the Book Concern and the Christian Advocate, the rental of which would yield a handsome income. Neighbors of the Methodists have sold out and moved into newer sections of the city.

Illinois

The new building at Green Valley, near Pekin, Ill., was dedicated Sept. 7. The previous structure has been in service thirty-seven years. The sermon was by Rev. W. E. Spoonts of Northminster church, Jacksonville.

The thirty-eighth annual camp meeting at Tindel's Grove, near Rock Island, closed Aug. 31 with the greatest crowds and best results in years. Several thousand were on the grounds on Sabbaths. Dr. H. P. Dunlop was the evangelist, assisted by Alfred Dixon and Miss Nora O. Corette. Dr. Dunlop is beginning fall and winter evangelistic work.

Dr. Donald C. MacLeod of Washington, D. C., began his work in First church, Springfield, Sept. 7. Following the resignation of Dr. Thomas D. Logan on account of illness Rev. C. P. Goodson supplied the church for a time until called to Ohio. Since then Rev. Scott F. Hershey has been in charge of the pulpit and pastoral work. During the summer he maintained large interest in the church and through cottage prayer meetings has stimulated interest in the midweek service and Sunday school to a large extent.

Plans have been made by the Chicago office of the Laymen's Missionary Movement for fifty conferences to be held in as many places in Illinois beginning Nov. 1, looking toward the spreading of the idea of the every-member canvass. Representatives of all denominations will cooperate in this work, which is under the direction of F. J. Michel of Chicago, western secretary of the movement. These meetings will usually occupy two days and will seek to instruct church leaders in the details of arranging for an every-member canvass in the local congregations.

Iowa

On account of the interstate fair at Sioux City at the time set for presbytery meeting, the meeting was adjourned for a week and will convene in Knox church Sept. 22. This church has a custom of publishing in the calendar the statement of the treasurer for the quarter. Members thus know just how the church stands financially, without waiting until the annual meeting. Rev. R. D. Echlin is pastor.

Kansas

On account of the crowded condition of public schools of Scandia, the Presbyterian church has been fitted as a schoolhouse annex.

Notwithstanding heat, drought and the removal of faithful workers, the church at Lincoln is prospering under Rev. J. C. Hanna. The old stone church, the first erected in Lincoln, has become inadequate to the growing needs, especially of the Sunday school. Sept. 7 the last service was held in the old building. Rev. H. C. Bradbury, who organized the church and was instrumental in securing the first building, was the preacher. The next day workmen began to tear down the old landmark to make way for a larger and better church.

The new church at Ellsworth was dedicated Sept. 14. Neighboring pastors assisted in the services. The building contains thirty different rooms planned for the most modern and practical Sunday school work. Dr. C. E. Kircher is pastor.

Effort is being made promptly to fill the vacancy at Brookings caused by the resignation of Rev. Albert F. Von Tobel, who goes to Mifflintown, Pa. There are large possibilities at the work at Brookings with the students of the State College of Agriculture.

The church of Aberdeen, J. Rosser Jones, D. D., pastor, contributed to beneficence during the past church year a larger sum than any other church in the synod and more than five times as much as the church reporting the largest membership. It ranks third in membership in the synod. The church of Britton, however, Rev. D. M. Butt pastor, far outranks that of Aberdeen in amount per church member contributed to beneficences $8.50; Aberdeen $5.05.

California

The resignation of Dr. Frank L. Goodspeed from First church, Oakland, was not accepted by the congregation. Presbytery on Sept. 10 refused to release him. A committee of conciliation was appointed by presbytery to meet with the church officers and pastor.

Bible Conferences in Winter

Dr. S. C. Dickey of Winona to Pilot a Party of Distinguished British Preachers Through Several American Cities.

The great vogue of Bible conferences which are held in many places in this country during the summer season has suggested to several observers the idea of an itinerant Bible conference to go about the country from city to city during the winter. But it has remained for Dr. Solomon C. Dickey, the creator of the Winona Bible conference, to bring the idea to fruition. Dr. Dickey is now organizing a staff of eminent preachers and teachers in whose behalf he is making arrangements for six-day and four-day series of meetings in perhaps a dozen American cities during January, February and March. The arrangements are by no means all completed, but they have proceeded far enough to assure the enterprise.

Dr. Dickey has signed contracts with Dr. G. Campbell Morgan, pastor of Westminster chapel in London, and Dr. J. Stuart Holden, rector of Portman Square Anglican church in the same city. Two more Englishmen of equal strength and reputation will be added to this list. Dr. Dickey has just sailed for Great Britain to clinch the engagement of these two other men, and it is next to certain that Dr. John A. Hutton of Glasgow will be one of them. The fifth member of the company will be Dr. F. N. Palmer, whose great reputation as a Bible teacher has long since been fixed in the minds of all who are in the habit of frequenting Winona. W. H. Collison, also well known in Winona, will accompany the party as a leader of singing.

The cities with which arrangements for the appearance of these speakers during the winter have already been made are: Los Angeles, Portland, San Francisco, Seattle, Dallas and El Paso. Strong local interest already expressed indicates that Denver, Kansas City, Nashville, Atlanta and Pittsburg will be added to this list, and possibly Washington and Philadelphia. Applications from other cities will be considered when Dr. Dickey returns from abroad in the course of a month.

Dr. Robert E. L. Jarvis, pastor of Bethany church, Philadelphia, and moderator of Philadelphia Presbytery, while visiting recently in Colorado Springs, Colo., was stricken with heart failure on account of the high altitude. He has been taken to Winfield, Kas., and is said to be much improved.

Railroads Will Suffer from the Short Crops—Church Officials Talk Over Investments A Home as an Expensive Luxury.

It is probable that the railroads will suffer large loss on account of the shrinkage in the corn crop this year. It is estimated by the department of agriculture that the crop will be 874,000,000 bushels less than last year's production. This leaves the total yield at 2,251,000,000, which is said to be close to the actual requirements in this country for feeding purposes. There consequently will be little or no corn left for shipment and the movement of live stock may also be curtailed. The spring wheat crop by latest report will be lower than last year by 87,000,000 bushels, but greater than it was in 1911 by 62,000,000 bushels. The large crop of winter wheat will, however, neutralize much of this loss. There has also been a shrinkage in the oat crop which may have a considerable effect upon the price of this cereal. These losses, although indicated previously, show a marked change from earlier reports by the government.

Light on Various Investments

An interesting discussion concerning the relative merits of various sorts of investments was recently overheard by a Continent representative. A pastor, an elder, a deacon and a Sunday school secretary were lunching together, and the pastor was surprised when the elder, the owner of a large factory, said that he could not afford to own a home and explained himself in this way: "I have found that I can use money, which otherwise might be tied up in a home, in my business and make more out of it than otherwise. I have found, too, that I can get more value for my money by renting a house than I can by owning one."

The deacon, who is about to be married, said that he expected to buy a house by partial payments. "I can't save money readily and unless there is some definite payment for me to make every little while, I find that the money disappears. I have found a house which I can buy on monthly payments which total no more than interest and taxes would if I already owned the property."

The Elder Carries Much Life Insurance

"I consider life insurance one of the best means of saving money," said the elder, "and I carry nearly $75,000 insurance, most of it on the twenty payment plan. I started this when I was less than 20 years old and although it pushed me to the limit sometimes to make the payments I have never been sorry."

"I took out my first insurance last year," said the parson, who is close to 42 years of age, "and my rate is considerably higher than if I had started twenty years ago. I believe it is a good way, however, for us poor men to save money."

"Another way that a man of very moderate means can start the accumulation of a modest fortune," said the Sunday school official, "is through the purchase of farm mortgages or bonds by partial payments. Some of the most conservative and reliable houses in the country are now offering some first class bonds on an initial payment of one-fifth of the market price, with succeeding payments any time within a year or so in $100 amounts. Interest begins on each payment as soon as made at the same rate which the bond bears. Mortgage houses are also recognizing the demand of salaried men for a means of investing small amounts and are looking for such investments, even though the profit on this small business is very slight."

"If some of the widows who are persuaded to put their money into stock of companies floated by 'friends of the family' would invest their money in farm mortgages there would be much more income."

Presbyters Study Church Problems

Dayton Presbytery met at Troy. The congregation was in the midst of exercises celebrating the 100th anniversary of the organization. Much attention was paid to the need of churches which suffered from the flood; the committee was enlarged, and instructed to continue efforts with all earnestness. A prominent feature of the meeting was an evangelistic conference closing with an evening address by Dr. Samuel S. Palmer. Governor Cox was commended for his stand as to the closing of the saloons of the state on the Sabbath. Warmest congratulations were extended to Troy church, which continued its services throughout the week.

Will Push Every-Member Canvass

Iowa City Presbytery met in First church, Williamsburg, Iowa, Sept. 8. Rev. M. E. Lumbar preached the sermon. Howard Vernon Comin, D. D., was elected moderator. The overture was affirmed. A committee was appointed to push the every-member canvass. Dr. E. A. Bess, new university pastor, gave the popular address Tuesday evening on education. A. B. T. Moore, national president of the Gideons, gave a splendid address on men's work. Presbytery voted ½ cent per member for vacancy and supply for the year ending March 31, 1914. The withdrawal of the Iowa City Presbytery from the Iowa Board of Home Missions was deferred until after meeting of Synod. The home mission committee and executive commission were empowered to employ an evangelist. A committee was appointed to investigate the Bettendorf field and if the way be clear organize a church.

Steubenville Presbytery met in Smithfield, Ohio, church Sept. 8 and 9, and was opened with a sermon by Rev. O. J. Gregg. A. M. Reid, D. D., who is 85 years young, was elected moderator. Foreign missions were emphasized in a strong address by Rev. A. L. Wilie, a missionary from India. General Assembly's question as to the union with the Reformed Church was answered in the affirmative.

Hold Meetings in Vacant Churches

Union Presbytery met in Spring Place church Sept. 9. Rev. Angus McDonald was moderator. Presbytery instructed the evangelistic committee to arrange for a series of meetings in every vacant church of presbytery and asked the churches to release their pastors for at least two weeks for this special work. A number of pastors volunteered their service. Union Presbytery shows a net gain in members of 8 per cent for the past year. This makes a net gain of 16 per cent for the past two years.

Saginaw Presbytery met at Alpena Sept. 8. Rev. C. M. Boyce preached the sermon. Rev. E. A. Junkin, pastor of Alpena church, was elected moderator. Action on the overture relative to the Reformed Church was deferred until spring. An educational conference was held in the afternoon, at which President Thomas C. Blaisdell of Alma College, Rev. H. R. Stark and Rev. T. S. Anderson spoke. Presbytery closed with a popular meeting in the evening, addressed by Rev. J. A. Dunkel on "What Paul Saw at Athens, and What I See at Alpena," and by Rev. W. H. Mason on "The Secret of Spiritual Power."

Kirksville Presbytery, meeting with New Providence church, was not largely attended on account of the drought and heat. Jonathan Hollyman, who finishes the course in Union Seminary this year, was ordained as an evangelist. Arrangements are being made to hold a number of protracted meetings in country churches this fall.

Hold Efficiency Conference

Des Moines Presbytery met in Panora church Sept. 9, and was opened with a sermon by Rev. Alexander MacFerran, retiring moderator. Rev. Horace O. Bethel of Dexter was elected moderator. He was also elected pastor at large. Dr. R. C. Hughes of Madison, Wis., addressed presbytery in the interest of the university pastor and Bible study. An "efficiency conference" was held in the interest of home missions. President George P. Magill, D. D., of Highland Park College addressed presbytery in popular meeting in the interest of "Practical Education." Presbytery adjourned to meet in the Des Moines Y. M. C. A. Sept. 30 at 2:30.

Maumee Presbytery met in Bowling Green, Sept. 8, and was opened with a sermon by Rev. J. R. Bardelmeier, retiring moderator. Presbytery expressed itself as favoring a union with the Reformed Church. At the Tuesday night session Rev. S. C. Black gave an illustrated lecture on the work of the College Board. This was followed with an address by Rev. George G. Doolittle, a member of presbytery home on furlough from Sidon, Syria.

Urge Religious Education

In the new stone church at Ellwood City, Pa., Shenango Presbytery met Sept. 9. Rev. James E. Clark, representing the Boards of Education, Colleges and Sunday School Work, discussed the pressing problem of religious education. "Since secular schools do not or dare not emphasize or even touch God's truth, the home, the Sunday school and the church must act, and the evangelical Christian college must be supported," he said. As an encouragement along that line, three students of Westminster College applied for presbyterial care as candidates for the ministry, and were received. They were Arthur R. Porter, Pulaski; John R. Thompson, New Bedford, and G. Francis Mechlin, son of Rev. E. K. Mechlin of Rich Hill. The moderator, Rev. B. M. Paul, has summoned committee chairmen to a conference to take up the matter of arranging an efficient every-member canvass among churches.

Pledge Support to Hastings College

Hastings Presbytery met at Oxford, Neb., Sept. 2. Rev. J. W. Pressly, retiring moderator, preached the sermon. Rev. George E. Parisoe of Minden was chosen moderator. Arrangements were made for the installation of Rev. James W. Bean over Hastings church. Presbytery expressed its appreciation of the splendid services of President Crone and his able assistants at Hastings College and the members pledged themselves to use every effort to secure students for the college and urge churches to meet in full their apportionment for the college. Student W. E. Dysart, now in Omaha Seminary, was licensed.

Monroe Presbytery met at Reading, Mich., Sept. 8, Rev. C. E. Thomas moderator. Rev. A. R. Atwood, the new educational secretary of synod, addressed the presbytery. A helpful conference on men's work was conducted by Rev. B. R. Weld. C. E. Bradt, D. D., made an inspiring address on missions at the closing session.

Work of the church and country life department of the Home Board was commended by Iowa Presbytery at Cross Lanes church, Iowa. Rev. D. W. Cassat of Birmingham was elected moderator. Overture on union with Reformed Church was affirmed.

Would Help Pastors' Salaries

Freeport Presbytery met in Polo, Ill., Sept. 9. The sermon was preached by Rev. C. J. Wilson. Rev. Charles Giesselbrecht was elected moderator. The overture on union with the Reformed Church was answered in the affirmative. A plan for the consolidation of synod's committees of home missions, church erection and Sabbath school missions was approved. A committee was appointed to bring in at the spring meeting an overture to Assembly asking that some plan be devised to increase the salaries of ministers wherever needed owing to the increased cost of living.

Presbytery Is 175 Years Old

New Brunswick Presbytery will celebrate the passing of the 175th milestone at the coming meeting to be held in New Brunswick, Sept. 23. The presbytery was constituted August 8, 1738, in New Brunswick, where the centennial was celebrated on the exact day and hour. The "Log College" by Dr. Archibald Alexander is a publication growing out of that celebration.

At the coming meeting there are to be two historical addresses delivered in the afternoon on the beginnings of this presbytery, by Rev. George H. Ingram, stated clerk, and on the presbytery's place in the history of the church, by Professor Frederick W. Loetscher of Princeton Seminary. In the afternoon there will also be greetings from presbyteries. There are at least ten other presbyteries at work at present on ground once occupied by New Brunswick presbytery. A number of these will be represented. In the evening there are to be greetings from the Reformed Church, by W. H. S. Demarest, D. D., president of Rutgers College, and Rev. Joseph H. Hogan, pastor of First Reformed church of New Brunswick.

ending with the tail, which is always discarded.

No one has ever accused Clark's crow of being endowed with musical talents, for its twice repeated note with thrilling r's—kar-r-r! kar-r-r!—is the discordant echo of the storm king's refrain, and once heard is never forgotten.

The cut reproduced from a photograph taken by the author on top of Pike's peak a few years ago shows a nutcracker in its most characteristic pose W. W. ARNOLD.

Colorado Springs, Colo.

Clark's crow is also known as Clark's nutcracker. Its scientific name is Nucifraga columbiana (Wilson). It is sometimes called white crow. Its color is principally white and gray, with black wings, bill and legs. It is smaller than our common crow, being from twelve to fourteen inches long. It frequents the coniferous forests of Western North America from the high mountains of Arizona and New Mexico to upper Alaska. It has been found rarely in South Dakota and Nebraska, and in Western Missouri and Arkansas. It is an omnivorous feeder upon vegetable food, preferring the pine seeds, cedar berries and acorns. It also eats insects. Save during the breeding season, these birds are found in flocks. The bird is related to both the woodpeckers and crows, and is said to have some of the habits and characteristics of both.

Indianapolis, Ind. A. W. BUTLER.

"Tomorrow," said Jake. "The pay is good. And there'll be a raise if I suit. And—and"—the big fellow almost broke down—"the young chap said he'd call around and give my wife a look-over and see if he couldn't pull her up faster. There's grand neighbors in God's world, Patsy. You are one."

At that Patsy escaped. He went to what served as his private den when he sought solitude. It was an extremely narrow slit between the rear of the East End hotel and the side wall of Goldsteiner's department store. The night was drawing on, the day was over.

"There's a lot happened in it," thought Patsy. "It's been all connected up, as if there was something running through it, to keep it together. I wonder if there was."

A bright star hung out of the dusk above the strip between Goldsteiner's and the hotel.

"Maybe this is God's world," whispered Patsy. "The doctor's minister didn't look as if he could get fooled even on God. Maybe Somebody did look out for Jake, to get him another job."

That heart of Patsy's, that he could not keep under, gave a sudden joyous leap. "If He did, why, just a bunch of us boys helped Him out on it! The doctor might be right, and to make folks happy God lets them be neighbors."

Assert That Living Is Costly

Eight ministers of as many churches in Waukegan, Ill., have resigned in the last four months and the reason given by all but two of these is that the high cost of living has made it impossible for them to continue their church work in Waukegan on the salaries paid. Pastors of the Episcopal, Baptist, Congregational, Jewish, Methodist, German Reformed, and two Christian churches are those who have recently left their work. Two of the pastors have taken up secular employment.

Ministers Win Tennis Championship

Two brothers, Rev. H. W. Rendall of Devon, Pa., and Rev. J. H. Rendall of Clarks Summit, Pa., two of the four ministerial sons of Dr. J. D. Rendall, president of Lincoln University, recently won the championship cup in the annual tennis tournament at West Chester, Pa. They have been champions of the county for several years.

GOSPEL PAPERS REACH FOREIGNERS

Board of Publication Does Important Work Among Newcomers—Workers Form Bible Study Groups—Help for Rally Day.

The literature which the Board of Publication and Sabbath School Work is sending out in connection with Rally Day contains some very helpful material with reference to missionary work in behalf of foreign immigrants. Churches, Sunday schools and missionary societies may obtain copies of the board's leaflets on this subject for wide distribution. In view of the emphasis which will be placed upon immigrant missions during this fall in preparation for Home Mission Week, in November, they will be helpful. "New Americans for a New America" is the topic agreed upon by the evangelical denominations for Home Mission Week.

The Board of Publication and Sunday School Work is contributing to the cause of immigrant evangelization through the work of its missionary colporteurs who canvass foreign settlements in different parts of the country, ascertain the religious conditions, distribute Bibles, Testaments, and other religious books and tracts in the various languages spoken. Frequently these workers organize Bible study groups, or mission Sunday schools which in a number of cases have led to the organization of permanent churches with their own pastors.

During the course of a year's labors these missionaries visited more than 32,000 families, besides conversing with thousands of individuals whom they gathered about them at the noon hour and in the evening in construction and mining camps.

It is impossible, however, to support a sufficient number of such workers with the limited funds at the board's command, so the plan of publishing weekly religious periodicals in foreign languages has been adopted and found helpful. The paper can go where the colporteur cannot. Its weekly visit keeps the immigrant informed regarding the growth of evangelical missions among the people of his own nationality. It also contains a sermon upon some evangelical theme in which the fundamental truths of the gospel are explained in a simple, effective manner. The circulation of the six periodicals published under the board's supervision is nearly 20,000. Copies are passed around from one to another and many finally find their way to friends or relatives in the homeland.

Rally Day gives the Sunday school an opportunity to contribute toward this cause.

Officers of the Board of Publication suggest that supplies for Rally Day in the Sunday schools should be ordered promptly. The special leaflet of exercises prepared for this year will be furnished without charge on application to the Philadelphia office. Rally Day will be observed by most schools the last of this month.

MINISTERIAL OBITUARY

Robert H. Craig, D. D.

Dr. Craig died Sept. 11, aged 65, at Plainfield, N. J. He was born in Ireland and for ten years was pastor of the Presbyterian church at Otisville, N. Y. He retired from active service a few years ago.

James Welch, D. D.

Dr. Welch died at Argonia, Kan., Sept. 3, near the close of his 78th year. He was the son of Rev. Johnson Welch, who died in 1837, while president of Franklin College, New Athens, Ohio. His mother in her widowhood maintained a school for young ladies in Oxford, Ohio, where she married Rev. John Steele MacCracken. Their eldest son is chancellor emeritus of New York University. James Welch graduated from Miami University in 1857, studied theology in the U. P. Seminary in Xenia, Ohio, was pastor in College Corners, Ohio, where he transferred his membership from the U. P. to the Presbyterian body and chose the West for his field of work. He labored as pastor first in Iowa, then Kansas, for nearly fifty years. He recorded the names of over 300 heads of families who entered the church by profession during his pastorates. Three sons and a daughter survive.

Obituary

Gormly—James B. Gormly, dean of the session of First Presbyterian church at Bucyrus, Ohio, died at his home in that city, Monday, Sept. 8, aged 76 years. He had been identified with this church all his life. His father, the late John A. Gormly, was one of the founders of First Presbyterian church and in 1838 was elected a ruling elder, a position which he filled for forty years, and upon his death in 1878 his son, James B. Gormly, was chosen a ruling elder in his place, a position he held to his death, thus making seventy-five years of eldership of this congregation for these two generations. James B. Gormly was a leader in religious and commercial life, esteemed and loved by all, and his death, which his pastor called his "coronation in the kingdom," removes from the church and community a most valuable figure. Mr. Gormly had been an officer in the First National Bank since its organization fifty years ago and for thirty-five years was its president.

PRESBYTERIAN TRAINING SCHOOL

of Chicago

for Christian Workers

Organized in 1908 by the Board of Church Extension of the Presbytery of Chicago

The demand for people who "know how to do it" is one of the conspicuous signs of the times.

Every trade and line of work is opening schools for training its workers.

It all means that we are awake to the need of people knowing how to do things and learning it in school instead of wasting time, and doing harm, experimenting on the public.

Shall we be less wise in our church affairs?

Don't you think it is time for us to undertake more seriously the training of church workers, other than ministers?

Directors of education, pastors' assistants, church secretaries, deaconesses, visitors—call them what you will or vary the duties as may be required—all should be trained in the School and come to the pastor ready for helpfulness.

That is part of the task of the Presbyterian Training School of Chicago. (Open this year to women only.)

If you are a prospective student, or if you want to help such a School, let us hear from you.

Around the Shop

All the boys bravely went swimming in those long-ago days, though they didn't all swim. The swimming hole was nearly two miles away, going, and something like eight coming back; so it often chanced that a group returning would meet a group faring forth from town, and the "dare" that resulted was usually effective. By the time the earliest arrivals had made two or three ineffective starts homeward, practically all the boys in the village had been accounted for.

Strange to say, there were boys who went through this experience day after day (occasions of parental tyranny excepted) who never learned to swim. They lacked the courage to "strike out." The Around-the-Shop man is ashamed to say that he was a mere "paddler and splasher" until one day, for a single instant, he felt that he was about to depart this earth and be numbered with his ancestors.

Just what sort of yell the A.-T.-S. boy let out when the big fellow picked him up and tossed him into eight feet of water he does not know. The sensation he remembers is that of exultation in discovering himself actually swimming. Long before that, he had acquired all the necessary motions; now all in an instant he had discovered the final secret of courage—the courage that we often first learn from desperation. He has always been deeply grateful to the lad who forced him to it.

Almost every one believes that a Christian family periodical is a good thing; but there are thousands of families who miss the helpfulness of such a publication because it is not brought to their notice, or because they are slow to take conclusive action. Probably you have a neighbor or acquaintance who needs a word from you, or perhaps a trial subscription by your courtesy. Once he's started, he will ever afterward swim for himself. Why not help him to take the plunge?

A Russian immigrant of seven years ago has been given the highest scholastic honors possible by the University of Chicago.

Miss Elfriede V. Nerica is the name of this latest example of rapid adaptation of foreigners to American ideals.

She typifies the immigrant of the higher intellectual sort.

That a man does not understand what you say to him does not indicate small brain power. Hundreds of our immigrants from many races are educated in their own land. Many of these newcomers appreciate sermons in their native tongue. They will not readily frequent churches were only English is spoken.

Dubuque German College and Seminary was founded to educate foreign speaking young men to be religious leaders of their countrymen in America. We shall be glad to tell you how you may assist in this work—a postal card will do. Address President C. M. Steffens, D.D., Dubuque German College and Seminary, Dubuque, Iowa.

She Was Glad of
THE PRIVILEGE OF GIVING

"In this letter you will find a draft for twenty-five dollars with which I want to pay my endowment pledge. I am glad to have had the privilege of giving this much, and I only wish it could have been more."

This letter was written from a young woman who was during the endowment campaign. She had to earn a part of her expenses. She was one of many who also had to earn their way while in college, but who gave as she did. Last year she taught school, and this draft took more than half of her first month's wages.

Is it not worth while to help such people after they have done all they can to help themselves? Payment of the present debt of the College would be the most effective help to the students.

The following is a summary statement of our indebtedness as it existed on August 1st.

Total debt not provided for in any way . . .	$14,533.35
Amount needed from August 1st to September 1st, for equipment, supplies, repairs, printing, labor, etc. (estimated)	2,000.00
Total needed by September 1, 1913	$16,533.35

May we tell you more about it?

Address, President of Huron College, Huron, South Dakota

Surveys, Efficiency Methods, Publicity for the Churches

If you desire your Church to meet its local problems in a more effective manner, have our experts make a careful diagnosis of the entire situation. The constructive program suggested as a result of the investigation will be based upon the combined experiences of specialists of national reputation.

If you wish to know more about social and religious conditions in your city or state; if special problems have been your interest, concerning which you desire more exact information, get us to make a survey for you. We can doubtless uncover conditions the existence of which you do not suspect, and which may be greatly hindering your work.

If you plan to engage in a campaign involving exhibits or general publicity, either locally or nationally, we are prepared to suggest effective methods or to direct this feature of the campaign.

Dr. Richard S. Holmes' Greatest Story—Cloth, $1.25 Net

A Book Every "Continent" Reader Should Have.

BRADFORD HORTON, MAN

"Unquestionably Dr. Holmes' greatest creation in fiction. In the pathos that occasionally shows itself, and in the seriousness that lies beneath the youthful bravado of the hero, there is the appeal of sincerity demanded of the writer who seeks to hold before us the mirror of life, material and spiritual; and the relieving humor is always wholesome and kindly. No manlier man than Richard S. Holmes ever lived; and Bradford Horton, though not intended to be in all points perfect, stands in fiction as a creation worthy of such a man."—The Continent.

NOLAN R. BEST Says:

"There are thousands to whom BRADFORD HORTON, MAN, will be very much more than a story book; it will be besides a cherished remembrancer of a very beloved and inspiring philosopher-friend whose quaint, cheery, uplooking interpretations of life so richly illuminated dark spots and irradiated bright ones."

LECTURES AND ORATIONS BY HENRY WARD BEECHER

Collected and with Introduction by Newell Dwight Hillis. Cloth, $1.20 Net.

It is fitting that one who is noted for the grace, finish and eloquence of his own addresses should choose those of his predecessor which he deems worthy to be preserved. It contains addresses not elsewhere accessible.

THE MESSAGE OF DAVID SWING TO HIS GENERATION

Addresses and Papers, together with a Study of David Swing and His Message by Newell D. Hillis. Cloth, $1.20 Net.

A collection of some of David Swing's greatest orations and addresses, mostly patriotic, none of which have before been published in book form.

THINGS THAT MATTER MOST

J. H. Jowett, D. D.

Brief devotional messages of the great preacher possessing the simplicity, the earnestness and directness which have made Dr. Jowett unfailingly helpful. Those who have come to look to him for spiritual uplift and comfort will find him here at his best. Net $1.25.

LETTERS of FATHER and SON during a COLLEGE COURSE

AT CLOSE QUARTERS

John A. Hutton, M. A.

Dr. Hutton is well known through his lectures at the Northfield Conference. The same clear reasoning, magnetism of personal conviction and charm of style which characterized the author's earlier work, "The Authority and Person of Our Lord," are to be found in this volume of his addresses. Net $1.25.

THE TEACHING OF CHRIST

G. Campbell Morgan, D. D.

A Companion Volume to "The Crises of the Christ." "One does not read far before he is amazed at the clear and logical grasp Dr. Morgan has upon divine truths. A copy of this book in the hands of our church leaders would go far toward negativing the spiritual barrenness of destrucutive criticism. Here is a work that may profitably occupy a prominent place in the minister's library."—Augsburg Teacher. Net $1.50.

How to Be a Leader

"LEADERSHIP! GIVE US LEADERSHIP!"

That's the cry from the church and social reform circles everywhere.

Progressive ideas abound on all hands these days. There is lavish talk of betterment and advance.

Yet matters jog on much as ever. The proposed advances don't happen. Betterment that all admit need of is still postponed.

What's the reason? Why is not more accomplished? You get one uniform answer. The explanation hardly varies:

"We haven't the leadership. Nobody has grip enough on the people to get them to follow him."

And yet there is no lack of men and women who want to lead. Every path of life is crowded with people trying to lead somewhere or other—and terribly disgruntled because nobody falls in line.

Where is the secret they are missing?

The power to lead is like any other power that men exercise—a price has to be paid for it.

And the principal part of the price is just what Jesus said:

"Whosoever would be first among you shall be servant of all."

One need not look far to see somebody trying to be a leader the futile way—strutting to and fro on teetering stilts of his own conceit, and declaiming that he knows precisely how to handle a certain needed piece of work. And he calls loudly for everybody to come across to him and get busy under his orders.

But does everybody answer? Indeed not. Some may listen and say it's a pretty smart lecture. But nobody moves to do anything.

The man who really does get somebody to take hold and help comes at it very differently. He is the man who has already been digging at the job himself and has begun to show results—at least in the sweat on his own forehead. When he straightens up and looks around to remark that anyhow he has found mighty good digging, someone is pretty sure to reach for a spade and jump down into the job beside him.

But nobody is going far to answer the labor call of a man who has not yet soiled his own hands with the toil he recommends.

Suppose the idea suggests itself to a layman that there ought to be a mission started in some overlooked neighborhood, or that the local Sunday school ought to be enlarged and developed so as to reach more boys and girls, or that a vigorous fight ought to be made against some social abuse or civic evil

The ordinary fashion is to propose it to one or two fellow church members and see what they say. Likely they say it would be a mighty good thing to do. But there it rests.

Then the further ordinary fashion is for the proposer to retire disgustedly to the idle company of those who complain over lack of leadership in the church or else over the church's failure to appreciate the leadership offered it. By just one or two such experiences the average church man considers himself qualified to sign a last will and testament comprised in two words: "No use."

But suppose, instead of consulting so much and getting discouraged so easily, the man with the idea of something that ought to be done should just go about doing it. Suppose, in place of looking for helpers, he should start off shouldering it all.

To be sure, he couldn't himself carry the load far; he would likely get little done so long as he worked alone. But his going at it in the spirit of a servant willing to work rather than as a boss aiming to make other people work, would make an instant difference in the attraction of the task to others. He wouldn't then be long without comrades in it.

And shortly, if the work proved worth while, he would find the tables turned. He would not be begging people to let him lead them, but people would be begging him to be their leader.

All men who have ever marched at the head of any great movement for bettering the world have come to their power through this very gateway; before they led others, they worked as servants themselves in the tasks that their hearts were on fire for.

"First . . . the servant of all."

This, however, though the prime, is not the only requisite for leadership. Two more essentials there are which can hardly be stated except in outright contradiction. The paradox, though, does not stultify the point of either. It only signifies how delicately balanced must be the poise of the man able at one and the same time to govern himself and sway others. Here is the anomaly:

A leader must always with unfailing patience adapt himself to the temper of his followers.

A leader must never for any conceivable advantage yield a whit of the ideal from which his animating purpose is drawn.

This calls for both pliability and inflexibility, and that's a vastly difficult combination. Yet only by combining them can leadership attain the joint support of patience that saves progress from wreck en route, and determination that brings it through at length to a definite and permanent effect.

The delicate sense which knows when to wait a little for favoring popular conditions and when to press on against all obstacles regardless, is the one factor in leadership that comes nearest to genius—the genius that the few only may possess.

Yet even commonplace mortals can practice this difficult adjustment with increasing success if only their faith in their cause is conviction so clear that it can wait without wavering.

Besides all this, leadership demands absolute consecration.

If there is some limit to the sacrifice one is willing to make in behalf of a certain purpose, one cannot be a leader of others toward the achievement of that purpose.

While the leader hesitates to look and measure whether the next step toward the goal in view may not carry him farther than it would be for his advantage to go, that one moment of calculation for himself will scatter his following to the four winds.

Only that leader holds his followers who never stops to ask whether he can afford to win

Finally, leadership comes in fullest measure to him who craves it least.

The man whose heart is most absorbed in anxiety to see the work done finds himself leading through sheer push of his own zeal long before he ever thinks of leadership.

In this also "he that loseth his life shall find it."

Ulster Makes Preparations for Civil War

A large part of the population of Ulster is steadily and seriously making preparations for armed conflict when the Irish home rule bill again passes, and every step preliminary to actual rebellion is being taken. A provisional government has been arranged to administer the four counties of Ulster and oppose what Sir Edward Carson calls "political and religious spoliation." A hundred thousand volunteers, it is estimated, are drilling regularly, under direction of General George L. Richardson, a veteran officer who has served with distinction in the British army. The north of Ireland, say these leaders, does not propose to be governed by a parliament located at Dublin.

These belligerent activities have thus far been ignored by the Liberal government at London, supposedly on the theory that it takes two to make a quarrel. Until the home rule bill actually becomes a law and its administration is begun, the government is seemingly willing to wait, in the hope that either the threatening storm will not materialize, or if it does break that it will be of brief duration. The Irish Unionists have heretofore refused any and all suggestions of compromise, but the Liberal and Irish Nationalist statesmen have not given up the idea of an adjustment, even though they insist that the pending bill must be repassed without alteration.

Dublin Strikes May Make New Political Lines

Strikes in Dublin during the last few days have developed so much fierceness and bitterness that they may result in forcing a new political alignment. The street car men and transport workers have battled to the death in the streets with the royal Irish constabulary and the police. British newspapers characterize the situation as "labor anarchism." The aggressive labor faction is led by a workman of experience in the steel mills of the United States, one James Larkin, and he has built up a powerful following in the ranks of the workers without any regard to the dominant political issue of home rule. Larkin's tactics are believed to be an outbreak of the same syndicalist movement—wholesale opposition to the employing class and the ultimate destruction of that class—which took strong hold in France and has made endless trouble in parts of the United States under the banner of the Industrial Workers of the World. Larkinism in Dublin is being fought by a former Nationalist member of parliament, who induced the employers to use the lockout as a weapon against the Transport Workers' union. Incidentally the labor war brought leaders of opposing political and religious camps together against the syndicalism of Larkin and his followers.

At one time concurrent strikes of busmen in London and of railroad and dock workers in Liverpool, Birmingham and other centers gave prmise of combining with the Dublin strike to make a national "walkout" of organized labor throughout the united kingdom, but by the first of the week the tension had somewhat relaxed in England, though not in Ireland, and the peril of a national strike passed away.

British Appeal for a National Fund for Sports

Great Britain failed to do as well as national pride demanded at last year's Olympic games at Stockholm, and many serious-minded Britishers want their young compatriots to make a better showing when the next world's athletic carnival is held in Berlin in 1916. To that end an earnest appeal for $500,000 has lately been made by Lord Grey, Lord Roberts, Lord Strathcona, Lord Rothschild, the Duke of Westminster and others. The fund is to be used for building running tracks throughout the united kingdom and otherwise developing and stimulating the athletic spirit. Even the king has expressed his interest. The signers of the appeal, men who have won distinction in the councils of the empire, in public affairs and some of them on the field of battle, argue that there must be full British representation at the Olympic games and it must be more creditable than it was in 1912. The young men of the country must be roused from their "pathetic lethargy." Necessarily there must be more and better organization if 500 picked competitors are to be got ready and taken to Germany. Moreover, the international contests are regarded as a means of promoting international good fellowship and an invaluable aid to the peace movement.

However, Frederic Harrison, a well known author and lecturer, protests vigorously against the proposed big fund, as does the head master of the Sherborne boys' school. They object to the gate money and spectacular advertising connected with the modern "pseudo"-Olympic games, and oppose any buying back of athletic supremacy. Warm discussion has been waged in the columns of The London Times and other dignified journals. The president of the American Olympic committee, Robert M. Thompson, writes to The Times that the American committee has not spent and will not expend a penny in preparing competitors. Test games, he says, will again be held in various centers, ending with a final competition, at which time the nation's representatives will be chosen. It is not necessary, says Mr. Thompson, for the committee to "create" an interest in athletics in America, for it already exists—it begins in the primary schools. He voices a conviction that the athletic spirit is of great good in helping to produce good citizens.

The Germans are already exerting themselves to make the international meet a signal success. Their athletic commission recently visited the United States in search of information and ideas. While here they chose a German-American champion jumper and hurdler to train the team that will represent Germany three years hence.

Turkey Will Keep Adrianople

To those who would welcome the disappearance of Ottoman power from Europe, one of the disappointing outcomes of the Balkan wars is the success of Turkey in regaining and retaining Adrianople, Kirk Kilisseh and Demotika. The frontier between Turkey and Bulgaria is to start at the mouth of the Maritza river and end north of Midia on the Black sea. The treaty was arranged last week at Constantinople, practically on terms dictated by the Ottoman government, thereby striking a severe blow at Bulgarian pride and prestige. Bulgaria found she must abandon hope of help from the great European powers, for their talk about ousting the Turk from the ancient capital of Adrianople proved to be nothing but idle bluster. So the Bulgarian peace delegates had to do the best they could, knowing that their military resources were at least temporarily exhausted and that their former allies—because of Bulgaria's conduct—were now hostile. Russia and Austria were willing to support Bulgaria to a limited extent, but on the whole it was apparent that the concert of Europe did not deem it desirable to crowd the Turk any further.

A Franco-Turkish agreement was concluded a few days ago, according to a report from Paris, for the negotiation of a Turkish loan of $140,000,000, and providing for railway concessions to French companies in Asia Minor and Syria.

Progress of the Opium Treaty

Dr. Wilbur F. Crafts of Washington, who has been spending a month at The Hague chiefly to promote the opium treaty, reports that since the close of the international opium conference in July three of the ten governments which had up to that time refused or failed to sign have added their signatures, namely Peru, Norway and Sweden, leaving only seven yet to sign—Austria-Hungary, Switzerland, Turkey, Greece, Servia, Roumania, Montenegro. Five of these are Balkan states that have been too busy of late to give attention to such matters. The only Balkan states having large commercial interests in either opium or cocaine are Turkey and Greece.

After these signatures are all in there must be ratification by forty-five governments and then a period of diplomatic correspondence as to when the treaty shall be put in force. Because of the great public revenues and greater private profits involved, says Dr. Crafts, there is sure to be need of a strong driving power of international moral sentiment to get the treaty through these stages, but meantime there should be favorable results in national laws and colonial regulations. The great powers need not wait for this treaty before they do away with the unspeakable scandal in Shanghai and other Chinese cities. The parts of the city that China controls are free from opium dens while the sale is unlimited in the foreign sections. To inform and arouse and express public sentiment all over the world in support of the antiopium movement an international opium committee was organized at The Hague, with Dr. J. G. Scheurer, M. P., as chairman. Its active members will be mostly Dutch.

Mexican Congress Opposes Huerta's Wishes

Provisional President Huerta is not finding the new Mexican Congress in pliant mood. He has been defied by the Liberal party, which, according to Mexico City reports, is opposing the influence of the Catholic party in public affairs. Huerta nominated Eduardo

Tamariz, one of the younger leaders of the Catholic party, as minister of public instruction, but by a four to one vote the deputies refused to sanction the nomination, ignoring two appeals made by Minister Gamboa.

One of the many rumors from Mexico last week, followed by a denial from Huerta, was to the effect that the provisional executive would recall General Felix Diaz from Paris and would support him for the presidency at the election set for next month. It was further rumored that Huerta himself would take the leading cabinet post under Diaz and continue to dominate the administration in everything except name. Felix Diaz, who is a nephew of the famous ex-president, was part of the cabal charged with the assassination of President Madero. Several of the constitutionalist or rebel leaders have declared that they will not participate in the coming election. The Catholic party is understood to be favorably disposed to Huerta, but its attitude toward Diaz has not been disclosed.

In his message at the opening of Congress President Huerta blamed the United States government—though not the people of the United States—for making it more difficult for him to put down the "fratricidal strife." American commentators on the message agree that Huerta is in error in thus trying to differentiate between the American government and its people. The Mexican executive also claimed that American warships must not be allowed to remain in Mexican waters longer than October 25. To this statement the New York Tribune aptly retorts that the surest way for Mexico to get our warships away from her coasts is to make it no longer necessary for them to be there to protect American interests. Out of $27,000,000 in the Mexican treasury last year nearly $25,000,000 is reported to have been spent for "pacification."

American Refugees Would Return to Mexico

More than a hundred American refugees, hurried out of the Yaqui valley of Southern Sonora by the influence of an America consul and a naval lieutenant, last week lodged a protest with the state department against being forced or led away from Mexico. They assert that there was no real reason why they should abandon their Mexican homes and property, as the danger from war has been slight, and they requested that the government either return them to Mexico or at once send to the valley a force sufficient to protect their property—valued at $1,500,000—from theft or destruction. Left to themselves the Americans would have remained. Secretary Bryan responded that the fund just appropriated by Congress could be used only to bring refugees from Mexico, not to send them back.

Roosevelt and South American Affairs

Renewed interest is directed to South American affairs in connection with the first announcement of ex-President Roosevelt's itinerary. Colonel Roosevelt will reach South America about the same time that the Panama canal is completed. He will lecture at Rio Janeiro October 22, at Sao Paulo, another important Brazilian city, October 27, and at Buenos Aires November 5. The subjects of his addresses will be "American Internationalism," "Character and Civilization," and "Democratic Ideals."

Argentina, which does not entertain the suspicion and unfriendliness toward the United States which seems to prevail in most of the Latin-American republics, has recently appropriated $300,000 for a building for its legation in Washington, thus setting an example for Uncle Sam in the matter of proper housing for diplomats.

The president of Peru has lately issued a decree announcing reductions on imports where these imports are designed to be reexported, with a view to taking commercial advantage of the opening of the Panama canal. Callao is the first large or safe port south of the canal, and it is hoped to have a growing business in imports for distribution to other South American countries after the canal is in operation. Peru is doing considerable railway building and in other ways demonstrating its progressiveness.

Trial of Governor Sulzer in Progress

Not since the impeachment trial of President Andrew Johnson in 1868 has a proceeding of this character attracted so much attention as the trial of Governor William Sulzer of New York, now in progress at Albany. Many diverse elements and conflicting interests enter into the case, so that it is not, as it was at one time hoped it would be, a clean-cut issue between Tammany and anti-Tammany forces. To be sure, Tammany influences were behind the investigation and indictment, but the governor himself had by devious conduct laid himself open to the attack precipitated by his new hostility to the New York City political organization. The charges are apparently well founded in fact, and the governor's general denial has failed to convince a public naturally inclined to sympathize with him and to distrust the Murphy "machine." The charges were brought by the house of representatives, which, through managers, is acting as prosecutor, and the jury consists of the senators and the judges of the court of appeals, with Chief Judge Cullen of that court presiding.

The legal regularity of the impeachment charge had previously been affirmed in a court ruling by Judge Hosbrouck denying the validity of a pardon granted by the governor. The state constitution provides that when impeachment is brought the governor shall cease to act until after he is tried and acquitted; in this respect differing from the federal constitution, where the mere bringing of charges does not operate to disturb a President. Rarely has a governor been impeached and this is the first time it has ever been attempted in the Empire state.

President's Currency Bill Passes House

Following after the passage of the administration tariff bill by Congress, the house of representatives last Thursday passed the currency reform bill by vote of 286 to 84. All the Democrats present except three, twenty-four Republicans, and eleven Progressives voted for the bill, which was at once sent to the senate. In the senate it is encountering the strongest kind of opposition, beginning with the committee on banking and currency to which the measure was referred. Senator Owen, the chairman of the committee, announced that he expected his committee would report the bill to the senate by October 6, but this expectation was not shared by other senators. The Republicans, and many Democrats as well, on both sides of the capitol, say they want to go home and let final action on the currency question wait until the regular session of Congress which begins in December. But the President is resolutely opposed to delay, which may mean defeat, and he is using his resources to push this legislation through the senate. The nominal Democratic majority in the senate is, however, only five, and the issue is still conjectural.

A declaration for the maintenance of the gold standard was inserted in the Owen-Glass bill as it passed the house, and this without objection on the part of Mr. Bryan, who formerly championed the cause of silver. The bill would eliminate national bank currency issued against government bonds and would substitute currency to be issued by twelve federal reserve banks, based on commercial paper. These reserve banks are to be capitalized at $5,000,000 each, which capital must be subscribed by the banks in the reserve districts. The system is to be controlled by a federal reserve board of seven members to be appointed by the president, with an advisory council of bankers. Bankers of the country have contended that the federal reserve banks should number not more than five, preferably only one, and that bankers should dominate the reserve board. The day the bill passed Secretary Bryan at Richmond told the American Institute of Banking that the proposed law was intended to make the banks exist "for the convenience and benefit of the public" rather than to serve private interest.

Federal Judge Denounces Influence of Drink

One of the few features of the disgusting Diggs-Caminetti cases in San Francisco worthy of attention and approbation was the statement made by Federal Judge Van Fleet in sentencing the two defendants last week to heavy fine and imprisonment. The offense was a violation of the Mann "white slave" law, so called, and the trials disclosed the unexpectedly sweeping scope of this drastic new statute against debauchery where interstate boundary lines are crossed. The prominence of the offenders and of their families, and the much-criticised intervention of the United States attorney general, gave the trials an importance they would not otherwise have acquired.

Judge Van Fleet commented on the laxity of social conditions and the lack of parental control which made such vicious occurrences possible, and then struck at the influences underlying the crime in these words:

"I wish to say that all through this case there is the evidence that drink had its paralyzing influence upon the morals and the minds of these men and these two young girls with whom they went on that trip to Reno. The terrible, debasing influence of the saloon and the roadhouse is too disgustingly apparent in this pitiable situation, and I make the observation here that society must pay the price for permitting the existence of these highly objectionable places."

Religious World

Congregational Trend to Presbyterianism

The National Council of Congregational Churches which meets October 22 in Kansas City promises to be in several respects the most significant assemblage that the denomination has ever known. It will in particular mark a critical point of progress in that trend of affairs which prompts many Congregationalists to say that their fellowship is rapidly turning Presbyterian in church government. This drift has been evident in different sections of the country as district associations have assumed powers of ordination and other functions that are exercised by presbyteries in the Presbyterian communion.

In the denomination at large the same disposition expresses itself in a general movement to establish denominational control over the benevolent agencies to which Congregational churches contribute—including especially the American Board of Foreign Missions, the American Missionary Association and the Congregational Home Mission Society. Under Congregational tradition these organizations have been entirely independent, governed by mass meetings of members whose voting depends upon their contributions to the several benevolent causes promoted through these agencies. But the feeling continually grows that if these societies serve the denomination, the denomination should direct their policy; and the close-knit and efficient organization of Presbyterianism is continually pointed to as a model by those who argue in this direction.

It was this feeling which occasioned, when the last National Council was meeting in Boston in 1910, the appointment of a commission of nineteen members to consider a revision of church polity. This commission will report at Kansas City, and the main feature of the deliberative sessions there will be debate on this report. Though supported by nineteen of the most eminent clerical and lay names in Congregationalism—President Frank K. Sanders being chairman and Dr. William E. Barton being secretary—the report will undoubtedly encounter strenuous opposition. The solution which it proposes for the government of the benevolent societies is regarded as rather dubious from their standpoint. The societies will be permitted to retain a membership based upon gifts of supporters and upon thir own selection, but it will be provided that this membership shall in no case exceed the total membership of the National Council. And all of these National Council delegates, making a clear majority, are to be entitled to vote in all the annual meetings of these societies. Thus the controlling power in each benevolent organization will lie in the hands of National Council delegates.

Adding New Weight to National Council

The Congregational polity report recognizes that the authority committed to the National Council by the adoption of it would require a more substantial body than the National Council has been heretofore. This necessity is covered by proposing that the Council shall meet every two years instead of every three, and that all of the delegates shall be chosen for two successive councils, with such an arrangement of terms that in any one council half the members shall hold over from the previous session and half shall be newly elected.

Even so, however, the council cannot be continuous in the exercise of its authority, and therefore provision is made for the creation of a commission on missions which shall have what is called an "advisory relation" to the executive committee of each of the societies. Of the members of this commission the council is to name a majority and the societies a minority. Under all the circumstances, however, the societies doubtless have reason to anticipate that the advice offered in this "advisory relation" is apt upon occasion to become strenuous and insistent. The final radical item in this report is the recommendation that the present office of secretary to the National Council shall be expanded to make a secretaryship for the entire denomination. It seems that the idea in view is to constitute this worker a general supervisor of Congregational interests throughout the country, and it is not surprising that some critics see in the proposal a felicitous disguise for a function practically corresponding to a bishopric. And perhaps the members of the commission themselves would not deny that the practical advantages of a bishopric in coordinating corporate action are in their mind to obtain.

There are sixteen other reports on important denominational interests formulated and ready for submission to the Kansas City council. Among these very large interest attaches to the apportionment plan which has been framed with the purpose of stimulating the benevolent gifts of Congregationalists, and likewise to the proposal which has been worked out for a more liberal measure of aid and relief to veteran ministers retired from active pastoral service—an interest which now appears to agitate all the Protestant churches alike. All in all, it is plain to see why loyal Congregationalists look to this 1913 assemblage of their clans with an interest not aroused by any prior Council.

Sam Jones's Tabernacle Meetings Revived

While the late Sam Jones, the famous southern evangelist, was in the height of his preaching career he made much of the tabernacle meetings which he held every year in his beloved home town, Cartersville, Georgia. When the end of his life drew near in 1906, Jones asked a committee of his neighbors to become responsible for the meetings, which he was anxious to have perpetuated. But dissensions occurred in the committee, and the tabernacle meetings were not carried on.

Last year, however, "Bob" Jones of Montgomery, Alabama, a young preacher who, though no relative of his distinguished namesake, adopts much the same method of evangelistic work, interested himself in reviving the Cartersville meetings and held a successful series of tabernacle services there. This year he planned for still larger things, and was successful in persuading Gipsy Smith to come from England to be the principal preacher of the August gathering. John Callahan, superintendent of the Hadley mission in New York, was also present and aided in conducting services There was a large attendance from outside Cartersville, and the perpetuation of such an annual meeting as Sam Jones had in mind seems now assured. The evangelist's widow and family were lavish in entertainment of guests who came to the assemblage.

Proposed Fraternal Order for Protestant Men

In Parkersburg, West Virginia, there has been formed, largely upon the initiative of John T. Cooper, a prominent lawyer and Presbyterian elder of that city, the first local lodge of a fraternal order conceived with the idea of creating a social and religious brotherhood which will be for Protestants of all denominations what the Knights of Columbus organization is for Roman Catholics The name chosen for the fraternity is the "Order of Christian Builders," and the presiding officer of each local lodge is to be designated as its "master builder." In deference to those Christians who are on principle opposed to secret societies, the Order of Christian Builders will impose upon its members no obligations of secrecy except with reference to certain countersigns and watchwords, which will serve to identify initiated members. The ritual is to be put into printed form and distributed to persons interested Meetings are held with only members present, but there is no hindrance to subsequent public reports of the proceedings.

Mr. Cooper states that he has no desire to cultivate among Protestants any bigoted antipathy to Catholicism, nor to awaken ill feeling between Protestant and Catholic neighbors. But he does believe that Protestantism should have among the laymen of all churches the benefit of that feeling of solidarity which Roman priests continually labor to cultivate among their people by the extension of church fraternities. Moreover, it is the conception of the founder that in an age when secret orders are making more and more appeal to young men, the church should afford to its own sons a lodge in which all the fraternal attractions of the ordinary secret order are associated with distinct Christian teaching and avowed religious influence.

No lodge of the Order of Christian Builders shall be considered to be in formal session until the Bible is opened on its altar. An applicant for initiation must state either that he is a communicant in an evangelical church, or that he "has read one of the four gospels and purposes to endeavor to act upon the principles therein contained." The latter provision opens the door to men of religious motives who are allied with the church but not members of it Upon appearing for initiation the applicant must affirm: "I am animated by a desire for greater personal power and a life of more unselfish service." The initiation ceremony comprises successive lessons in faith, obedience and prayer. These are interspersed with the singing of favorite hymns of the church and the exhibition of scenes from the life of Christ.

Back at Work

SO THE VACATION is over and most of us are back at the familiar post—lawyers in their offices, doctors with their patients, merchants in their stores, teachers with their classes, ministers in their parishes. We do not minimize the value of the vacation in itself when we say that this return with new vigor is the best part of it. Most of us go away that we may come back. We get out of the whirl that we may get back into it with a steady head. Something has gone wrong with the plan of our vacation when we come home to the old desk with a sigh, and wish the vacation need never end.

Very young clerks may be excused for saying that they work fifty weeks in the year in order to be able to have a good time for two weeks of summer, but merchants who measure their lives by the time they get away from work are not right-hearted about business. That is true for all of us. Vacation is delightful; most of us do not get enough of it; but the real value of the year is in the task to which we are called.

Just at this time our mind runs to the ministers who are back again in their parishes. We purposely do not say "their pulpits." In all the complaints of ministers for "working" during their vacations, the writers blandly assume that the hard work of a minister is his preaching, and that if he preaches during his vacation, he is not resting. The fact is that for most ministers the saving feature of their work is the pulpit end of it.

A minister leaves his heaviest burden, which he bears lovingly and willingly, when he leaves his parish and its personal and administrative demands. They make up his real work; his preaching is the inspiring phase which makes the rest of it possible. Sunday makes it possible to get through the other six days. It is a rest to get away from the familiar streets; the houses where he ought to go and has no chance to go; the societies to which he needs to give special care when time and strength seem all gone; the old vexing questions of duty which he cannot escape in the old surroundings. Let him get away from all these and carry with him some great truths on which his own soul has fed and which he loves to preach, and he will rest even if he preaches. Hence we think of the minister as back in his parish even more than in his pulpit.

We hope there has been a chance during the vacation time for a long, clear, forward look. If it has not already been taken and its results carefully noted, we venture to urge that it be made the first duty of the new season. The year needs to be seen as a whole, with pulpit and parish plans made to fit what can be foreseen—all held in readiness for abandonment if changes come unforeseen. Most men have found that while it is difficult to prepare two sermons in one week, it is fairly easy to prepare ten sermons in five weeks. Looking ahead, far planned ahead, the way grows smoother.

We are not thinking of series of sermons, but of the regular run of pulpit and parish work. There are some great themes on which every church has a right to be instructed every year. Somewhere in the year the pastor ought to find a place for them and it ought to be an appropriate and not a haphazard place. Then there are the fixed days of Christian celebration for which it is only fair to prepare the minds of the people by suitable themes. Trusting to the inspiration of the season for such themes is like trusting the inspiration of the moment for the closing paragraph of the sermon; it works havoc with the dinners of the hearers!

That long forward look will help also in making provision, frankly and unashamed, for the personal culture of the minister's own life. There are moods when a minister is almost ashamed to do anything for himself or his own soul. His reading gets narrowed to pulpit material; his prayer gets broken by parish demands; his family might as well not be, so far as his attention goes; in a word, his work gets to be everything and himself nothing—the result being that presently his work becomes irksome and straining and loses all the spring and zest it ought to have. He is an empty cistern in which the pump simply sucks air.

Along with that will come the determining of what we may call the accent of the year. It is dreary business just following the accustomed round, keeping up the old work, with no point of pressure where one means to make a definite impression with the year's work. Every year ought to be made a year of some special achievement as God gives the minister grace. The reason some churches get nothing done during the year is that nobody has anything special in mind that the church is called to accomplish.

We notice that some of our most efficient pastors have a way of calling a full and extended conference of their leaders in all branches to review their work, to plan mutual aid and to secure clear understanding of purposes, which in turn insures having some purposes on the part of leaders. We know one church whose session and sometimes all of whose officers take a whole day which they devote to prayer and planning for the year. They go out of the town in which the church is located, leaving business and professions, and get a whole day of quiet, in which they take a new grip on their work. Just this may be impracticable for many churches, but something of the sort is open to all and needed by all.

The People's Will—Who Shall Do It?

Those who demand a reversal of policies in the Board of Home Missions say they want work in the field superintended by presbyterial committees instead of by special agents. How short their memories are! They seem altogether to have forgotten how such agents came to have so much to do with the field work. Presbyterial committees were once managing it all, and then the outcry was that committees couldn't do the work right. That is what forced the management into the hands of individual officials who could give to it their whole time. Turning back now to superintendence by committee is turning back to the inefficiency about which everybody was bitterly complaining a dozen years or so ago.

It is interesting to realize that this issue in the democratic Presbyterian Church is the very issue which always tries civic democracy. It is the one problem in both places: How shall a democracy get its work done? "The people rule," we say; but how are the people going to get their will carried into effect? Everybody who looks around the world at all knows that when one strong-willed man decides that a thing must be, it is; he goes and compels it. But when a hundred men come together and decide on a thing, there is much doubt about its being accomplished.

"What's everybody's business is nobody's business" is the fashion in which the proverb sums up that doubt. The saying attributed to Spurgeon runs in homely tenor to the same meaning: "The best committee is a committee of three when one is sick and another gone away." Whenever action is highly urgent—when there's a battle to be won or a conflagration to be subdued—even the strictest democracy has to give up its town-meeting ideas and make one man's word law. Individual management—one commanding and the many obeying—is the ideal condition for getting done, quick and sure, the thing that needs to be done.

Progressive democracy, therefore, has everywhere on its hands one continuous puzzle—how to keep the people's will foremost and ruling and yet obtain the advantage of one-man executive force. The solution varies in detail with each new situation, but speaking in the large, the way to get at it is to let the people name as their agent some man sympathetic with their purposes and then give him enough power to do the work. It is simply defeating all their own desires for the people to be afraid of intrusting command to individuals. If an appointed commander doesn't command right, make him quit. But while he is commanding, let him command. And don't fray him out into several members of a committee. The committee is all right for counsel, but for bringing to pass the result, trust that to somebody who knows how and follow him through.

In opinion, thought, zeal, self-respect and mutual love Presbyterians as true Christian democrats must march abreast—none before the rest. But in work, corporate work, aggregate work, some must go before and others must follow. But those who follow are not demeaned; those who lead are not exalted. Each is simply serving in his own place, and the sole subordination is only the oft-pledged "subjection to the brethren in the Lord."

Upholding His Church by Warping History

It sounds bigoted in a Protestant to say it, but it is a thing which any impartial observer can verify by his own observation—the mind of a loyal Catholic priest does not react to the facts of life straight and level like the minds of other intelligent men. And therein lies one of the most significant lessons of practical psychology—demonstrating the ruinous result of subjecting one's thinking to the behest of somebody else, as a Catholic priest must put all his mental conclusions under advance mortgage to the pope.

From his ordination day a Roman clergyman is bound to presume that everything reflecting on the wisdom of the pope or the sanctity of the church is untrue. Pursuing that presumption, he will be found denying facts which the veriest school boy knows to be unmistakable. Nor is that conscious falsification; the spring of falsehood in it is the original consent to have one's mind bound, irrespective of reason, to a fixed proposition that tolerates no doubt. When one has submitted to that, he has forfeited the power to distinguish between truth and lies. Surely a Protestant minister, watching this utter intellectual demoralization of even the brightest and best of his Roman compeers in the ministry, must be driven to new vows of determination that nobody shall rob him of the freedom of mind wherewith the reformation set him free.

A pathetic example of all this is the venerable Archbishop Ireland of St. Paul. He is no doubt a good man, and the native mold of his mind is large. But neither the archbishop's moral character nor his mental gifts have saved him from this fatal Roman facility for believing a lie. The speech which the venerable ecclesiastic made before the Federation of Catholic Societies a few weeks ago in Milwaukee brought forth a sorry illustration. It was a magnificent speech—a patriotic speech in which Archbishop Ireland expressed the most unqualified loyalty to the American government. He asserted that the line between the spiritual authority of the church and the civic authority of the state is drawn ineffaçeably and the church cannot cross it. His words were: "If priest, bishop or pope should attempt to rule in matters civil and political, the answer is quickly made: 'Back to your own sphere of rights and duties; back to the things of God!'" And we do not doubt that the archbishop meant all he said.

But in order to make this assertion square with the fundamental Roman dogma that the church is always and everywhere the same, it was necessary for him to claim that this has always been the papal position. And what an astounding feat of vacating history the old man accomplished under that stress! He summed up the middle ages thus:

"In the states of the church the pontiff was king as well as pontiff. To his own kingdom his temporal rule was strictly limited. Beyond the frontier of his own states he claimed no civil or political power; none was allowed him by the most Catholic of nations, by the most loyal of Catholic believers."

Doesn't that make you gasp? This is seriously said by a good man concerning a line of popes including Innocent III., who assumed to depose King John of England when he rebelled against papal dictation, and after his submission released him from the sworn pledges of Magna Charta; including also Gregory VII., who forbade the subjects of Emperor Henry of Germany to pay him allegiance until the emperor had groveled in the dust at the foot of the papal throne. The good Lord deliver us from a religion to which loyalty is possible only at a cost of publicly belying historical A, B, C's.

The Most "Hopeless" Are Most Accessible

The fiction prevails with a great many Christian workers that extremely wicked men are "hardened in sin" and it is not therefore rational to hope for their conversion to religion. But those who have the courage to pierce through hard human exteriors to palpitating human hearts know that rather the opposite is true. It is those who have had long and bitter experience of sin who are most ready to respond to the good news that Jesus saves. Such as are not yet far advanced in unrighteousness are really the most impervious to gospel light and gospel grace. They are still deluded with sin's promise of advantage or pleasure and suppose that they stand to gain something by resisting Christ. But those who have gone the whole distance know the deceit of all such hopes, and carry in their own souls the keenest possible consciousness of the need of salvation.

Of course, if the church rates them unsavable, they are apt dismally to agree, and that makes a great gulf fixed between them and every Christian influence. But if the church shows any faith in the power of grace to reach their necessities, they listen anxiously and often respond joyfully. It seems to have been so with Cole Younger, one of the most desperate bandits known in all the wild history of the early West, who has just professed conversion and joined the church in Missouri. He came to the altar of the church saying pathetically: "All my life it has been one of my ambitions to be a Christian." And salvation has come to him at three score and ten because somebody had the faith to tell him that spite of all his sins Christ was still able to make him realize that "ambition."

—The question whether under a free ecclesiastical polity any "mere man" can be wise enough to assist efficiently and satisfyingly in mating congregations and pastors—the problem that Presbyterians call "vacancy and supply"—has been answered among Congregationalists by twenty years of the life of the late Dr. Charles B. Rice of Massachusetts. For that long he was secretary of the Massachusetts board of pastoral supply—which to all practical purposes meant he was the board. And he did the thing successfully—brought the right pastors to the right churches. However, it was not a system of procedure that made him his success; it was himself. And his chief fitness for the delicate task, his friends say, lay not in any remarkable diplomacy but simply in a rare sympathy which could divine beforehand the drift of human nature and make allowance for it. Besides, he knew the churches at first hand from much travel among them. It is the happiness of Presbyterians to believe that their own new agent for this work. Dr. Houston, is a man of precisely the same temper, and by that token they expect of him an equal success. Dr. Houston has a magnificent committee with him, but with work so necessarily personal. success or failure must reside in him individually.

—In the report of Cleveland's moving-picture commission there are some startling comments quoted from young children who attend the picture theaters. In answering what kind of films are most interesting, one lad of 8 wrote: "I like war and murder and burglary pictures best." Another of the same age said: "When you go to the show you see men robbing houses and you learn how to rob houses and people." But of course, grewsome as these impressions are, there is a good chance for boys so young to forget them later. It was noticeable in the answers that the older children—whether from knowledge of the condemnation it would bring on them or from the cultivation of better tastes—confess little or no drawing toward the more violent subjects of the world of "movies." Among 1,500 essays, in fact, only twenty-six expressed outright the liking for crime, and only 224 preferred war. Scenes of western life were the most popular, chosen by 421 of the young voters. But it was an encouraging sign that nearly 300 said they liked best to go to the theaters when pictures that have some connection with their geography, history or science lessons are on the screens.

—It is nothing which could be depended on as a conclusive reformatory force, but it is a fact to support a great deal of optimism, that sin as it gets worse and worse soon strikes a point so bad that even unregenerate human sense reacts. This works as a sort of automatic stop for society to keep it from running clear off the end of the track and toppling into the bottomless pit. All over the country this summer there has been such a reaction from Sabbath desecration. The frightful multiplication of fatal accidents as crowds go rushing hither and thither wildly for Sunday pleasure has furnished a host of daily papers the text for earnest editorials on the better Sunday that everybody had when it was the fashion to be quiet and go to church. These undoubtedly have had effect. In similar manner the stage of New York City has gone on degenerating in the filthiness of its themes and scenes until this fall two theaters set out acts reproduced from the city's vilest lairs of vice. That was too much; the metropolitan daily press broke out in vehement protest and now the abashed producers, threatened by the grand jury, have withdrawn both plays.

—Even supposing the Christian churches of the great cities stood at the top notch of spiritual efficiency, it is difficult to imagine how they could possibly resist the wash of those tremendous tides of population change which year after year run across the most crowded metropolitan sections. It would take an ever recurring Pentecost to repair the sudden ebbs of supporting constituency which befall them. In 115th street, Manhattan—the heart of Harlem—a religious agency of New York took a census in 1911. At that time 40 per cent of the families residing along the street were Protestant. This year another census has covered the same ground. and it is found that today only 15 per cent of the families on 115th street are Protestant. When the current runs out so swiftly in that part of New York is it any wonder that practically every evangelical church in Harlem seems in imminent peril of being stranded?

—Of course, when the boy and girl started away to college this fall, the thoughtful Christian father dropped a word of caution about holding steadfastly by the ancient faith of the church. But it is to be hoped there was no accent in his tone suggesting to the young people anxiety over new arguments and new ideas they are bound to hear at college. Many a father's exhortations in behalf of the old faith have missed their effect because they sounded timid to the boys and girls. What the young student from the Christian home should carry into college is not a feeling that father and mother fear their brand of Christianity won't stand the test of competition with modern notions, but a clear sense that father and mother are perfectly sure the children will find nowhere a better religion that what has stood them in good stead their whole lives through.

The Pastor as an Educational Engineer

BY E. MORRIS FERGUSSON

Critics of the modern movement to develop the Sunday school into a strictly organized educational system are prone to allude to champions of the idea as theorists or even faddists. But in behalf of this new Sunday school conception and endeavor there is no one more qualified to speak with authority than Dr. Fergusson, the educational superintendent of the Presbyterian Board of Sabbath School Work. And certainly not the most prejudiced of critics will be able to contend after reading this vigorous article from his pen that his ideas lack either in definiteness or practicality. On the contrary, the educational movement in the Sunday school world, though it began in idealism has, without forfeiting ideals, progressed to a very precise definition of what it wants to do and a clear consciousness of the way to do it.

THE CHURCH has an urgent present need for local educational leadership. In every congregation somebody is wanted who can bring order out of a confused situation. Mission study leaders have started classes and guilds. Young people's societies, junior societies, boys' clubs and various other separate educational and social enterprises have been launched and are trying to find their proper connection and correlation. Sunday school leaders are introducing new ideas and lesson materials faster than session and church members can receive them with intelligent comprehension. The local church needs an educational engineer—one technically and ecclesiastically competent to take charge, control movements and secure results.

The pastor has the authority and the jurisdiction needed for this service. But an engineer is not a boss, he is a constructive expert. He knows how to draw plans and order processes. To warrant the use of our metaphor, the pastor must have such technical fitness. And he must be the intelligent friend of every worker in his force. He must be able to make them all glad to have him as overseer. Then his pastoral authority will enable him to bring his technical fitness to bear. Then the church will have a real educational leader.

A real religious education is a perfectly definite and distinguishable ideal. It presupposes that the church has a Lord, a faith, a book and a commission. It presupposes also that religion can be given its proper direction by an educational process. If we desire to see the fruits of God's regenerating grace in the life of our children, it is our part to see that this educational process is adequate, and adapted to the needs of the child's soul. The need of the child is the law of the school. The church today requires a system of religious education, beginning with a reorganized and reequipped Sunday school, that shall not merely help the child religiously, but shall secure to him a good religious education in the same sense as first-class secular schools secure to him a good general education.

This need is clear. Every fresh narrative of the state of religion; every tabular conspectus of rates of progress in Sunday school membership, church membership, percentage of suspended memberships and other significant items; every sober inquiry into the prevailing standards of home religion, church attendance, and the attitude of the rising generation toward Christianity emphasizes, along with features of encouragement, other and equally distinct features of menace and retrogression. We cannot indefinitely build on the assumption that convictions and enthusiasms learned in the old home and the old church will reappear in new homes and new lives.

What practical steps, then, must a pastor take who, seeing this need, and believing in the power of an educational gospel to meet it, shall accept the task as the highest and worthiest of his ministry?

Seeing Ideals and Realizing Aims

First of all, surely, he must have a vision. If ever Moses needed the sure promises of Jehovah and the bright prospect ahead of a land flowing with milk and honey, this pastor needs to see in his mind's eye the reconstructed church school of his parish—with its various departments and classes, its curriculum and requirements, its matriculations, promotions, recognitions and activities, its outreachings and fellowships, its steady increase in equipment, its experience and efficiency, and its times of spiritual refreshing and personal dedication—a vision of feasible educational means adapted to definite spiritual ends. The murmurers and the rebellious will continue with him, to whom every fresh halt, every dry stretch of journey and every hearsay report of giants and walled cities will be proof positive that it was a great mistake to forsake the known for the unknown. But the pastor must still see in his soul's eye where he is going—and keep on.

A second element in the fitness of the educational pastor for his task is the power and disposition to recognize, appreciate and support whatever parts of the work are now being educationally done. To revert to the figure of the railroad engineer, every such part may be considered as a stretch of track already laid, available as a part of the unbroken steel thoroughfare that is soon to be. We need not a revolution, but a quiet, purposeful beginning with what is and a steady adding to it of what needs to be. But a certain amount of destructive criticism is inevitable. Besides that which is confessedly weak and of low grade, survivals will be found of former ideals—teachers who once learned what was then the accepted way, and who hold possession and resist reform. The situation is difficult; and such difficulties constitute one of the reasons why we need an educational engineer whose pastoral authority is not open to question or rivalry. To this authority, however, the wise pastor will seldom appeal; his resource will rather be to the blue prints which show exactly what construction is called for, and why this or that existing structure will not avail.

Next, it will be for this pastor to take the lead in finding, reconstructing and installing the needed materials. It is not necessary today, as it was a few years ago, to create a consecutive study course out of various disconnected and ill-adapted publications. A standard graded course has been provided, and there are other courses which are also worthy of acquaintance and consideration. These materials, however, like the standard forms of rod and girder for bridge construction, require to be chosen, readjusted and built into place according to the particular needs of the situation. No Sunday school can be graded, still less can any comprehensive plan of church education be set to work, apart from the active personal supervision of a competent educational leader who is also spiritually responsible and sympathetic.

The choice and arrangement of materials is, however, but preliminary to the work of supervising the reconstruction of the teaching and managing force. Just how this work shall be gone about, and how long it will take, none can predict or foresee. It is, however, essentially an engineering problem. The railroad engineer in like manner has on his hands the contractors, the subbosses and the laborers on one side, and the directors and officers of his road on the other. There is no difficulty in any local Sunday school which is not strictly analogous to what a trained railroad engineer would consider simply a problem for which it is his business to find the solution.

Inspiring Service and Watching Results

More congenial, perhaps, and certainly more in the line of ordinary pastoral duties, is the fifth step—the inspiration and education of the forces. For this service the pastor has undisputed right of way, in the home no less than in the pulpit. It is in his power to set a public value upon that which is educationally fine; to exhibit the early fruits of new departments and courses; to encourage the perplexed and heavy-hearted teachers; to supply what seems to be lacking in the form and spirit of this or that textbook or observance; and to stand between the young and not very judicious worker who is trying to lead and win the boys or the young folks, and a session which conscientiously feels that doings of this sort are unbecoming. He sees the end, they the means; let him impart his vision, and invent ways for working the critics in as helpers.

The end of the railroad engineer's task is attained when he turns over to the company a completed, efficient and permanent way. The test of his labors is the adequacy of this way to carry the traffic. The educational way, in like manner, consists of a straight path, through the school of the church, from infancy to maturity, for all the church's children and for others whom it may secure, leading steadily and with reasonable assurance to early acceptance and confession of Christ as Lord and Saviour, with broad and thorough Bible knowledge, a wide horizon of Christian interest and trained powers of expression and service. The pastor's last and continuing obligation is to watch this way. Whenever it fails to carry its traffic of souls for the kingdom, there is his duty and his call.

We have no right to demand that a man now in the harness, whose Christian efficiencies have been formed on other lines, shall forthwith be held responsible for the successful prosecution of this highly technical task. But our congregations now in search of pastoral service do have a right to inquire which of the men available for their call will be most likely to serve them as engineer and guide of their Sunday school forces, and to choose in accordance with their own sense of the relative importance of the educational needs.

Going to School Again

BY JOHN ALLAN BLAIR

A GROUP of us tried going to school again this past summer at Auburn Seminary, and we found the summer school of theology the real thing.

After many pilgrimages to "conferences," with their "programs," it is decidedly interesting to find a place where those in attendance are expected to work, just as they once worked in school. There is a stimulus and a joy in that which a series of addresses cannot give.

Upon reading the summer school prospectus, the first impression was one of doubt—doubt whether a return to school, after years of absence, would be wholly enjoyable. The memories revived were memories of routine and exaction, rather than of inspiration. Once at school, the experience was like escaping from a dusty highway to some cool woods road, so distinct was the impression of refreshing.

We found that our years in the pastorate had given us new points of view. We discovered that the teachers, whom our undergraduate judgment had thought apart from life, had in reality always been in touch with the things that counted. The complacent academic attitude, once thought by us to characterize those who taught us, we now perceived had been really characteristic of us who were taught.

Futhermore, we discovered new values in truth itself. Familiar studies, once thought unprofitable, were found to be vital. Experience had taken the ancient formulæ and filled them with meaning. One of the men remarked that he believed a new study of his old notebooks—filled mechanically, hastily studied for quizzes, then laid aside as useless—would find them pulsing with life. These men who taught us in our seminary courses were evidently handling living stuff, while we students, impatient to "get through," thought our studies were delaying our entrance into "practical" affairs.

With the new point of view of teachers and of truth came a fresh discovery of ourselves. We found that something had been happening to us. What these men were saying did not pass over us, as once it might have done. When they spoke of exegesis or theology or sociology, something in us responded. The years of work had not been so many steps away from these things; on the contrary, we had actually been living out theology and apologetics.

We sat at the feet of thinkers this past summer, had fellowship with them, and found to our joy that we had grown up to them—had learned to speak their language. We walked hand in hand where once we had followed afar off.

It is worth while saying that such a school offers more than instruction—it offers inspiration. It revitalizes. Every man whose work has grown too matter of fact needs a new enthusiasm. How shall this be given him in fuller measure than through a return to the atmosphere and environment of pure scholarship? Truth is often lost or obscured, when we are harassed and driven. We "cannot see the city for the houses." We need detachment and comparison, in order to see truly what it is that we are doing.

How lately have you stopped to listen to others, to learn what the world is thinking, and so "true up" your judgment? Things have been happening. Men have been working. Truth has been unfolding. Life and growth have gone on at an amazing pace since most of us left the schools. One who has just finished a period of special duty after twenty years in the pastorate exclaimed to a friend, "Man, it's a new world in these twenty years!"

Why not such a summer school in every seminary? Why may not the church urge upon her ministers frequent study periods? There are sabbatical years for teachers, why not for preachers? If a year is out of the question, why not at least two or three weeks of special work?

What Happened at New Lexington

Newspaper reports of the recent episode at New Lexington, Ohio, where it was alleged that Father Crowley had been forced to leave the village without delivering an announced address, were meager and in some respects conflicting. The Continent promptly sent a staff correspondent to discover and report the facts

JEREMIAH J. CROWLEY, formerly a priest in the Roman Catholic Church, now a lecturer against alleged evils in the church, made two addresses in the opera house at New Lexington, the county seat of Perry county, Ohio, Wednesday and Thursday evenings, September 10 and 11. Immediately following his Thursday evening lecture, and while being escorted to his boarding house by a few friends, he was made the target of eggs, thrown by young men of the village.

New Lexington is a village of 2,800 population. Practically all of it is on the top of one hill, with a few suburban dwellings and the railroad yards at the foot of the hill. Naturally, almost the entire population was on its main thoroughfare that evening, and, following the assault, there was much excitement.

Presbyterian Mayor Moves for Protection

Mayor Rudd B. Gue, who is a member of the Presbyterian church, became alarmed, fearing that the assault on Mr. Crowley would precipitate a riot of great proportions, for, following the assault, though Mr. Crowley and his friends walked quietly home, a crowd of men and boys followed and jeered them.

Mr. Crowley had been advertised to speak Friday night, and not only the mayor but a few citizens feared that Thursday night's insult might be succeeded by a much graver one, which would cause riot and possibly bloodshed. The police force of the village consists of a day and night marshal. So the mayor telegraphed the situation to Governor Cox, who ignored the request for aid, saying that the message was so unusual and informal that it had been disregarded, and that Mayor Gue had the authority to call out the members of the National Guard living in New Lexington, if needed.

Captain Paul Tague, a Catholic, is in command of the New Lexington soldiers, numbering thirty. Friday morning he assembled all his men and placed the town under martial law, though many residents of New Lexington declare this to have been unnecessary. Captain Tague closed up all the business houses and public assembly halls, including, of course, the opera house, in which the ex-priest had been advertised to speak, that evening, to men only—a lecture in which he was to have described relations of priests with women in convents.

Mr. Crowley was not in the least perturbed over Thursday night's assault, merely remarking to his friends that he had gotten off much more easily than he had thought. He obeyed the dictum of the martial law and refrained from attempting to speak. Saturday he went to Athens, expecting to speak there, but was met at the depot by the mayor and told that he could not speak, as a repetition of the scenes in New Lexington was feared in Athens.

Newspaper Reports Exaggerated

Greatly exaggerated reports of the trouble were given by some of the newspapers. One newspaper, whose New Lexington reporter is a member of St. Rose's Catholic church, announced that after the eggs had been thrown a member of Mr. Crowley's party fired a revolver at the assailants. Such a story is far from the truth, and had everybody gone home as peaceably and quietly as did Mr. Crowley and his friends few persons would have known of the trouble.

On Friday, the day after the assault, Rev. Father A. A. Cush, pastor of St. Rose's church, published the following statement:

"The aroused condition of affairs in our city is most deplorable and I regret that it became necessary to call for military assistance. I feel that the mayor took the proper stand in the matter, as the people were infuriated after the slanderous utterances of the ex-priest, Crowley, and had he been permitted to give his lecture tonight I have no doubt that there would have been bloodshed."

Captain Tague not only closed up the opera house, but placed a guard around the house in which Mr. Crowley stayed, and stationed guards at the entrance of the opera house, to see that the ex-priest did not attempt to gain admittance.

It was given out in Catholic circles that Mr. Crowley demanded a large guard for personal safety. I was told that such a statement was untrue, as Crowley, though not unduly inviting danger, had not attempted to shun it, and did not fear trying to speak

Friday night. Nor did his friends fear for him. Those with whom I talked were rather more indignant at his being prevented from filling his third engagement than at his being egged. They believe that Captain Tague should have supplied a few men from his command to aid the mayor in preserving order, and that with such precaution there would have arisen no disorder from Friday night's meeting. Crowley, it is true, was protected by the soldiers, but also he was prevented by the same soldiers from exercising free speech.

It was pointed out to me that no Protestant had any desire to get revenge for the attack on Crowley, especially in mob action, and that if anything at all were attempted, it would be only in the way of trying to find out, later on, who were the assailants, and punishing them in police court. What Crowley's backers wanted was the third speech. They would not have stirred up any trouble, they declare, and if any was stirred up it would have been on the other side.

During the daytime, while Mr. Crowley was in New Lexington, he remained quietly in his boarding house, reading or writing. At night he went as quietly and unostentatiously to the opera house, neither inviting nor fleeing possible danger. He did not conduct himself improperly on the stage, providing, of course, that what he said was the truth. His utterances were calm and dignified, and he heaped no calumny or stigma on the church itself and its membership, but talked solely of the aims of the priests, and of the menace of American civilization arising from parochial schools.

New Lexington has a parochial school, organized a little less than a year ago.

On Sunday, preceding Mr. Crowley's coming to New Lexington, Father Cush announced to his congregation that Crowley was coming, and warned his communicants that they should not go to hear the "scandalous" man, neither should they attend moving picture shows, members of his congregation declare.

Large Catholic Population in Community

Perry county is largely Catholic territory. St. Rose's church has a congregation of more than 800, and last Sunday morning, when I attended its services as a visitor, all of its seats were filled. Just west of New Lexington, and almost inside the village limits, is St. Aloysius Academy for Girls, presided over by two or three priests and several teaching sisters. At Somerset, in the same county, is a strong Catholic school at which the magazine, The Rosary, is published. There are a number of other Catholic churches in the county. New Lexington is in the center of a big gas belt and is also in a coal mining district. Many of the people of Perry county are of foreign birth, and others, notably the gas drillers, are transients.

In New Lexington there are seven Protestant churches, all of them, except the Methodist and Lutheran, being weak. I was told that the priests in the county have a control over their parishioners which is not exercised in many other places. Heretofore, at least until the establishment of the parochial school, the Protestants and Catholics have lived in as much accord as could be expected, bought and sold together, and have, to a very limited extent, intermarried, though at times the gulf between Catholicism and Protestanism has been manifested at the polls. There are three divisions in New Lexington, whenever divisions are noticeable. One is that of the Catholics. The second is of the ultra Protestants. The third is composed of Protestants who are extremely liberal in attitude toward the Catholic church.

Protestant ministers say that, although they have always been friendly to the resident priest, he has held himself aloof from them more than the differences of religion would seem to warrant. Some of them told me that he did not speak to them on the streets, though he was friendly with Protestant laymen. There does not exist in New Lexington the friendly spirit among Catholic and Protestant clergy which is often manifest in the smaller communities where all the church services are conducted in English.

Mr. Crowley was not brought to New Lexington by an organized effort of the Protestant churches. True, Protestants—three, to be exact, one of them the manager of the opera house—were responsible for his appearance and lectures there. The charge made by some Catholics that Crowley was brought in as an entering wedge in an effort to stir up strife is untrue. Many Protestants were unaware of his coming until they read the posted bills.

Few Catholics heard him. When he went to the hall to speak, however, they lined the sidewalk on both sides, and on the night of the assault a priest was seen standing just outside the door. Except for an unkindly remark now and then, there was no demonstration against the speaker until after his Thursday night lecture.

Protestants in New Lexington are not charging any particular person with the responsibility of the assault on Crowley, nor with blame for an exaggerated martial law, but they do assert that the Catholic Church, as such, must bear the burden for the assault, and that the shutting up of the opera house after the Friday night engagement had been announced was a premeditated attempt to curb free speech. Nor do they blame every Catholic, but they are sure that what occurred was sanctioned or at least winked at by influences high in the church.

It was declared to me by responsible men that the course of the militia in closing the opera house will be officially inquired into in the courts.

Also, it was pointed out to me that after Crowley's coming had been announced the Knights of Columbus held a meeting to protest against the meetings. As is necessary in all Catholic orders, a priest is spiritual adviser of the Knights, and whatever transpires in their meetings is known to him.

And now there is a bitter feeling between Catholics and Protestants in New Lexington, which has already interrupted some relations, and which will enter into all of the town's business, political and social activities. Unless different counsel prevails, Crowley's friends will take the matter into court, and in other ways there will be rancor and bitterness. A few of the Catholics and the very conservative element of the Protestants probably will get together in an effort to make peace. Of course there will be no further outbreak unless it grows out of developments not now foreseen. But there will be a smoldering fire which may break out at any time occasion offers.

Some of the Protestants say they will insist that after a time Crowley must be brought back, and that he must be permitted to give the lecture which, because of guard restrictions, he was prevented from delivering Friday night.

Armament Trust's Idea of "Patriotism"

BY WILBUR F. CRAFTS

AS MIGHT have been anticipated, the world's peace conference at The Hague found the exposure of the plots of armament manufacturers to embroil nations its most interesting theme and greatest recent encouragement. It was recognized that a worldwide publication of the scandalous impartiality with which gunmakers furnish both guns and war scares to their own country and their country's foe, to civilized and savage buyers, would make it more difficult to foment race hatreds and to continue the cruel and absurd competition in dreadnaughts.

G. H. Perris of the London Peace Society recalled the exposures in the German reichstag of the French and German armament makers, who were shown to have fomented race hatreds and jingoism between these nations to sell their goods—some Germans even holding stock in French companies and influencing French newspapers with a view of selling more guns to both countries by stirring up France against their own country. Mr. Perris contributed even more startling exposures of the British armament makers, whose chief wears decorations given by many governments, including those most likely to fight his own land.

In London no one can buy a revolver without a license showing he needs it for some proper purpose; no such limitation interferes with the "international patriotism on a cash basis" of the international armament trust. One armament company was named in which American, British, French and German citizens have combined their cash and craft to sell weapons of death all over the world. The profits are enormous—$7,500,000 dividends last year in two British companies—for competition has been almost eliminated within Britain, France and Germany among the dealers of each. Is it not so also in the United States? And international competition is disappearing slowly but surely.

Governments are in need of the help of good citizens, for they are almost coerced into increased armaments by the armament trusts and the great number of the ruling class who are stockholders. The extent of their propaganda for profits at the cost of taxes and life to the working classes is seen in that New Zealand has been frightened into conscription, and a factory of the British armament trust has been opened in Canada. We must expose this conspiracy and aid our governments to resist it.

No Need of Being So Fussy

A traveling salesman stopping at a hotel in a country town on circuit refused to use the wet and soiled crash towel in the lobby.

In response to the drummer's protest the colored porter said:

"Boss, seventy-five men have wiped deir han's on dis towel dis mornin', an' you is de first to complain!"

Some of the Boys at the Carter Junior Republic

A "GOOD CITIZEN FARM" IN THE LEHIGH VALLEY

BY W. E. BROOKS

MOST OF US who are at all interested in philanthropy have pretty well learned what a "Junior Republic" is, and what splendid service it can perform in saving life among the species known to the undiscriminating as "the bad boy."

But there are republics and republics, because there are men and men. There is, for instance, at least one such "republic" which is pronouncedly Christian. The reason is that the woman who founded it and the man who directs it are both pronouncedly Christian. So this one republic does not have divine service; it is divine service, for the glory of God and his Christ, and the uplifting of the boys for whom he died.

The Carter Junior Republic is situated at Redington in the beautiful Lehigh valley in Pennsylvania. The farm where the "citizens" earn their living rises from the river bottom up over the hills, with 180 acres of field and orchard. The buildings are complete, not numerous, but neither are the boys. About thirty at a time is all Superintendent Heberling cares to handle. But his successes are large, if his classes are small. The republic has sent out nearly 300 citizens and 90 per cent of these are classed as excellent.

It was here among these hills that William T. Carter in his young manhood used to manufacture charcoal iron, and when Mrs. Carter, a member of Second Church of Philadelphia, was planning a memorial for her husband it was to these hills she turned, and in 1898 established the second Junior Republic in the United States.

Every such institution is built up about a personality. Through all the working of the Carter Junior Republic is to be seen the personality of the superintendent, James S. Heberling. He is fat and jolly. He smiles easily, and one joys when one thinks how he spreads the contagion of laughter. He is big and full-blooded. Also—I was about to say therefore—he is patient. When a boy goes wrong or runs away, that boy's chance is not gone, if the superintendent can get hold of him, but has only begun again. Perhaps it is because he is big and knows how to laugh and therefore is patient, that one of his boys who ran away six times, and had six chances, is now head of a large agency in New York, a rising, successful business man. Perhaps the reason lies deeper; the superintendent believes in God.

The superintendent is an interesting study in heredity—Christian heredity. He comes of old Presbyterian stock, his life was planned for the Presbyterian ministry. A graduate of Lafayette, he had already marticulated at Princeton Seminary when the call to the Carter Republic came to him. And his religion is the biggest factor in his work. He recognizes constantly the fact so often forgotten by the present day social worker that there is no permanent reformation of boys or nations that is not based on regeneration. He has an idea—an old-fashioned idea—that Jesus Christ on Calvary had a personal interest in every bad boy in the world, and that those bad boys who came to the republic have to become acquainted with this idea themselves before they are fit to go out into the world as good citizens.

And he carries his idea a little further in his work—he prays and he believes. He is fond of saying "Where man's limitations end God's omnipotence begins," and you know it is not a platitude from the way he says it. And you are not surprised when he says further, "God is no respecter of persons, and certainly not of boys. He has never classed them as men do. He has never reviled them as men do, but in each one of them has so breathed his own Spirit that there is the divine in each one of them, and this better nature can prevail, concealed as it may be by the forces of heredity and environment that have dwarfed, stunted and prevented the proper development of the God-planned life."

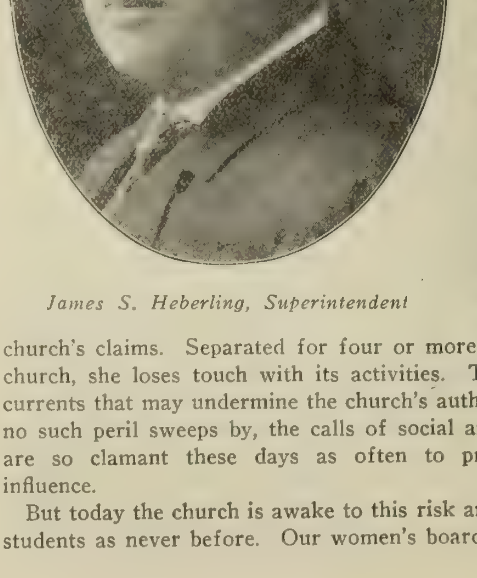
And because Mr. Heberling believes in God, and because he works with God, and because he believes no boy is safe until he has been brought to God, therefore nine-tenths of his graduates are classed excellent.

The atmosphere is Presbyterian at the school. Presbyterian forms are used in worship, Presbyterian helps in the Sunday school, and the folks who clamor for sacred ragtime in Sunday schools would have one of their favorite arguments demolished if they could see the glad enthusiasm of the "citizens" in the use of the Presbyterian Hymnal. All in all, the character of this Junior Republic in the beautiful Pennsylvania hills is unusual

Linking the College Girl to the Church

BY MRS. JOHN RUSSELL SAMPSON

THE AMERICAN college girl of the best type is the richest "heir of all the ages." No princess born in the purple is so fortunate; no princess can ever enjoy the atmosphere of freedom our girl breathes and "her steps of virgin liberty." Her splendid young body, fit vehicle for her regnant will, has been nourished and molded by every law, hygienic, athletic, gymnastic! Her mind is alert, questioning yet receptive; open to influence yet trying the spirits that whisper or command.



James S. Heberling, Superintendent

And the glorious soul of her—reverent, compassionate to human suffering, accepting responsibility, eager to help, conscientious, gracious, kind. She is the world's most potential force, the church's best asset.

Yet her college life, with all its great offerings and possibilities for good, has its dangers to the church's claims. Separated for four or more years from her home church, she loses touch with its activities. There may come cross currents that may undermine the church's authority; and even where no such peril sweeps by, the calls of social and philanthropic work are so clamant these days as often to preempt her time and influence.

But today the church is awake to this risk and reaches out for her students as never before. Our women's boards have united to send a messenger to remind our girls of the interest the church feels in them, and of the claims of the King and his work in the world. During the past year Mrs. Dwight Potter, singularly fitted for this onerous and loving task, has visited the colleges and made to the young women of our church an appeal instructive, stimulative and inspiring.

In addition in each place a "college hostess" is appointed. A hostess's work is tentative and experimental as yet, but the intention is that some lady outside the college, a member of the local church, shall have a manifest reason to take an interest in the Presbyterian students and do what she can to have them feel it.

Home Invitations Supplement Church Welcome

The Continent has asked for some account of the work begun at Bryn Mawr, as an illustration. The hostess was appointed only a little while before Christmas. A list of about ninety Presbyterians in the Bryn Mawr student body was obtained and shared with the church's pastor, whose interest, sympathy and counsels were invaluable. The matter was inaugurated with a "tea" given by two charming New York girls to introduce Mrs. McArthur Harris, representing the Philadelphia Board, and the hostess she had appointed. Both these spoke for a few minutes about loyalty and opportunity, with some pardonable sounding of the silver trumpets. About forty of the ninety were present, packed all over the floor, on that principle of the greatest contents in the smallest space, of which the college girl is pastmistress.

In the months following the ninety were invited to the home of the hostess, about a dozen at a time, for a "cup of tea at the fireside" with a cheerful blaze to emphasize the welcome. Each week two or three were invited to luncheon or dinner, very informally, that it might be as homelike as possible. And on Sundays two would be brought home from church to share the midday meal and the family Bible reading and singing round the fire. Not all invited came; for the effort was new and not fully understood, and students are busy people. But acquaintance was made with about fifty, more or less intimately. Toward spring a Bible class was begun in the Sunday school, and the lessons studied a week ahead, so that each Sunday teachers were available for vacant classes.

The Bryn Mawr pastor, Rev. Andrew Mutch, lately come to us from Scotland, and Mrs. Mutch are deeply interested in the students, and much beloved. Their weekly "day" extends to the girls a warm welcome, and two special receptions were given them at the manse. Mrs. Alba Johnson also entertains them delightfully in her beautiful home, sending vehicles to Pembroke Arch to convey them

Mr. Mutch has moreover established the associate membership, not only for the college students, but for the Presbyterians in the four local preparatory schools. This membership does not invalidate or interrupt that in the home church, but simply gives the girls the fellowship and at-home feeling while with us at Bryn Mawr. It was a very beautiful service when they were received. About a hundred were thus welcomed. This reconsecration has deepened and helped the spirituality of many a young life.

THE WAYFARER

Gettysburg Billets and Bullets

AT FIRST glance they seem like two ordinary billets of oak wood, of firewood length. Each is from a limb five or six inches thick. The ax has cut into them and revealed in the heart of each a bullet. Nothing on the outside of these branches reveals that at the heart of the oak is a lump of lead. Time has done her healing work. These limbs must have been small in 63, when the woods were beaten by a hail of deadly missiles. Millions of bullets were in the air. Tens of thousands must have lodged in the trees. Every oak on the battlefield that falls nowadays yields its crop of bullets. Most of the outward traces have vanished; even the scars have disappeared. Silently, slowly, steadily, the half century has been covering up the wounds of the battle of Gettysburg, in the hearts of the nation as in the hearts of the trees. These two billets of wood, the gift of a Gettysburg friend, now rest in the museum of the junior Wayfarers, as eloquent sermons of war and peace.

* * * * *

America is newly realizing Gettysburg. The semicentennial limned the great battlefield in vivid, heroic colors upon the nation's imagination. As a place of patriotic pilgrimage its popularity grows. If the Wayfarer were to name in order of their thrill and interest the most sacred American shrines he would write down the bridge at Concord, Independence hall in Philadelphia, Mount Vernon (with the city of Washington implied), and the "bloody angle" at Gettysburg.

To enable a young American to see these the Wayfarer would, if necessary, save the traveling money out of the clothing and ice cream account. A pilgrimage to these places is equal to a year of conventional schoolroom work. A wise father would gladly dispense with an automobile in order to put these ineffaceable memories into the minds of his family.

* * * * *

"The best of me is over at Round Top. By that few hours of my life I want to be judged. I was at Gettysburg; that is enough." So spoke a general, still living, whose statue in bronze is on the great Pennsylvania monument. He epitomized a tremendous truth. After that great experience, all else in life seems stale or small. Thoughtless persons have criticised veterans for talking overmuch about the great war. Little the critics know the power of "one crowned hour of glorious life."

Could the apostle Paul refrain from talking of his Damascus road experience? Could John forget the Apocalypse? May a participant cease to look back upon and up toward Gettysburg? Whatever the years may have brought to the old soldier, he can say with Kipling, "Thank God, I have lived!"

Complimentary thoughts about the efficiency of the government at Washington must often be in the mind of the visitor to Gettysburg. It is the best marked battlefield on earth. Every position of both sides is clearly indicated by fine bronze tablets. Often the identical cannon stand where they stood belching fire and death during those awful days. State or regimental monuments are thickly scattered over the field. Some of these are of great artistic beauty. Others have touches of peculiar human interest. The statue of John Burns, the old Gettysburg citizen who could not be kept out of the fight, is oftener inquired for by visitors than that of any general.

Of course, the high lights of Gettysburg are all centered at the "bloody angle," where still stands the stone fence over which two armies met in the clash of the most dramatic charge ever made in war. Why has no American poem been born of this event? Tennyson's "Charge of the Light Brigade" had lesser occasion. Here there was "glory enough for all," since the thrilled heart of the visitor reminds him that both the men who made and the men who met this unparalleled charge were free-born Americans.

Inside the wall which the federal forces held are two modest monuments which have provoked a great deal of discussion. Let a Virginian and a North Carolinian meet anywhere and they can hold a spirited debate upon which of their respective states went farthest into the federal lines (state pride being stronger, doubtless, in these two commonwealths than anywhere else in the union, with the possible exception of Texas). North Carolina went highest geographically; Virginia penetrated a greater number of feet beyond the stone fence. The point is a pretty one, but the Wayfarer would not subtract a line from that matchless inscription upon the North Carolina soldiers' monument at Raleigh:

> "First at Bethel,
> Farthest at Gettysburg,
> Last at Appomattox."

Rivalries now are merely academic. During the reunion the veterans called each other "Yank" and "Johnny Reb" with the greatest of good humor. In the mouth of one of the cannon at the "bloody angle" the Wayfarer found a pair of bluebirds nesting The well-marked battlefield has become a museum of peace, the common glory and admonition of a united nation. Here America had its "new birth of freedom," which today a president from the south is interpreting in larger and more contemporaneous terms. We now see Gettysburg as a fact and factor in world history; and we read the name on world maps. The almost prophetic significance of the closing words of Lincoln's Gettysburg address, which heretofore we have read only in terms of America, become plain: "A government of the people, for the people and by the people shall not perish from the earth." Was Marion Harland Right or Wrong?

Readers of The Continent Offer Views on Various Phases of the Minister's Situation

[When Marion Harland proposed to write for The Continent an article entitled "Do Protestants Favor a Celibate Clergy?" she said: "When I married I had twenty-six relatives who were Presbyterian clergymen. In nearly every branch of a large family connection there is still found 'a man to stand before the Lord.' Lacys, Hoges, Brookeses, Waddells, Haweses and Curries in the Southern and Western churches, William Marquess, dean of the School of Bible Study in New York—all are of my blood." The inspiration for her article came from a heart beating in fullest sympathy with the ministry of the Protestant church, and she will be surprised that some of her sarcastic comparisons have been construed as an attack upon them. But here is a criticism, too long for complete publication, that is addressed to The Continent by an interested reader.]

Protestant and Roman Glergy

Why did you do it—print that awful thing over the name of Marion Marland?

1. "Careful students of varied economies do not hesitate to point out the superior efficiency of Roman Catholic missionaries and to attribute their success to their celibacy." Certainly not. "Careful students of varied economies," among them the official head of Judaism, "pointed out" the superior efficiency of crucifying one man in order to save the whole nation from perishing, and selected Jesus Christ as the one in whom the greatest amount of culpability was to be found. Since the days when the celibate Xavier baptized hundreds of thousands of Asiatics, Rome's celibates have missioned with net results in progress towards self-controlled freedom almost nil. Only in eleemosynary work have Roman missionaries produced appreciable moral results, but these in a way that does not materially affect social self-control. . . . Roman celibates go down to the moral level of the sin enslaved and stay with them there, lording it over them in the names of Peter and Mary. This is true no matter how great a percentage of these celibates may in person be true to their celibacy. The Protestant missionary stays up on the level of the cultured, holy family life and of intelligent, patient political independence, and they are the leaven that is saving Japan, Korea, China, India, Africa, from wholly rotting down in the changing times forced by the movement of history upon them.

2. "A government report—'A remarkable decrease in the number of Protestant ministers graduated from the universities of the country is shown in a current report of the United States bureau of education.'" This reminds one of a proverb current in France during the wars of Napoleon—"to lie like a bulletin." The New York World Almanac for 1912 gives the number of students in special schools in the country for each year from 1902. There was a uniform increase in theological students amounting in the nine years to between 49 and 50 per cent, or about three times the per cent increase of population. According to the same almanac, not counting those churches whose ministers are about as numerous as elders in the Presbyterian Church, and among whose ministers many are in fact practically elders, in the Presbyterian Church North there was in 1910 an ordained minister to every 149 members; in the M. E. Church one minister to every 170 members; in the largest three Baptist bodies one minister to 160 members; Disciples, one to 211; M. E. South, one to 255; in total Lutheran bodies one to 259. In the Roman Church with its celibate clergy, there was one priest to every 718 members. . . . Leaving out Roman Catholic, Buddhist, Mormon and Jew statistics in that table, all other bodies average one minister to 152 members. My recollection of completer studies of similar figures for twenty years shows a slight increase of ministers in proportion to members in Protestant churches.

3. "As a body the church is determined not to maintain married men in the ministry." So far as my personal experience goes I cannot recall in all my experience a single charge which was looking for an unmarried minister, nor one where it did not seem a point in my favor that I have a wife.

4. "It has passed into a proverb that the pastor crosses the deadline at 50." The youngest man I have known put on the shelf for other reasons than sickness was 69, and he preached nearly every day for months afterwards. His failing eyes and ears deprived him of a settled charge. Judging from their looks the average of the pastors in the presbyteries I have belonged to would be little if any under 50. This point, of course, is quite apart from the subject of the article, but the writer made it in her general attack upon the Protestant ministry.

The Views of a Minister's Daughter

"Should Protestant Ministers Marry?" by Marion Harland interests me very much, as doubtless it does hundreds of Continent friends and readers. It interests me particularly because I am a minister's daughter, and as head of my father's household for the past fifteen years I feel qualified to speak on the subject of small salaries from the viewpoint of the minister's family. If I state a bit of personal experience as an example it is only because it is similar to the experiences of many others and the excuse for using it is that it is first hand information.

The ugly fact that "the average salary paid our ministers is $600 per annum," and the government report that the number seeking Protestant pulpits is decreasing, as quoted by Marion Harland, need a widespread advertisement, for these facts are too soon forgotten, however trite they may be. The ministers themselves should not be forced to ask for funds—Sustentation and Relief—and why should it not grind them? How would you like it, Mr. Grocer, Mr. Lawyer, Mr. Business Man, to be constantly begging for old age pensions, because you were not paid enough in your legitimate business to care for your old age?

My father has been pastor in the same church in a village of about 1,500 for a period covering forty years. There has never been an increase of salary. Today two of us barely live on the same means with which a family of eight formerly lived in comparative comfort. It is true there is a parsonage and no rent to pay, also a garden that supplies most of the year's vegetables. The church is not a large one, neither is there a single family in it that has to be helped, for this is not a poor community—it is a comfortable one, with a well dressed, prosperous looking congregation who enjoy many of the good things of this life and are proud of "our church." Twenty different families drive to church in automobiles, and nearly every member has a telephone. Long ago the minister had to sell his horse in order to reduce the cost of living. The parsonage barn has not had a coat of paint since it was built nearly twenty years ago. The kitchen floor has been condemned by a carpenter. I sincerely hope it will hold out through the next social! "Why don't you have a telephone?" "It's such a saving of time." "No, I couldn't get along without one." These with similar comments on the utility of the phone are frequent remarks of the parishioners who forget that $20 at the most would save the aging pastor and his daughter many a tiresome and often a useless walk. The salary cannot possibly be stretched a penny further.

The Trustees All Own Automobiles

I am afraid that I'm a very wicked person, for I'm awfully tired of listening to the treasurer at prayer meeting instruct the Lord how to run the universe, when the pastor's salary has been due for two months—it's always due, by the way, and if anyone borrows money, it's the pastor, not the church. I'm awfully tired of hearing the trustees complain of how hard it is to raise money when every one of them owns an automobile. I've begged our people to have a house committee who would personally look after the needs of the church property and not take my word for the absolutely necessary repairs. It's much easier to drift along in the old ruts. I'm tired of practicing every known economy and some that aren't known. I'm tired of being president of the missionary society because "no one else will do it." I'm tired of teaching any class in the Sunday school from the primary straight up to the old people's Bible class because the rightful teachers fail to appear and also fail to provide substitutes. In fact, I'm tired of doing the work of a pastor's assistant with never a penny for stamps.

I wonder how it would feel to have a real vacation and know you had money enough to pay the bills. I wonder how it would seem to have some of the wornout furniture replaced with new pieces, to buy some of the books you really need for studies, to entertain your own friends instead of visiting strangers and church socials because no one else in the congregation will do it. I wonder how the layman who worships without giving personal service must feel.

Getting the Better of the Blues

BY SUSIE BOUCHELLE WIGHT

"OH, I WAS AS BLUE as indigo all the week—I just stayed in and wished I could die!" I overheard a lovely looking young matron say. Her lot in life I knew had fallen in pleasant places. I wondered if she could afford the costly luxury she had indulged in—I just wondered. In her home are an adoring husband, four fine children and a pretty young sister—six individuals sure to be affected by her moods, to say nothing of friends, servants and others who must inevitably catch some of the far vibrations she set in motion when she dropped into the depths.

I know of nothing which so blights the peace and happiness of a home as a member of the family who is addicted to the blues habit. An outburst of anger frequently brings an answering clap that clears the atmosphere; sorrow comes with a sort of dignity and draws closer every tie; money loss means quick stirring about to make it up. But the blues, those awful seasons when my lady likes to sit in solitude, refusing to smile, or else weeps dejectedly into her pillow—how on earth is her family to meet the situation? It seems disrespectful to be happy and jolly when she is so plainly suffering, but from a beginning rooted in a sort of sympathy for her, that unholy gloom is likely to work itself out in the feelings of others, and by the time the original offender has found respite in reaction, a sort of endless chain is started which is fearsome to contemplate.

Blues May Mean Simply Outraged Selfishness

In this thing of having the blues, we are too likely to forget that it is as purely a matter of yielding to a base temptation as is Tim Donovan's action when he shies a dish at his wife because his breakfast does not suit him. I am quite aware that temper and moods are often ascribed to physical reasons; for that matter, however, physical effects on gastric juices and circulatory system are quite as frequently traced to the influence of disturbed emotions, so it all simmers back to the individual habit of thinking, or of not thinking.

Very likely Mr. Donovan could say that he went to bed "half seas over," and arose with "such a head on him" and nerves in such a jangle that the dish flew out of his hand before he had time to consider. But the time for him to consider was before he took the drinks. By the same token, my lady may have got into the shade of the willows before she realized where she was drifting, but the strong probability is that she set out upon her lonely pilgrimage because something went against her ideas in her home or social relations, and her retirement is quite as frank an expression of outraged selfishness as was Mr. Donovan's dish. In the beginning she had an opportunity for barring out sulky thoughts—because if they can't find standing room they can't crowd out cheerfulness. Bridget Donovan may deserve the dish, and my lord may have righteously incurred what he has to endure during his partner's disaffection; but as such grievances are private and personal in their nature, they surely should have the secluded attention that is expected in such cases, and not ruin the family peace.

"Sulky Beauty" Exists in Books Alone

Just as a matter of common sense, it may be remarked that the gain resulting from a spell of the blues is entirely out of proportion to the cost involved. After all, what does one get by it? It makes one most awfully unattractive for the time being. I have read the phrase, "the sulky beauty," but I never have seen a sulky beauty, and I don't believe we would glance twice at Venus herself if she had the dumps. Then that sheepish feeling one has when emerging from the shadows and coming shyly and timidly back into the light and sunshine of family life—what is that, and what is it that always makes one so reluctant to meet another's look at such times? I think it must be that purer and higher self which looks out through the eyes, and is frankly ashamed of that lower manifestation which has so misrepresented true being.

This brings me to the remedy I have discovered. When the point at issue involves a principle of real right and wrong, one can afford quite to ignore opposition that cannot be reasoned away, and not feel bad about doing so; but where the question is one of taste or predilection, the unfailing rule is, be yielding, and be yielding with the grace of a very sovereign of self. It is in acknowledging the claim and realizing the duty of the greatest good to the greatest number that we become as princes royal of the very household of God, and enter into our birthright of the command of our own selves.

Blues Overcome by Alignment with Good

It is not by abnegation for the sake of expediency nor even for self-development—that must ever defeat its own end, because it keeps one's thought continually on what is involved in the act of renunciation—that we arise and go to our Father. It is through the larger view gained by conspicuously aligning one's self with good—through dedicating one's whole soul, mind, strength and body to the great work of universal happiness, that we truly draw near to him. Once within the secret place of the Most High, we place ourselves above the thraldom of the small and petty—we get the better of the blues habit forever.

Verses Old and New

AUTUMN IN THE GARDEN

Now in my garden, where I sat of late
And sang fond praise of Summer's splendid state,
Comes Autumn; touches with a soft caress
The leaves; and sends them fluttering to their fate.

Alas, that death should reach those once so gay!
They fall, they whirl, they dance themselves away,
And little voices chanting in the rain
"This is the end of all things" seem to say.

But I know well that in my garden place,
When Time hath moved him on a little space,
Fresh, dear delights shall meet my waking eyes,
And my heart leap at Spring's delicious face.

Physical Ills and Poor Scholarship

Bobby was an average boy in most ways. He had average intelligence, average activity. In one way only did Bobby seem to be exceptional—he simply could not make his grades in school. "Would not," his teachers said. They all agreed that he was "smart enough," but "he's so inattentive," they hastened to add, "and careless, and he's always in some kind of mischief! If he would put the time on his books that he devotes to keeping things stirred up in the room, he'd get through all right."

Bobby's mother was greatly distressed over his failures. She talked to Bobby, she talked to the principal, she even talked to the superintendent. But Bobby kept right on failing to make his grades. Then she undertook to coach Bobby at home after school. She bought a blackboard, wrote an example on it, and they fell to work, she and Bobby. When Bobby brought the completed problem to her for approval, she saw that it was copied wrong.

"Look here, Bobby," she said, "you've put down a 5 instead of a 7, and a 6 instead of an 8. Can't you even copy correctly?"

Bobby looked despairingly first at the figures, then at his mother.

"It's always that way," he confessed. "I never do copy 'em right!"

"Why don't you copy them right, Bobby?" asked his mother severely.

"Because," explained Bobby, "when I look at the blackboard there are always two figures where there ought to be just one. And neither of 'em is very plain."

That was enough for Bobby's mother. She took Bobby to an oculist the next day. The oculist found that he was suffering from congenital near-sightedness, complicated with a serious nerve affection. He gave Bobby treatment, and fitted him with a pair of glasses. Bobby ceased to "fail."

Physical handicaps sometimes cause what seems to be mental deficiency. Glasses have restored more than one child to his place in his classes. Your boy may be inattentive simply because he is unable to see, and what he can't see naturally doesn't interest him. He may seem to be careless for the same reason; his mischievousness is perhaps the result of an energy which would be more usefully and properly employed if his eyes were normal. His restlessness may be the result of a nervous irritation caused by defective vision.

Many children unfortunately go from grade to grade branded as stupid, stubborn or impertinent when some physical is defect in handicapping them. The Chicago Tribune declares that out of 100,000 school children examined in New York City nearly 30 per cent were found to have such defective eyesight as to require spectacles. In Boston 20 per cent of all the pupils tested suffered from defective vision. In Philadelphia 354 children were discovered who could not read ordinary writing on the blackboard at a distance of twenty feet.

And it is not the eyes alone which reduce children to the ranks of the subnormal. Bobby might have had bad teeth or adenoids, either one of which would affect his general health and make him a poor student, and perhaps irritable and untractable.

The first month of the new school year is passing. If after another month has gone you find you have reason to doubt the ability of your own Bobby or Bessie to learn or to behave, don't be unduly distressed. Have your family doctor look for some underlying physical disturbance. This found and rectified, you will have reason to look for better reports from the teacher.

"Clark's Crow" Again

Irene Grosvenor Wheelock in her "Birds of California" spells the name Clarke's—with an "e"—but I was told only this year in the Sierras by no less an ornithological authority than W. Leon Dawson (author of "The Birds of Washington," "The Birds of California" [in preparation], etc.), that Mrs. Wheelock's spelling is not correct.

The bird is a white and black crow, in coloring much like our common shrike. These crows are found only in the higher elevations of the western mountains and are most abundant on the crests of the Sierra Nevadas. Their harsh cry echoes from the face of the rocky crags, where they dart to and fro. I found them particularly numerous in 1909 at Claud's Rest, in Yosemite valley (elevation 9,900 feet).

The name "nutcracker" is quite descriptive of the bird's characteristic habit of probing the cones of the nut pines for seeds or pinon nuts, which are also hulled and fed to the young.

Betty and Benjy's Christmas Work

On July 10 an unfinished story, "Betty and Benjy's Christmas Work," was printed on this page, with offers of prizes to the boys and girls who would write the best endings. Two first prizes were promised, one to the boys and the other to the girls, with a second prize and three third prizes which were open to both. The stories printed are those of the successful contestants

[SYNOPSIS OF FIRST PART: At Mrs. Bradford's suggestion Betty and Benjy and Baby Margery decided that they would try to earn money to buy Christmas presents, instead of asking father and mother to give it to them. They called themselves the Busyfeet Club, and Mrs. Bradford promised them each an apple bank to keep their earnings in, and a little account book. The next thing was to find ways to earn the money.]

FIRST PRIZE

ONLY A FEW DAYS had passed and the members of the Busyfeet Club had had no chance to earn any more money, when their father was ordered by the doctor to go to the country.

Mr. Bradford thought it necessary for Mrs. Bradford and the children to go along; so they all went to board with Mr. Bradford's brother, who lived on a large farm. Betty and Benjy were afraid this would spoil their plans for earning their Christmas money.

After arriving at the farm the Busyfeet Club spent the first few days looking at the things.

When their aunt and uncle found that they were wanting to earn some money, they found work for them to do, for there is always plenty of work on a farm. Betty's aunt had a lot of hens with little chickens, which she kept in coops out on the grass. She showed Betty how to feed and water them, and this had to be done morning, noon and night. Betty got pretty tired, but she did not mind it very much, as she was earning her Christmas money. For this she got paid well. And there were many other little things she could do, such as pick up apples, carry water to the big chickens and pull weeds.

Benjy could do many things, too. When the men were done milking in the morning, he would take Rover and drive the cows to the field. Sometimes he herded them in a field where there was another crop growing, and no fence between. He also rode the horse to haul up the hay. One end of the rope was fastened to a large hay fork. The rope ran over pulleys. To the other end of the rope the horse was hitched. After the men got a big forkful on, Benjy rode the horse far enough to pull the forkful of hay up into the mow, then one of the men jerked it off with a smaller rope. For this he got paid well, because when Benjy was not there to do it one of the men had to do it.

Baby Margery made her money by carrying her father drinks of water, and sometimes getting some wood to save her aunt steps.

Mr. Bradford soon got well and was able to go back to his work.

Each member of the Busyfeet Club took home a nice little sum of money in their banks, but the twins added to theirs by writing a vacation story, which they sent to The Continent and which won the first prize.

FIRST PRIZE

DAYS PASSED INTO WEEKS, and the Busyfeet Club was without work. Benjy made some money with his camera, and Betty sewed and ran errands, but altogether the nickels, dimes and pennies came rather slowly. After a time they began to lose their interest in the Busyfeet Club, but one day they began again with renewed vigor; it was Benjy that started it.

"Betty," he said, "has Margery earned anything for our club?"

"Have you, baby?"

"Yes," answered Margery indignantly.

"How much?"

"Two cents."

The twins laughed.

"Betty," said Benjy, "tomorrow is the Fourth of July, and there is going to be a baby show. Let's dress Margery up and take her down and see if she won't win a prize. Here is a circular. It says, 'First prize, $10; second prize, $6; third prize, $4.'"

"Fine!" agreed Betty. "Won't mamma be surprised if she should win!"

It never occurred to the twins that mamma might object.

The next day the twins asked permission to go down to the grounds a little early and take baby with them. Their folks consented, and off they went. Soon after arriving there they took Margery up on the stand. The hall was full.

The judges looked the babies over, and after what seemed a long time to the children, a judge said, "The prettiest baby is Nannie Williams, $10; second, Margery Bradford, $6; third, Virginia Willis, $4."

Benjy picked Margery up and started out, but the hall was full and everybody wanted to see "that sweet little Bradford baby," as Betty heard one woman say. The baby was ready to cry and Benjy was at his wits' end, when he saw Mr. Bradford.

"Oh, papa," cried Benjy, "she won second——"

But Mr. Bradford had picked up Margery and was hurrying out. When they got outside he asked Benjy to explain. Benjy told the whole story, and when he had finished there was a faint twinkle in his father's eyes as he said, "It's all right this time, children, but don't do anything of the kind again without asking mamma and papa first."

Benjy hung his head, but baby, who had no scruples, said happily, "I earned the most money, didn't I?"

SECOND PRIZE

BETTY, BENJY AND MARGERY were kept busy hunting little taks to do. Betty got a penny for every hole she darned. Benjy kept up his photography. Baby Margery put the napkins away and set back the chairs after each meal.

Even with all these things to do the banks did not grow very fast. Sometimes Benjy's pictures didn't turn out well, and then Betty did get so tired of staying in the house when she was darning the stockings. Little Margery, too, often forgot to set back the chairs when her friend Helen asked her to come outdoors and play. So Mrs. Bradford said that if any of them thought of something that they could all do outdoors she would gladly let them do it.

She was surprised one day when Benjy suddenly exclaimed: "I've got it!"

"Got what, Benjy?" asked Betty.

"A plan," he answered.

"Well, what is it?" their mother asked.

"The plan is how to make the rest of our Christmas money. When I was coming home from school today there were so many leaves falling, and I thought it would be nice for Betty and me to keep them raked off our yard and then save them in the woodshed, and take them to the woods when we have our nut-hunting picnic and make a bonfire of them."

"That's just grand, Benjy! How can you think of such nice things?" cried Betty.

"Yes, Benjy, it is a very good plan, but you know I said that all of you should be in it," Mrs. Bradford said.

"So you did, mother," Benjy answered sadly.

"Why, Margery can take the leaves to the woodshed for us," said thoughtful Betty.

"So she can, dear!" mother exclaimed.

When winter came Benjy shoveled the snow from the walks while Betty followed after him, sweeping away what he did not get. It was too cold for Baby Margery to stay out long, so she got her father's slippers and put them on the hearth to warm; then she found his paper and put it on the table for him.

The most fun of all came a week before Christmas when the banks were opened. Mother had quietly slipped a doller extra in each bank because the children had worked so hard. Betty had $6.50, Benjy had $6.90; but he gave Betty 20 cents so they would have the same amount. Baby Margery had $3.69. They had a grand time selecting the gifts, and it was awfully nice to feel that they had earned the money all themselves.

THIRD PRIZE

NEXT WEDNESDAY Benjy came running in with a handful of pennies. "See what I've earned!" he shouted.

"Let's see!"

"Let I see, too!"

"There's forty-nine pennies, and I worked hard to earn them. A lady wanted to get a train in an awful hurry, and said, 'Youngster, carry this suitcase and I'll give you a dime.' And then I went to old Mr. Squire's and pulled weeds. He gave me 35 cents and I got four by trading marbles."

Mother looked pleased, but Betty cried, because even baby had earned more money than she, by picking up her blocks. But her turn came.

When generous Uncle Richard came he asked the children what they wanted.

"I want a good big bushel of chocolates," said Benjy.

"Div me fome hairpins, uncle."

Betty whispered, "Please give me a dollar, because I'm saving money, and I've only got a little."

Uncle looked thoughtful, then laughed. Taking Benjy down town, he went to the park, the theater, and several stores. But when he was home again he said, "Betty, here's $2, the dollar you asked for, and the one that Benjy spent in shows, candy, popcorn, trolley rides and 'movies.' Yours was the better earned. because self-denial is hardest."

Later Mrs. Wood offered the children a dime for every toad they caught for her garden. Imagine the time they had! The toads came out only at night. Baby was afraid, Benjy hated warts, but Betty persevered. Every time they caught one Mrs. Wood must see it, and the frightened reptile went over the piano, into the flour, up the furniture and into mouse holes before they caught him again.

Betty earned rewards in school, and Benjy ran errands and cut wood. Baby picked up pins and kept father's papers neat.

At Christmas altogether they had nearly $16

"We did well," said Benjy.

"'Ery 'ell," declared Baby Margery.

THIRD PRIZE

THE NEXT MORNING Benjy and Betty helped their mother with the work in order that she might go with them to make their purchases. Betty, with part of her allowance, bought a bank and an account book with a blue cover. Benjy, with part of his dollar, bought some printing paper and a notebook with a red cover; while Mrs. Bradford bought what was necessary for Margery.

That afternoon the children began to work out their plan.

Betty went to their friends who had small children and asked if she might entertain the little ones on her lawn one afternoon a week, promising to take good care of them and not to have more than three at a time.

The mothers gladly consented and agreed to pay 10 cents apiece.

The next forenoon was an important one for the Busyfeet Club. Little chairs were placed on the lawn and everything was arranged for the visitors. By 2 o'clock three children dressed in gingham and ready for a romp came through the gate of the Bradfords' home. Benjy, Betty and Margery were waiting for them. What a fine time they had, rolling on the grass, hiding behind bushes with Margery or sitting on the little chairs while Benjy told them a story! Sally came out with a plate of fresh cookies and this was a treat they had not expected. Afterwards Benjy and Betty took them to the flower garden and while Betty placed them among the flowers, Benjy adjusted the camera. (Continued on page 1344)

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

October 5, 1913—Moses's Cry for Help

Everyday View of the Lesson

By J. L. Scott

Lesson Text, Num. 11:4-33. Golden Text, James 5:16: The supplication of a righteous man availeth much in its working.

The first always remains first. Nothing subsequent ever equals it in influence or in position. That is why youth is the most important period of life. It shapes and colors all that succeeds it.

Israel today begins its march toward Canaan. Previous to this it has been making ready for the journey. Nearly a whole year was spent at Sinai. The time was well invested. Moses had been engaged in perfecting his organization. The people were no longer an indiscriminate multitude—they had become a nation. They had a code of laws, trials and penalties adapted to the times and place. A wise preparation is usually indispensable to success.

Moses Comes Into Prominent Position Through Years of Preparation

Men are not born full grown and no one ever gains anything by trying to push beyond his possibilities. That which is true of one is equally true of all. Moses was a cedar of slow growth. He would have anticipated the exodus by forty years, but the grain was still unripe. And yet there must be a beginning. Israel was going to Canaan, and for every journey there must be some one to take the lead. Moses acted under instructions, but he was no automaton. More than once he was thrown back upon himself and compelled to depend on his own judgment. Sometimes he acted wisely. Then again he had reason to regret his course. Every man is compelled at times to do the same thing. We live up to the highest dictates of our own conscience, and still we fail.

But no one can afford to sit down and count his failures in advance. The longest journey is made up of successive steps. No one is required to succeed always. We are all entitled to a certain number of failures, but our first duty is to begin. The man who makes no mistakes has never really begun and will achieve no triumphs.

Mixed Multitude Accompanying Israel Stirs Nation to Discontent

The journey was to be taken in response to signals. The trumpet sounded and the ark moved forward. It was a call to war. For the first time was heard the battle cry, so oft repeated since: "Rise up, O Jehovah, and let thine enemies be scattered; and let them that hate thee flee before thee." But Israel was accompanied by a "mixed multitude," just as the church of God is today. They came with the children of Israel from Egypt, and hung upon their borders like the camp followers of a great army. This element is never absent. If a church attempts anything worthy of its name, they are the first to cry out against it. As firebrands, they scatter themselves among the congregation until others who should know better are affected by them.

The children of Israel became discontented and began to recall the good old days when as serfs they served a foreign king. Their appetites were appealed to and as usual began to complain. Manna they had in abundance, but appetite is a god that demands the most varied service, and all Israel cried as one man: "Who shall give us flesh to eat?" Almost anything is good enough to form the basis of complaint. They remembered the fish of which they ate in Egypt, and the cucumbers, and the melons, and the leeks, and the onions, and the garlic; all of which tasted and smelled even better in reminiscence than they had in reality. Manna cost nothing, but unworked for bread always lacks savor.

Moses heard their complaints and, broken in spirit, he went to God like a true man. There come times in the lives of most men when Providence seems to be unfair. Moses felt that to be the case when he went to God and laid his troubles at his feet. In the first place it seemed ingenuous at least. Those people were not his children that he should be responsible for every want or wish. The burden was too great, and if God insisted upon his bearing it then let him take his life. Complaining has its uses. It is an outlet to a heart breaking under its own weight. Our friends stand by and urge us to be cheerful. They tell us that the Lord loveth whom he chasteneth and it becomes us to be thankful for the very strokes of his hand. It is easy to look on, but not so easy to bear the burden. Let those jest at scars that never felt a wound.

Elders Ordained to Further the Work of Moses

Moses felt all he said, and God as a Father sought to relieve him. Israel was to remain as it was, but there were seventy good men capable of sharing his cares. By their cooperation the lawgiver multiplied himself seventy times. Nothing was neglected and the people became part of their own government. Organization saved the day. Moses was benefited and seventy men received a baptism of which before they had not known. A living eldership is a living church. A minister may preach with the spirit and power of Paul, he may distribute his fire and fervor among his people, but he cannot distribute himself.

The elders were ordained for that very purpose. No society or brotherhood can fill their places. These elders had served before, but not under the supervision of God. The spirit of Moses had become theirs. The prayer for flesh was granted and many indulged to their destruction. But the people were learning. They had begun a journey toward better things and every day added its own lesson. The experience was a transcript of life.

The Lesson Verse by Verse

By Hermon D. Jenkins

Analysis—It takes more than freedom to create a state. The best of men are sometimes unduly burdened by the murmuring of the least worthy. It is unwise to seek to know all the suffering or complaining we cannot relieve. The anwers to our unreasonable prayers oft produce our misfortunes.

The year which had intervened since their leaving Egypt had been a year of activity, of education, of confederation. The people had, under the guidance of Moses, formed an organized if nomadic state. They were no longer a horde, but were now an army, a nation prepared for aggressive movements (Ex. 18:19-26). Their civil welfare was under the care of a large council, a senate we might call it, composed of seventy venerable men (Ex. 24:1). They had ordained priests and set up the ordinances of religion (Num. 3-4). The tabernacle had been erected, the center of their life as of their camp (Num. 7:1). But while their great leader was thus preparing for their future, malcontents were busy exciting the people against him. Moses's father-in-law, a man of great sagacity who had been of marked service to them in the past (Ex. 18:17-26), had withdrawn to his mountain home (Ex. 18:27), and now Moses's brother-in-law expressed his intention to leave also, but was persuaded by Moses (ch. 10:29) to remain, as appears from the mention of his descendants in the later annals of the people (Judges 4:11).

Mutinous Spirit Hinders Onward March of Children of Israel

But when everything seemed most favorable for the resumption of their march, a mutinous spirit broke out among the people. A fire ravaged the mountains and destroyed the remoter parts of the camp (ch. 11:1). This fire was interpreted by the people as a judgment from heaven, doubtless from its affecting most seriously the leaders of the revolt. The people appealed to Moses; Moses appealed to God—and the conflagration was quickly stayed.

But the spirit of rebellion was never wholly quenched. The discontent soon manifested itself in a protest against the monotony of their fare (ch. 11:4-6). Taking the world by and large, men complain more over the quality of their food than over its quantity.

Verse 10—The word which is here translated "weep" has also the signification to "lament," and probably here may mean to "sulk," though, it is true, primitive races give way to real tears more easily that do those long taught self-restraint. The meaning of the verse is that the people showed they were vexed, and Moses gave way to personal vexation. In the pioneer days of our Middle West more than one minister saw his people impoverished by the clouds of grasshoppers which ate every green thing down to the ground, and when he listened to the half-sorrowful, half-angry lamentations of his people, he almost felt that they had been hardly dealt with. He felt their distress so keenly he was in no mood to preach—or practice—patience.

Verse 1—Moses now goes before God, not so much to pray as to protest. His passion prompts him to say, "I am not responsible for this suffering. Did I call these multitudes into life? No. If not, why am I made responsible for their wants?" He had only obeyed the divine call, but at every step some new calamity smote them. He did not say, but he evidently was ready to say, "If Jehovah insisted on my leading this people here, why does he not take better care of them? He is their father, not I. What have I done [would be his demand] that I must bear the burden of a distress for which I am not responsible and which I cannot relieve?" Like the psalmist (Ps. 73:2), his own steps had well nigh slipped. Any minister who has passed through a great drought, a grasshopper plague or statewide flood knows something of how Moses felt.

Verses 12-15—Thus the great leader shows to us his weaker side. He runs on, needlessly piling up question after question and adding only one prayer, that he might die and be oblivious to it all. Today we would say he was on the verge of nervous prostration. And perhaps he was. At any rate, God dealt kindly with him, as one does with a hurt child who is for the time too hysterical to be reasoned with.

Jehovah Relieves Moses by Making Others Share His Leadership

Verses 16-17—We may not understand all that this very brief record implies, but it may remind the reader of a recent book, called "Modern Philanthropy," in which we have an account of the 6,000 begging letters Mrs. Harriman received in two years. The demands made upon her charity aggregated in that time a great deal over $200,000,000. Her only relief was in turning the correspondence over to an organized society of specialists to invesgate, give advice and, where possible and wise, offer relief. Although it was evident that a large part of the appeals were made in the wrong spirit and that many of them came from persons it would be impossible to satisfy or permanently to benefit, the hearing of their innumerable and interminable complaints made her life a burden. It was only after she had distributed the burden by asking cooperation that she could recover her normal tone.

Answered Prayer Not Always Productive of Good to Petitioner

Verse 18—All travelers in the Sinai peninsula tell us that migratory birds still pass over it or through it in incredible numbers. In times long past such flights must have been more common than now, as the wanton destruction of woodlands has swept away their natural cover and dried up the haunts of water fowl, while a merciless pursuit with modern weapons of the chase has practically exterminated birds that were once common. In his early life the writer has seen overhead clouds of passenger pigeons which would have fed an army. Only 100 years ago shad which now retail at a dollar apiece were caught by the wagon load and scattered over the fields of eastern farmers as their cheapest manure.

A flight of quails, or some other migratory bird, for the names used in Hebrew are difficult to run down, supplied the camp of the murmuring Israelites to repletion. Indeed, the abundance possibly bred a pestilence, a natural punishment for their ingratitude. They recognized their folly and their sin in demanding from God, with angry and mutinous spirit, what they had no right to claim. So more than one man has in later life lamented the affluence he had so eagerly sought of God, but which proved the ruin of his children.

BY EDWARD ARTHUR WICHER

Week Beginning September 28, 1913

FOREIGN MISSION TOPIC—Philippine islands.

The Philippine archipelago has a total extent from north to south of something more than 1,150 miles. Its breadth from east to west is nearly 700 miles. The islands have a total area of 115,000 square miles and a population of 9,000,000.

The Presbyterian Church in the United States of America has assumed responsibility for the evangelization of fourteen provinces, with a population of 3,000,000 souls. In the prosecution of this work there are now engaged forty-seven missionaries, including the wives of missionaries. These workers are located at ten different stations, situated in important centers of population. The number of church members is now more than 13,000.

Our first missionary to the islands was J. B. Rodgers, D. D., who was sent out in 1899 to inaugurate the work in Manila. Dr. Rodgers says: 'The first years of the life of the Philippines mission of our church were characterized by remarkable progress as far as outward signs go. For several years the numbers reported to the board doubled yearly. The last seven years, however, have seen no such increase in numbers. The old restless desire for something better, at times scarcely distinguishable from the desire for something different, has diminished almost to the point of vanishing. There is, none the less, progress—in fact, the advance is just as real, for the churches have become 'consolidated'; that is, to use the Portuguese expression, become solid. Depth rather than breadth has characterized the work of these last years. It has been a most genuine advance, for the organization of the congregations has become a reality and they are managing their own affairs with courage and skill in many places."

When our mission began its work its first and most imperative need was the translation of the Scriptures into the dialects of the people, and their publication in inexpensive forms. The greatest single work of the past decade has been the meeting of this need. In the old Spanish day Bibles were too expensive for ordinary people to purchase, and there were very few copies in private possession. Even when a man did own a copy he had to procure a special license before he was permitted to read it. It was the hope of American residents in the island that with the displacement of the Spanish rule by the American, the American Christians of the Roman Church would take pains to substitute their own authorized versions of the Scriptures for the old ones; but no such reform has been effected. The followers of the Roman Church still use the "Mahal na Pasion," a blank verse paraphrase of the chief events of the gospel story, to which is added an account of the creation of the world. This book is recited and sung in thousands of homes all over the islands, but while it is better than nothing, its history is distorted and its teaching is generally erroneous.

The work of supplying the Bible in different dialects has been done by Protestant Christians, chiefly through the instrumentality of the two great Bible societies, the British and Foreign, and the American. The Bible societies and the mission boards have supplemented and assisted one another at every point. The missionaries have performed the chief part of the work of translation; and the colporteurs have disseminated broadcast the Word.

The work of ministering to the afflicted bodies of the people has been an important part of our mission from its inception. There are now five hospitals sustained by our board, and it has often been through the ministrations to the body that the soul has been touched and quickened into new life.

Dr. J. Andrew Hall, the pioneer medical missionary in the Philippines, has served the station of Iloilo since 1899. In 1901 he opened a small hospital in a bamboo building, with eight beds and a dispensary. He treated about 5,000 patients annually, until 1905, when a new hospital, built of wood, with accommodations for thirty patients, was erected on the mission premises. In 1911 there were added thirty-five more beds, in an annex constructed of reenforced concrete. Now the institution every year treats upwards of 15,000 patients and performs over 500 major operations. The patients come from all parts of the country round about and even from islands hundreds of miles away. Of the sixty-five beds which the hospital contains, fifty-two are for the poor. Dr. Hall's hospital is representative of the medical work of the islands.

The need for trained nurses is today second only to the need for more physicians. It is with a view to the supply of this need that the nurses' training school has been established. Six young Filipino women have thus far been graduated, three of whom are now in the service of the hospital. Sixteen pupil nurses are employed.

But perhaps the most distinctive feature of our ministry to the Philippines today is the Silliman Institute, located at Dumaguete, the most central part of the southern islands. From this point it reaches and moves the life of the whole of the southern provinces. It is most favorably situated in a healthful, beautiful town. The people here value education for their children and respond enthusiastically to the appeal of the college. Last year 613 students were enrolled and 200 more were turned away for lack of room. Last year seventy-two young men confessed their faith in Christ; there were forty young men on an average, who every Sunday went out to hold street meetings in this and the neighboring towns. This is the one college in the islands where the Bible is a textbook. All the instruction is given in English, which is the one language understood by all the pupils without distinction of native dialect, race or tribe. The academic department gives full courses terminating in the B. A. degree, according to the standard of the American government. Besides this there are departments of industrial training, agriculture and religious instruction. The college has received the heartiest indorsement of the government. Those students of Silliman who expect to enter the ministry will complete their courses of study at Ellinwood Seminary in Manila. All other graduates who are looking forward to the learned professions will continue their studies in the University of the Philippines at Manila.

To these people who have been dominated by superstition masquerading in the guise of Christianity, by priestcraft and vice making pretensions to an exclusive authority exercised in the name of the Saviour, our modern missions offer a religion of sacrifice, redemption and compassion. They bring the sinful soul face to face with the pure and loving Saviour.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SERVICE

COMMENTS IN BRIEF BY WILLIAM T. ELLIS

October 5, 1913

TEAM WORK WINS

TOPIC—The ideal Christian. X. His cooperation with others. Col. 4:1-18.

The business of being a hermit, a pioneer or a prophet in the wilderness used to be easier than it is now. Individualism grows more difficult every year. Every personality is linked up with a multitude of interests. Living is becoming more and more complicated and everybody's dependence upon a complex social system is steadily increasing. The tendency of all this is to conventionalize life. It is not easy to be one's self. Like the standard parts of automobiles, human beings show a tendency to become standardized fragments of a great social machine. The trend of the times is forcing us to live and work more closely with our fellow men. This timely topic calls upon us to consider how we may cooperate with our fellows.

Life's loads are lightened by sharing the labor.

Somewhere a woman was given fame by being described on her tombstone thus: "She was so pleasant to live with." That test probes the depths of character. Are we easy to live with? The ability to get along serenely with other people is more desirable than some of the ornate social graces. It bespeaks a wise philosophy or else a fine natural disposition. There is real point to the fact that Jesus was surrounded by fellow workers. He was the sort of man who knew how to work with men as well as for them.

All who labor together with Christ find themselves fellow laborers with a goodly company of his other friends. To walk Christ's way is to fellowship with many kinds of folks.

One of the intimations of the wise Scriptural epigram, "It is good for a man to bear the yoke in his youth," is that he thereby learns the art of yoke-fellowship. He becomes trained to the service with others. And since nobody can go through the world alone, this art of taking and giving assistance is fundamental.

National elections, which often determine grave political policies of historic importance, are the work of the many, the cooperation of millions of men for a common end. In like fashion, it needs the concerted activity of the whole church to deal with the grave social and moral problems of the hour. As we look about us at tremendous tasks which await both leaders and workers, we see that our day calls for efficiency in Christian cooperation. If the work is not to fall apart, the workers must stand together.

City life conceals a person's fundamental qualities. A man may seem wholly fine when met only in social relationships amid our complex civilization. But when we go camping with a man we quickly discover his real nature. Does he do his share of the camp chores? When out fishing, does he bear a fair half of the rowing? Does somebody else have to waken him in the morning, or is he one who assumes his part of the responsibility of life in the woods? No experienced camper would ever go twice with a man who does not know how to work in cooperation with others.

To set ten men to work, and to help them keep at it, is more useful than to do ten men's work.

Marriage is going to shipwreck in many modern instances because the man and the woman have not the fundamental idea of cooperation. When a woman marries merely to find a home and a provider, thus saving herself the necessity for work, she is likely to find the marriage altar but the first station on the rocky road to divorce. So also with the man whose object in marriage is equally selfish. But when two sincere and unselfish persons, dominated by a spirit of true love, undertake married life together, each eager to bear a share of the burdens and responsibilities entailed, then a happy home is certain. Cooperation is the master key to success in marriage as in most of the other of life's relationships.

You cannot work with others if you are thinking about your own honor, or whether you are doing more than your fair share of the work; think about the task.—Amos R. Wells.

Team work wins. "All star" combinations, in athletics and in dramatics, seldom last long or go far. Where the worker is thinking of himself rather than of the work, both he and it are sure to suffer. It takes qualities of greatness to mold one's self into the great objective, working with all who will work for the common end.

MISSIONARY WORK

Confucianism Reviving in China

A disturbing report comes from China to the effect that Yuan Shih Kai, the provisional president of the new republic, has promulgated an edict announcing that "all colleges, schools and public are hereby ordered to revive the daily sacrificial ceremony of Confucius." This alludes to the obeisance which, until a few years ago, all teachers and students in the Chinese governmental schools were required to make each day before the tablet of China's primitive philosopher and ethical teacher. Chinese Christians of their own accord long since came to the conclusion that this ceremony, although it is more an act of reverence than of worship—including apparently no thought of petition for supernatural aid—amounted nevertheless to idolatry and was entirely inconsistent with the Christian life and profession. The missionaries have always respected this Chinese opinion and have not sought to change it, although some of them think that the scruple is overdrawn.

At all events, as long as the rule was enforced, it operated to exclude Christian teachers from any educational service under the Chinese government. It was therefore one of the first and most serious obstacles with which the late Chinese monarchy collided when, under the reforming influence of the last decade, it began to turn to Western learning. A very great percentage of young Chinamen prepared to teach Western science were Christians, and the authorities could not obtain enough competent professors of the new learning to man their colleges without employing Christians.

The difficulty was met in characteristic Chinese fashion, by according to the memory of Confucius a great honor—the advancement of his name to the first celestial rank. This operated, under Chinese law, to transfer all ceremonials in his honor to the consecrated temples, and so suspended the formal obeisance made before the tablets in the schools. With the situation thus relieved the government's teaching staffs quickly filled up with competent young Christian graduates of American universities or of the mission schools in China. And without question a very considerable part of the strength of the revolution which soon succeeded was due to the influence of these men from the body of Chinese students.

If now, however, Yuan Shih Kai's reactionary decree is as drastic as it appears, a very severe crisis will at once be precipitated in China's educational field. It would be incredible that such a man as Educational Commissioner Chung in Kwantung province would submit to the revival of such superstition in the schools under his care. And certainly Yuan's decree contrasts strongly in any case with the recent action of his government in appealing for the prayer of Chinese Christians in behalf of the new republic.

It is surmised by some that Yuan is preparing the way to proclaim Kung-Ling of Shantung—who in the present generation represents the direct line of descent from Confucius—the emperor of China, believing that the name of the Confucian family will prove the most cogent watchword by which to unite the Chinese nation in these troublous times.

A Pamphlet You Can't Help Reading

The Home Board has made an exceedingly alluring bid for public interest in Home Mission Week, which is to be celebrated November 16 to 23, by putting forth an attractive three color pamphlet entitled "New Americans for a New America." If anybody can see the pamphlet without wanting to get better acquainted with the beautiful typography of its pages, or if anybody can read it without acquiring lively interest in the forthcoming Home Mission Week, a prior condition of total indifference to home mission problems is to be necessarily inferred. Such persons as have even the least initial concern for the Christianization of America will certainly take serious note of what the pamphlet aims at.

As the title of the booklet indicates, Home Mission Week of 1913 is to concentrate attention upon the immigrant population of the country and upon methods of securing for these newcomers from foreign lands a just chance for a wholesome life in their new homes and a strong religious faith to impart to them broader ideals and a steadying moral protection. The board appeals to both humane and spiritual motives in arguing for interest in these strangers from Europe and other remote parts of the earth. An analysis of the aims of the campaign and the agencies which the church may call upon for aid in realizing its beneficent purposes toward the immigrants is followed by the enumeration of systematic things to be done in preparation for Home Mission Week, during the course of the week, and afterward.

Such proposals are a systematic study of local conditions, a definite program of service based on those conditions, two sermons on the immigration problem from each pastor on the Sundays beginning and ending the appointed week, a midweek conference of the men of the church between those two Sundays, women's and young people's missionary society meetings, also a community banquet for men and an interdenominational meeting for women, an illustrated lecture with slides which the board will furnish, attention to the immigration problem on Thanksgiving Day, short programs in the Sunday schools, graded instruction in mission bands and church societies, and mission study classes beginning in October and running through to the end of November. All these are means of education, and meanwhile methods for reaching the immigrants are insisted upon as of equal importance. These are counted up under seven heads: Evangelism, friendship and protection, English classes and civic instruction, industrial opportunity, housing and sanitary betterment, literature, and child life.

Following this comes a remarkably complete bibliography of literature for Americans to read who want to know about the immigrants and literature to be given to immigrants who want to know, or ought to know, about America, its customs, and especially the Christian religion.

The board of course is ready to distribute these pamphlets in great numbers, and any pastor or any session desiring to awaken a local interest in Home Mission Week ought to secure enough copies to make sure that everybody in the congregation sees one.

Appeal for Prayer for United Missionary Campaign

The home and foreign missionary leaders of the United States and Canada have decided to engage this winter in the most extensive and important piece of cooperative work which they have ever undertaken. The object in view is to enlist a far larger number of church members as intelligent missionary workers, supporters and intercessors. Of the more than 20,000,000 of Protestant church members in North America, less than half are doing anything or giving anything to meet the missionary needs either at home or abroad.

In addition to aggressive educational plans to be carried forward within the various denominations, there will be several hundred two-day missionary conferences throughout the United States and Canada. More than twenty teams of experienced speakers are already organized for the efficient conduct of these conferences.

This extensive campaign is planned to lead up to a simultaneous personal canvass in March, 1914, for all missionary purposes, on the part of all the churches, so far as they will undertake it. Probably hundreds of thousands of men will assist in this simultaneous canvass for missionary subscriptions. The entire effort should mean a marked quickening of the spiritual life of many thousands of churches, resulting in greatly increased Christian activity and liberality.

In view of the vast issues involved, the executive committee of the united missionary campaign appeals to Christian people everywhere to join in frequent prayer for God's clear guidance and manifested presence and power in connection with this entire undertaking. In private prayer, at the family altars, in the stated church services, and in many other meetings called especially for the purpose, it is most earnestly urged that unceasing prayer be offered for a mighty spiritual quickening that will enable the church to strengthen and enlarge its work so as to meet worthily the present critical and stupendous opportunities both at home and abroad.

"Ye have not because ye ask not."

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE OF THE UNITED MISSIONARY CAMPAIGN.
S. EARL TAYLOR, Chairman.

Student Volunteers at Northfield

Over 100 secretaries of the Student Volunteer Movement met at Northfield for conference in the early part of September. Among this number was one man who enrolled as a student volunteer at Mount Hermon when the movement had its origin there in 1886. One has only to glance over the names of the delegates to this gathering to get some idea of the inspiration and wide outlook which characterized the conference. A few of the hundred in attendance were: Galen M. Fisher, Tokyo, Japan; Fletcher S. Brockman, Shanghai, China; Ph. de Varigas, Lausanne, Switzerland; R. A. Hadley, Calcutta, India; V. P. Bowe, Rio de Janeiro, Brazil; F. E. Wilbur, Canton, China; P. A. Conrad, Montevideo, Uruguay; J. E. Hubbard, Havana, Cuba; R. P. Wilder, London; George M. Day, St. Petersburg, Russia; E. P. Turner, Richard C. Morse, and Dr. John R. Mott, New York City.

Missionary Brevities

—King George of England bestowed six Kaiser-i-Hind medals upon six Indian missionaries on his recent birthday, one of them going to Rev. J. E. Cummings of the American Baptist mission of Burma.

—Canton Christian College has opened for the autumn with an attendance of 379. The missionaries in charge cabled to the home office in New York that matters have quieted down in Canton, and school is proceeding without any interruption.

—Dr. A. J. Coles, a prominent citizen of Newark, N. J., a member of one of the oldest families of that city, has provided for the building of a memorial to Dr. Adoniram Judson in Rangoon, Burma, to commemorate the arrival of that famous missionary in Rangoon 100 years ago. The tower will be an exact reproduction of the tower of the church in Salem, Mass., where Dr. Judson was ordained to the ministry before he sailed for the Orient.

Board Notes and Announcements

—The Friday morning meeting of the Board of the Northwest, Chicago, was led by the president, Mrs. Albert L. Berry, whose theme was "The Name of Jesus." The story was told of a lady who upon greeting a missionary was asked, "Where have I met you?" and replied, "Oh, I've met you in the Year Book of Prayer!" The first missionary speaker was Miss Midgley, formerly of the Chicago Presbyterian Training School, lately of Alaska, but now on her way to the Good Will mission, South Dakota, where she will engage in community work for the Sioux Indians. Dr. and Mrs. E. M. Wherry of Ludhiana, about ending their well-spent furlough, showed the need of more women to teach the women of India. Although from the first zenana she visited, thirty-six years ago, which has been visited regularly ever since, no woman has yet dared to confess Christ in baptism, yet Mrs. Wherry has seen rich results of woman's work, one of the latest being the Central School for Girls. She told again the bitter truth so hard to realize, that for a woman of caste to be baptized is literally to forsake all that she has. The need of three highly educated missionaries for schools in Woodstock, Dehra and Ludhiana was shown with great force.

NEW BOOKS

Professor Royce's Inspiring Book

THE PROBLEM OF CHRISTIANITY, by Josiah Royce. Harvard University offered much to students of philosophy when one could pass from the classroom of William James to that of Josiah Royce or George Palmer or Hugo Munsterberg, to say nothing of men less known but equally inspiring. They did not agree among themselves, but they made up a noted body of teachers. James and Royce were the best of friends, and that fact gave edge to their philosophical differences. James loved to call his faith pragmatism; Royce calls his faith loyalty. The phrase belongs to him by a kind of right. This volume contains lectures delivered by Professor Royce before the Lowell Institute in late 1912 and before Manchester College, Oxford, in early 1913, in fulfillment of an old promise that he would apply his principle of loyalty to the matter of the Christian faith.

Loyalty, for Professor Royce, is "the willing and thoroughgoing devotion of a self to a cause when the cause is something that unites many selves in one and which is therefore the interest of a community." The problem of Christianity can be variously worded: "In what sense can the modern man be, in creed, a Christian?" "Has the Christian faith a literal foundation in the deepest nature of things?" "Can Christianity keep in touch with men's conscious religious needs so that it can win and keep a place in men's hearts?" That depends on what Christianity essentially is Dr. Royce points out three ideas which he believes essential to the faith. These are (1) the community, historically represented by the church, (2) the lost state of the natural man, and (3) the atonement, included in the doctrine of grace. The real origin of the Christian faith was the early Christian community. Professor Royce refuses to take sides on the question of the place of the historic Christ in the teaching, though he is emphatic in his declaration of his reality and says we are sure of the visions of the risen Christ, though he does not know how to account for them. But "the early Christian community, not Paul nor any individual, is the source of all the later forms of Christian life and faith." The great purpose of the Christian faith is to create the true kingdom of heaven.

But sin, "the moral burden of the individual," "disloyalty to the community," is playing havoc in the coming of the kingdom. The chapters dealing with this part of the subject are among the most suggestive in religious literature. There is no escape by anything the individual can do. The trouble is with the will of the sinner and he cannot undo it. Hence follow the need for and possibility of atonement. It is always vicarious and objective. It is "the creation by somebody of a definite individual good on the basis of a definite previous evil." The illustration from the story of Joseph is most interesting.

The printers have done their work so well that it deserves comment. The volumes fit the hand, the type is large and open, the margins are good and there is an index that guides to what you want to know. The book itself is written sympathetically, in the fine phrase of Sienkiewicz, "for the strengthening of hearts." [Macmillan Company, New York. 2 volumes, $3.50 net. CLELAND B. MCAFEE.

Amelia E. Barr's Autobiography

ALL THE DAYS OF MY LIFE: An Autobiography, by Amelia E. Barr. In the course of her eighty-two years Mrs. Barr has written over sixty books, besides accomplishing a stupendous amount of other writing, and has had the advantage of fine friendships won through her work; but the pure, unaffected simplicity of a God-filled life has remained her dominant characteristic. Her life has been built upon an abiding faith.

She was born in Lancashire, Scotland, of a long line of ministers, which may perhaps account for her early sense of the indwelling Spirit. "My earliest consciousness had been," she says, "a strong and sure persuasion of God's goodness to men. I loved God with all my child's heart." Her childhood—"God-haunted," she calls it—was fresh, happy and normal, save for a strange sympathy with the occult world. Dreams and shadowy visions and intimations of future events came to her with startling clearness, and have continued as much a part of herself as her physical being.

Her husband's failure in business in Glasgow soon after their marriage brought them to the States to retrieve their fortune, and the story of their early years here is one of wanderings from place to place and of continuing misfortunes. Finally they reached Austin, Texas, and the tide seemed to turn. The land was lovely, the people friendly, and Mr. Barr had employment with the government. But in 1859 mutterings which presaged the war began to be heard, and with the coming of the war itself the Barrs and their children suffered a poverty that was universal.

Their next move was to Galveston. Here yellow fever took Mr. Barr and the three sons, a visitation she accepted as coming from the hand of God. "To what school," she now inquires, "was I to go next?" Putting, mentally, a blank in God's hand, she asked him to fill it, and "difficulties vanished as soon as I met them," she records, for "I was confident that God and Amelia Barr were a multitude."

The remainder of the volume has to do with her successful plunge into literary work in New York to support her three young daughters. She had been an indefatigable student and worker, and from the first was fortunate, partly through the advice and influence of Henry Ward Beecher, in allying herself with magazines and publishers of superior standing.

Now, at 82, Mrs. Barr writes: "I have lived, I have loved, I have worked, and I only ask that the love and the work continue while I live." It is to be deplored that the price —$3.50—of a book whose influence and interest should be so widespread makes it prohibitive to the average library table. [D. Appleton and Company, New York.

General Literature

ANCIENT EGYPTIAN LEGENDS, by M. A. Murray. To the average western reader both the subject and the style of this booklet will prove of more than ordinary attractiveness. The author aims to reproduce rather freely, and yet faithfully, some of the outstanding stories current in ancient Egypt regarding Osiris, Isis, Horus and Ra. Of course these are not mere stories, and the reproduction aims without pedantry to give glimpses of their religious and moral meaning. "The Wisdom of the East Series." [E. P. Dutton and Company, New York. 20 cents.

THE ENGLISH LYRIC, by Felix E. Schelling, is the most recent addition to the "Types of English Literature Series," which aims to cover the whole field of English literature scientifically. Professor Schelling's treatment is historical and critical, his range from the mediæval lyric to the successors of Swinburne and Meredith. By contrast and comparison the ideals of the lyricists of the different periods are presented, and a free use of citations only enhances the value of the volume. After dealing with the alleged decay of English poetry in our day the author concludes optimistically: "Thus it is that that past becomes a warranty of the future of our art; and the art of the lyrist remains, like the gods, ever young and never dying." Professor Schelling's fine appreciation will find its way into the library of every thoughtful student of English literature. [Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston. $1.50 net.

CROSS VIEWS, by Wilfrid S. Jackson. These essays by a keen English writer with a sense of humor and a style that is delightful may be commended to all who, enervated by summer weather, feel the need of fresh viewpoints. Even in talking of such an apparently trite subject as "Town and Country," the author avoids all suspicion of triteness. He has a coolness which is welcome in this sentimental age and he is frank in his discriminations. [John Lane Company, New York. $1.25 net.

FOLK TALES OF BENGAL, by Lal Behari Day; illustrated by Warwick Goble. These tales are representative of the "unwritten stories which old women in India recite to little children" — have recited through a hundred generations. The handsome colored illustrations make the volume a distinctive one. [Macmillan Company, New York. $5.25 net.

A HANDBOOK OF NORSE MYTHOLOGY, by Karl Mortensen; translated by A. Clinton Crowell. A scholarly handbook by a professor in the University of Copenhagen, written in a style sufficiently simple to make it attractive to the layman. [Thomas Y. Crowell Company, New York. 75 cents net.

Miscellaneous Biography

MY PAST, by Countess Marie Larisch. In this autobiography the author endeavors to vindicate her connection with the love affair of Crown Prince Rudolph of Austria and the Baroness Mary Vetsera—the amour which resulted in the tragic death of the two lovers at Meyerling. It is not a dispassionate account, and therefore it can have but slight historical value. Judged merely as a piece of writing, it is lucid, though disconnected, and reflects the thinking of a brilliant mind. But the regret remains that one who claims to have been the victim of slandering tongues should have allowed herself to speak while yet the taste of the dregs lingers on her tongue. [G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. $3.50 net.

WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON. "I am in earnest—I will not equivocate—I will not excuse—I will not retreat a single inch—and I will be heard." So said Garrison in the first number of his antislavery paper, The Liberator, eighty-two years ago. A man who could say that and stick to it deserves to be remembered by his countrymen. In this little volume John Jay Chapman gives an appreciative and scholarly study of Garrison and his labors in behalf of the slaves. It is not so much a biography as an analysis of Garrison's methods and work, and of the results that followed. No one can read it without an increase of respect and admiration for the great advocate of the antislavery cause. [Moffat, Yard and Company, New York. $1.25 net.

JAMES FENIMORE COOPER, by Mary E. Phillips. The intention of this simply told personal life of Cooper—to place the man, not the author, against an authentic background of men, women, places and events as they were in his time—has been splendidly accomplished. The author has delved for her material in every available source, and has succeeded in presenting it so happily that the result should do much to stimulate a revival of interest in the "prose poet of the silent woods and stormy sea." The illustrations are numerous and of unusual interest. [John Lane Company, New York. $2.50 net.

FRANCES WILLARD: HER LIFE AND WORK, by Ray Strachey. This is a sane and inspiring account of one of the early leaders for the struggle of American women to participate in the affairs of government. The author approached her task with no personal knowledge of Miss Willard and confesses that her study of the writings of the great temperance leader has led her "almost to believe that Frances Willard was perfect in her soul." It is shown how the fiery spirit of the young girl developed into an individualism which Miss Willard herself recognized when she told D. L. Moody that she had the spirit of Queen Elizabeth. The sidelights from letters and diaries help reveal the woman who stirred thousands of persons to labor intelligently in the winning fight against the saloon as head of the W. C. T. U. That she was 35 years old before she came in touch with the movement in which she was to find her real work will cheer those who begrudge time of preparation for tasks. It is a volume well worth reading and owning. [Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. $1.50 net.

ZONES OF THE SPIRIT, by August Strindberg. Few humans have had so stormy a soul life as the erratic Strindberg, passing as he did from Christian faith through the despair of atheism, a strange superstitious mysticism, then back to his Christian faith. In this recovered faith he gathered together this "book of thoughts," his last work. It is a strange jumble of paragraphs, comment on multitudinous things, quaint conceits, parabolic illustrations. Many of his thoughts are striking and original. It is interesting to note that in an allusion to Frankenstein he makes the usual error of confounding the student with the monster he created. [G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. $1.25 net.

ELLEN KEY: Her Life and Work, by Louise Nystrom-Hamilton, with introduction by Havelock Ellis. This biography is welcome as the first really adequate one we have had of the much discussed Swedish woman. Its author has known Ellen Key since childhood, and she has made a worthy effort to refute the personal slander which has to a certain extent limited Ellen Key's influence. The photographs are interesting private ones. [G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. $1.25 net.

CARMEN SYLVA, and Sketches from the Orient, by Pierre Loti. The distinguished French author here records his impressions of a visit to the queen of Roumania. It is a portrait that all who have an interest in Carmen Sylva will want to possess and it is done in the flawless style peculiar to Loti. [Macmillan Company, New York. $1 net.

ROYAL WOMEN: Their History and Romance, by Mary Ridpath-Mann. Sketches briefly but very adequately the lives of Elizabeth, Mary Queen of Scots, Marie Antoinette and the Empress Josephine. A splendid little book to have about when one's memory needs swift refreshing. [A. C. McClurg and Company, Chicago. $1.25 net.

A Group of Books on Feminism

THE WOMAN MOVEMENT, by Ellen Key, with introduction by Havelock Ellis (G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York; $1.50 net), is not a history but a psychological resume of the transformations that the movement has effected. It is intensely personal, reflecting the celebrated Swedish woman's own attitude on the whole question. WOMAN AND TOMORROW, by W. L. George (D. Appleton and Company, New York; $1.25 net), is a volume highly to be recommended to the enthusiastic "feminist," for it understands her and her motives and will certainly interpret her favorably to her opposers. THE WOMAN WITH EMPTY HANDS, by a well known woman suffragist (Dodd, Mead and Company, New York; 50 cents net), attempts no argument, but tells simply of one woman's conversion to the cause in such a persuasive way as to be very convincing. THE UNREST OF WOMEN, by Edward Sanford Martin (D. Appleton and Company, New York; $1 net), presents very cleverly the opposing attitude in a series of papers on Mrs. Belmont, Jane Addams, President Thomas, Miss Milholland and others. THE ADVANCE OF WOMAN, by Jane Johnstone Christie (J. B. Lippincott Company, Philadelphia; $1.50 net), goes back to "mankind's dumb progenitors" and carries the sex war from then on, but discloses little connection between the author's wildly militant view of the wickedness of man and the real condition of affairs. In Miss Ida M. Tarbell's THE BUSINESS OF BEING A WOMAN (Macmillan Company, New York; $1.25 net) are a number of essays on the question which are informed by the qualities of common sense and proportion so lacking in the previous work. Miss Tarbell is sanely conservative in her attitude and emphasizes the importance of the hearth and home as the innermost sphere of womanly activity. The point Miss Tarbell makes of the noble services rendered by women during war days is taken up in detail by the indefatigable H. Addington Bruce in WOMAN IN THE MAKING OF AMERICA (Little, Brown and Company, Boston. $1.50 net). Here we feel that the separation between the works of the two sexes is more artificial than any that we see in our daily lives, but the pages are stirring reading and do give us new and specific instances of womanly heroism such as we know marked the course of all our national crises from the revolution to the abolition of slavery through the earlier agitation and the tragic civil war.

New Fiction

A MERE WOMAN, by Vera Nikto, is the life story of a Russian woman, who is early left motherless and who sees in marriage merely freedom from the dullness of her father's home. Her marriage to a handsome but dissolute Russian army officer ends in disaster. She secures a divorce and falls in love with a fascinating but unprincipled man who soon forsakes her. She finally satisfies her ambition by a marriage with an elderly and wealthy prince and finds happiness in his devotion and the love of their child. [D. Appleton and Company, New York. $1.25 net.

HENRY KEMPTON, by Evelyn Brentwood. The son of a tradesman, Henry Kempton's one aim in life is to "get on." He secures a commission in the army and, though this life is far from attractive, climbs successfully, helped by a chance acquaintance, who falls in love with and eventually marries him, after his discovery that he possesses a soul. [John Lane Company, New York. $1.25 net.

THE SILENCE OF MEN, by H. F. Prevost Battersby, is a sort of modern Lorelei. Strong men allured by the charm of Lynne Ashburton are practically wrecked as she sweeps out of their lives seeking new conquests. One dies seeking wealth for her in Alaska, while she deliberately lures on another. It is all rather sordid. [John Lane Company, New York. $1.25 net.

THE LOST DESPATCH, by Natalie Sumner Lincoln. With the civil war as a background the author has painted a spirited romance involving a southern belle in numerous daring escapades with United States secret service men. The spirit of Lincoln is beautifully shown in several situations. [D. Appleton and Company, New York. $1.30 net.

GREATER LOVE HATH NO MAN, by Frank L. Packard. An innocent man takes upon himself the accusation of the murder of his benefactor in order to shield the real criminal, his benefactor's son. In time his innocence is proved and he is free to enjoy the life he has so bravely earned. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.25 net.

MIXED GRILL, by W. Pett Ridge. A collection of fifteen short stories about English characters of more or less unusualness. The place is London, the time today and the people just plain folks. There is a taste or two of the sogginess of life's under crust and plenty of humor. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.20 net.

PILGRIMS OF THE PLAINS, by Kate A. Aplington, is a clean, pretty romance of the old Sante Fe trail, taking the reader down the Mississippi and across the plains with an interesting company of characters in which Fremont and Kit Carson figure. [F. G. Browne and Company, Chicago. $1.25 net.

WILD GRAPES, by Marie Louise Van Saanen. Another recital of the grim tragedy which thrusts a strong man into the grip of a trivial, characterless woman. Written with strength and skill. [Moffat, Yard and Company, New York. $1.35 net.

OUT OF THE ASHES, by Ethel Watts Mumford. A modern version of love versus finance laid in New York and centering about a brilliant widow and her daughter. [Moffat, Yard and Company, New York. $1.25 net.

GOOSE CREEK FOLKS, by Isabel G. and Florence Lilian Bush. Unlike most stories dealing with the primitive folk of the Kentucky mountains this one lays especial stress upon the new efforts toward education that are meeting with such a response throughout the whole region. [Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. $1 net.

SIMON BRANDIN, by B. Paul Neuman. The story of an ambitious nihilist, showing the humanizing influence of adequate reading and healthy associates. A novel with a worthwhile lesson in it. [George H. Horan Company, New York. $1.20 net.

ISABEL, by James Oliver Curwood, opens with an unusual situation in the land of the Eskimos and develops a story of a man's great love that reads thrillingly. [Harper and Brothers, New York. $1.25 net.

In the Educational Field

THE RHODES SCHOLARSHIPS, by George R. Parkin. This account of the Rhodes scholarships and their founder, written by the secretary of the board of trustees of the fund, is meant primarily for the would-be scholars themselves and for the local committees of selection whose personnel will vary with the years and to whom a premanent record of the needs and ideas embedded in the bequest will be necessary. But the book is more than this; as a portrait of the great British empire builder, as an introduction to the life and educational aspects of Oxford, and as a stirring story of constructive idealism it will be of the utmost value and interest. [Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston. $2 net.

A GUIDE TO THE MONTESSORI METHOD, by Ellen Yale Stevens, explains the philosophical basis of this new "system" that has so electrified the world of thought, and gives practical directions to mothers and teachers for its application. A very useful and comprehensive volume, written by a woman who has studied under Dr. Montessori herself and has introduced the method in American schools. [Frederick A. Stokes Company, New York. $1 net.

HOW TO TRAIN THE SPEAKING VOICE, by Thomas Tait. This little book deals only with fundamentals, and does it in a thoroughgoing way. Principles are given preference over rules, and the author has done well the none too easy task of presenting a practical system of voice culture by means of the printed page. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $1 net.

In Behalf of the Boy

THAT BOY OF YOURS, by James S. Kirtley (George H. Doran Company, New York; $1 net), is a sympathetic study of boyhood, offering to parents and teachers the most valuable suggestions for understanding and dealing with growing boys. Mr. Kirtley is the kind of man who has remained young, and he knows what he's talking about. BRINGING UP THE BOY, by Carl Werner (Dodd, Mead and Company, New York; $1 net), also insists that success with boys depends upon keeping their point of view. It contains pointed chapters on the sin of sex secrecy, and ought to help mothers and fathers to a profound realization of their duties to their sons. TRAINING THE BOY, by William A. McKeever (Macmillan Company, New York; $1.50 net), treats the same problem at greater length, dwelling particularly on its industrial, educational, social and spiritual aspects. The trenchant portions devoted to combating the drink and tobacco habits and the sex evil are highly to be commended; and its effective contrasting of the desirable and the base ought to swing the balance for any boy reader.

Where the Little Leaven Comes From

BY BRUCE BARTON

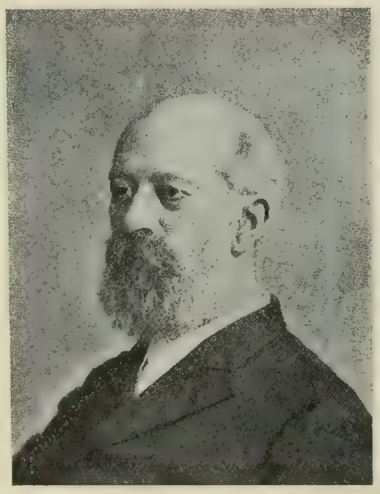
It was very cold that morning in the ditch. The shivering gang of "Bohunks" stood knee-deep in the icy water and shoveled doggedly, their curses rising in a bitter chant. "Bohunk," let it be understood, is a name conferred by us of the master race on all those hosts that come to us from Austria and Hungary and Montenegro and Roumania to build our bridges, stretch out our railroads and do the essential tasks which we are too proud or too soft to do ourselves. The ancestors of the "Bohunk" overrode Rome like a flood, and Rome was destroyed. More Bohunks, thousands more than it took to level Rome, rain down upon us every year, and we—oh, we go blithely about our work in the easy assurance that somehow we shall "assimilate" them. Perhaps Rome, too, had that easy and comforting notion.

But it was cold in the ditch. As the great derrick reached out its long arm and dropped the iron bucket among them, the "Bohunks" scattered into little groups, chattering noisily. Two young men found themselves jostled close together. They had known each other since the days when they played up and down the rough streets of their little village in the old country. There they had called each other by their proper names, but here in the ditch they had fallen into the habit of using the numbers which the boss had fixed upon them; they were no longer men but numbers; though they accepted the system, they hated it; and one of them hated it with a terrible hate.

That night, around the airtight stove which heated the long bunkhouse, the two fell again into the discussion which had occupied every evening since the work began. They brought forth their books, he of the terrible hate his anarchistic tracts, and the other his New Testament. Long after the others were asleep in unclean bunks the two argued whether there be a God, whether government is right or wrong, whether men should trust to the prevailing power of right, or scorning that should stake everything on a single thrust of force.

Years afterwards, when he told me the story, the man of the New Testament had become the most influential foreign speaking pastor in a great city. And one morning on the front page of his daily newspaper he read the name of his friend with the terrible hate who had shot a mayor and was to be hanged.

As he read the glaring headlines his mind turned back to the day when they landed together from the steerage. Their ideals had not been so different then; they had been raised in similar homes close together; they had attended the same school. The change had begun after they reached the new country; he remembered just how it had begun. The full freedom of the new land had gone to their heads. They had not been allowed to read in the old country; reading was for the priests. Here they could read anything, everything; meetings were every night. They went; and almost before they knew it they were mouthing the bitter words which the anarchist speakers taught. His friend had gone on from bad to worse; becoming one of the little inside circle of extremists who pledged themselves to violence. And he—he looked again at the glaring headlines and shuddered a little—he, too, might have gone the same way but for the little missionary who had found him out. With the headlines still before him he knelt down and thanked God for that little missionary.



Henry Albert Schauffler, D. D.

And it is really about the little missionary that this story is written; how she and some ninety like her are changing the lives of the thousands who land upon our shore to be assimilated, or to assimilate us.

The whole ninety of them were made possible because thirty years ago Dr. Henry Albert Schauffler had a vision. He had graduated from Williams College filled full of the missionary zeal which had its birth among that student body. For a time he had taught in Robert College, where he helped to train the men who have since shaped the destinies of Southeastern Europe. Later, against tremendous obstacles, he began the first missionary effort for the American Board in Austria, and returning to this country he founded the Slavic department in Oberlin Theological Seminary.

But all through the years he had his vision. He saw great ships emptying the peoples of the earth upon our shores, particularly the peoples of southeastern Europe whom he had come to know so well. He saw them issuing out of the steerage, blinking in the new sunlight of freedom, stumbling in their unaccustomed liberty, thousands of them—and he feared for America and for them. How to reach these thousands—Austrians, Poles, Slavs, Roumanians, Bulgarians, Bohemians and the others—that was the problem that Dr. Schauffler saw and pondered over.

His life among them had taught him that preachers could not do it. They come from lands priest-cursed and priest-ridden. The visit of the priest to their homes in the evening, when the husband is with his family, means a demand for money; a visit in the husband's absence may have an even more sinister meaning. No—the problem was too great to be met merely by training foreign speaking pastors. These new Americans must be touched in their home life, through their children, through the necessities of every day existence.

In other words, by women. Only women could gain unquestioned access to the homes; only women could reach the parents through the children; only women could penetrate clear to the woman's heart, which is the heart of the home. This was Dr. Schauffler's vision. In the basement of his house in Cleveland, with one pupil and no equipment or faculty or endowment, he started the Schauffler Missionary Training School to train foreign-speaking young women for home missionary work among their own people.

There was a sort of fine folly, a magnificent foolhardiness about the enterprise that makes one marvel. It seems almost like the old lady attempting with her broom to sweep back the sea. Here is the horde of foreigners, eight hundred thousands of them a year—being poured out on us, ignorant of our language, trained to regard all church activity with suspicion, inclined toward atheism—and here, to meet the horde and conquer it—what? A single consecreated man training one student in the basement of his home. Sounds foolish, doesn't it? Almost as foolish as the attempt of that Carpenter-Preacher who started with a handful of pupils two thousand years ago; only He had no home and no basement.

Yet the vision has been realized, or is being realized. I visited the Schauffler School not long ago, carried along by a reporter's curiosity. I found the strangest school you ever saw. It is housed in a frame building in Cleveland that looks comfortable enough from the outside, but the longer you stay inside the more the school reminds you of a big, healthy girl who has outgrown all her clothes. Listen a minute:

I barked my shins against an old fashioned piano that stands in the middle of one of the dark upstairs halls. "That," explained the principal, "is our music room. You see we have no music room; the girls have to do their practicing out here in the hall." I thought of the "Bohunks" I had known in the construction camps in Montana, of their passionate fondness for music that had made them whittle a violin out of wood and string it with hair from a horse's tail; I pictured the wonderful hold which these Schauffler girls might gain by bringing music into music famished homes; I looked at the battered piano standing in the open hallway and I thought, "The pity of it."

There were no rugs on the parlor floor and hardly any furniture. "Our parlor is our gymnasium," the principal explained to me. I thought of the girls who would go out of that school literally to remake the lives of the immigrant hosts, of their need for strong bodies as well as strong hearts; I looked again at the pathetic little parlor gymnasium and I thought, "The pity of it."

They showed me the class in domestic science—a dozen girls crowded into a kitchen built for three—the dozen learning there the secrets that will transform the households of thousands of immigrants. They showed me the library, a little two by four room with perhaps a couple of hundred books. They showed me the class in nursing in session and the class in the life of Christ—and the classes were meeting in the bedrooms of two of the students, the teacher at a table and some of the class on the bed. And the more they showed me the more impatient I became. I turned on the principal:

"You can't do it," I said. "Think of what is expected of this school! There are 800,000 immigrants landing every year. One man, woman and child in every hundred is a new landed immigrant. They will either destroy our country or save it, according as they are taught. They will either pour the fresh blood and enthusiasm of their lives into our churches and transfigure them, or they will swarm on the churches and bury them. You are supposed to train here young women who are going to re-create these multitudes; you are training the saviors of our churches and our civilization. And you're trying to do it with what? Nothing. It's foolish; you can't."

The Schauffler Missionary Training School, Cleveland, Ohio

And then I was sorry I had said it. I looked into the faces of the faculty—men and women who are trained scholars, who could earn three or four or ten times as much money elsewhere if they would, wonderful men and women who are living, heaven knows how, on the little salaries they are paid, and sometimes giving back half of those to the school. I saw their consecration, and I said: "Perhaps your faith is great enough to conquer everything else. Perhaps you can do it, if you have to, even with all these hardships, but you shouldn't have to."

Group of Slavic Students in School Spring Term 1912

They showed me some of their graduates at work. Here is a section where men were killed almost every Saturday night. It was a community of bloodshed and anarchy and hatred of the church and its Christ. Today it is quiet, law abiding, a place of clean homes and faith in God. And in the center of it, like the queen of a hive of bees, I found a Schauffler graduate, teaching the women to cook and sew, tending the children through the day, nursing the sick and preaching to the whole neighborhood in the front yard of the little mission on Sundays.

I found a beautiful young Italian girl transforming a neighborhood of hundreds of Italians, many of them drifted away from the Catholic Church and ready for any fate.

I found an Austrian girl ministering to Austrians; a Roumanian girl tending to Roumanians—ninety different girls altogether (though I saw only a few), each one of them transforming ideas and ideals of a little city. And I thought to myself, if our church is going to be saved in the midst of this onrush of immigrants, these will save it; if our children are not to be destroyed by the immigrant children who fill our public schools, it will be partly, at least, because of what these Schauffler girls are doing; if our civilization is to continue and improve, it will be due in large measure to these who are civilizing the homes of the thousands poured in upon us.

This, I thought, is the moral of the two men in the ditch. If there had been no Schauffler school and no little missionary, both men would have drifted on into anarchy and both probably would have been hanged.

Because there is a Schauffler school one man's life was touched by the gospel and he became a Christian power.

If there had been an adequate Schauffler school instead of an inadequate one, both men might have been saved for usefulness.

I asked Mrs. Mills, the principal, if she had any booklets that would tell more about the Schauffler school and how it is making the little leaveners that are to leaven the host of immigrants. She gave me some that were really wonderfully interesting. I asked her if she would lay aside some extra leaflets to send to friends of mine who might read my article. Because, I said, there must be a lot of people care whether the children who play with their children are Christian or pagan; who care whether the hosts that land upon us become anarchists or useful citizens; who care whether we do our duty toward the millions that God is sending us or only shirk it. These people would like to know more about the Schauffler school.

She promised to send some of her interesting leaflets to any one of my friends who should inquire.

And I'm going to make a test. I'm going to see how many there are who really care.

Perhaps you who read this are one who cares. If you are, I should like to count you among my friends; I should like to send you some of the leaflets that Mrs. Mills has set aside for my friends. You can have them by merely sending your name to Mrs. Mills. And you are put under no obligation whatever by doing it; you will be merely helping her by showing her how many Christian people there are in this country who think and care.

You have no idea what an encouragement that is. If you were doing a big, hard life and death job as Mrs. Mills is, you'd like to know that there are thousands of people who are interested enough to read about it and to think and to care: It doesn't cost you anything just to say you're interested—just to help that much; surely you will.

Without putting any obligation on me whatever, I wish you would send me some interesting leaflets about the Schauffler school. I am interested in the big thing you are trying to do.

The Open Hearth

Are the Schools Effeminized?

A well-known lawyer once said to me he thought more men should be employed in the public school grades, as the majority of women teachers did not understand the boys and hence could not properly lead them into their best development.

Some girls grow up with a very decided aversion to the small boy with his boisterous elemental ways, and they cannot see anything admirable about his strivings for brawn and muscle and his boyish delights. They see only a rude little savage and they turn for relief to the dear little girls who are so proper and clean.

When these prejudiced girls become teachers they enter their work with a feeling of dread of the boys and hope they can "get along," but there is no love for them unless the boy happens to be a sissy sort that the real boys cannot tolerate.

The small boy is very sensitive, he watches the signs closely, and when he senses that prejudice and knows he is not loved, merely tolerated, he accepts it in various ways according to his nature. One little lad I knew said sadly but with meekness, "She looks the way she didn't like me," and as long as he attended that school his heart was not in it and he was glad to escape. The next teacher loved him, and how he responded! When he is an aged man he will enjoy thinking of the days spent with that loved teacher.

What is true in the public schools applies with greater force to the Sabbath school, that training place for the ones who are to man our churches in the next decades. In the Sabbath school it is the teacher's privilege to reach the higher spiritual nature of the child and to get into contact with his life and aspirations. Who can do that so well for the boy as one who has been a real boy himself and who knows by sympathetic touch the needs of growing boys, and can give of his own experiènce in overcoming temptations and living manfully? There are splendid, manly young men, some yet in their teens, whom the younger boys would fairly idolize and copy, just as the little girls do the young women, and if they would take these boys' classes as a trust from God and do their best I feel that the Sunday school would be greatly improved. Then during the trying time of boyhood fewer truants among the boys would be the rule because they would feel as if they were understood and "really belonged."

I would advocate men teachers (not old men, remember), for boys from 7 years upward. A Woman Observer.

Place for Temperance Investment

When I left Syria in 1878, I was able to say, and did say frequently, that I had never seen a native intoxicated. The only intoxicated persons I had ever seen in Beirut were English sailors. But since that time Beirut has become a place where intemperance is by no means rare. French and other groggeries have been established and the reaction against the conditions prevailing in the days of absolute Mohammedan intolerance has had the unfortunate, and not illogical, result of modifying the attitude of the Mohammedans themselves in regard to intoxicating liquor. At length conditions became such that the establishment, largely through the instrumentality of Mrs. Henry Harris Jessup, of the Beirut temperance reading room became absolutely necessary. This reading room is established right at the heart of things and provides a place where the men are able to get coffee and other simple refreshments at a nominal price and such publications to read in different languages as the funds in hand enable the management to procure.

The cost of land in Beirut, especially near the business center, has risen very much, and the maintenance of this work has been on the shoulders practically of the people engaged there in missionary and philanthropic and educational work. And owing to the death of several persons who were in a position to aid it materially this important adjunct of the efforts of the missionaries has been crippled. Ten thousand dollars would go a long way toward putting this work on a permanent foundation and meantime it ought to have a couple of thousand dollars a year of regular support for its equipment, secretary, reading room supply and the increase of its accommodations. I should be very glad to act as the forwarder of any contributions that might be made and I trust that no one will be unmindful of the fact that what would be a very small contribution to an American charity will bulk more largely at the eastern end of the Mediterranean in its purchasing power.

Is Virgin Birth a Vital Doctrine?

In the Open Hearth of Aug. 7 a correspondent asserts that, among other subjects, the virgin birth does not take a place of importance in the faith of the church. Our gifted Dr. van Dyke also recently resented the action of presbytery in questioning the young van Dyke on such a trivial subject and challenged the church to take a man of his position if she wanted to discuss such subtle doctrines.

Is a person really a narrow-minded bigot who believes that the virgin birth is a fundamental truth of the Christian religion and that a man who rejects that vital truth ought not to be in the Presbyterian ministry? The church has always stood for the confession "He was born of the Virgin Mary." Does she so no longer? Is it moral to repeat those words, with the mental reservation that they mean something entirely different from their plain import? Is it moral for a minister to remain in the Presbyterian Church when he knows in his heart that he does not believe in her doctrines, even though he really believes he is serving God and the truth by trying to win the church to his way of thinking?

A few months since I heard a distinguished Presbyterian minister, speaking in the pulpit in Pasadena, say that, in his judgment, there was no further need of Unitarian and Universalist Churches. They had accomplished their work, had brought the so-called orthodox churches to their way of thinking and might as well be dissolved. Is any large portion of our beloved church Unitarian? Does she not stand now as in the past for that vital truth that our blessed Lord is indeed and in truth the Son of God? M. C. H.

Appreciating Real Heroes

We honor the men of the army and navy for the hardships they endured and the victories they won. We honor the men of the police force and of the fire department for their devotion to duty. We show our appreciation of these heroes who safeguard the nation and defend our lives and possessions, not alone by words of praise but by pensioning them when they retire from active service.

How about our ministers? Are they not heroes? It certainly requires heroism to enter upon a calling that requires so much self-denial and service as that of the ministry. In active service the salary of the average minister is pitifully small, and he must forego luxuries and innocent pleasures enjoyed by men in other professions, for he has not the money to indulge in them. He finds it difficult enough to provide things actually necessary for himself and family, and his mind is too often perplexed with the question of providing for the present needs of those dependent upon him, to say nothing of his anxiety as to the time of old age or prolonged illness. Under such circumstances it requires heroism to stand in his place and do his work with a cheerful countenance.

What a burden it would lift from his shoulders if he could have the assurance that in the time of disability or old age he would be provided for. The Presbyterian Church owes its ministers just that comfort, and the $10,000,000 endowment plan is a recognition of the obligation. To William Hiram Foulkes, D. D., has been assigned the task of securing that vast sum, and no better man could have been found for the undertaking. Will he succeed? That depends upon the support given him by ministers and laymen. Patting him on the back may encourage him, especially if the hand has first been down deep into the pocket.

The heroes of the ministry deserve better things at the hands of the church than they have hitherto received, and the endowment project affords a joyful opportunity to Presbyterian laymen of showing their appreciation of the services and needs of God's heroes of the ministry. Robert Cluett.

"Tinkering the Lord's Prayer"

In "Open Hearth" there appeared a letter with the title as above. With the contention that "debts" and "debtors" is the correct rendering of the words in the prayer we all agree, but it is unfortunate to assert that "trespass" and "trespassers" are due to "the tinkering of some of the fathers." A little knowledge of the history of the various translations of the Scriptures into English would save one from making such a blunder. Wiclif used "dettis," but Tyndale, the greatest of all translators of the Bible save Luther, and one of the greatest of Englishmen, to whom every subsequent English version of the Bible owes more than to any one else, used "trespases." The versions which followed used "debts," till in the Bishops' Bible (1568) "trespasses" was again used. The prayer book version of the Psalms and other Scripture is taken from the Bishops' Bible, and the Methodist Episcopal book of forms simply copied from the prayer book.

It might be well to remind the readers of The Continent once more of a fact of which so many Christians are still apparently ignorant, that our so-called Authorized English version (and the American Standard as well) did not drop down from heaven in its present form, is not even an independent translation from the original manuscripts, but according to its title page is "translated out of the original tongues, and with the former translations diligently compared and revised," and so is still subject to revision and improvement. It may well be questioned whether it is any more divinely inspired than any one of the "former translations." The American Standard revision has often returned to some of the earlier renderings. John Q. Adams.

Remarks for "A Mere Man"

"Mere Man's" article about the need of housemaids "riled" my fighting blood, as several other things have done lately. A local newspaper one Monday morning devoted forty-five inches to "September Morn" and six inches to the dedication of a new church. However, a plea that more space be devoted to naked truth in regard to social evil in the city and less to pictures of naked women brought forth good fruit.

Here are a few naked statistics for "Mere Man"—he's fearfully "mere": Blackwell island prison statistics of the former occupations of 2,000 fallen women show that comparatively few were shop or factory workers, whereas the number of servants was 933, and those who had been living with parents or friends numbered 499. What "Mere Man" can explain these "naked truths"? Is it because of the social ostracism of a domestic servant, loneliness, or is she more at the mercy of her employer?

Just at present, in Akron, a minister and Sabbath school teacher are at loggerheads over —well, higher criticism, I guess. A lot of Bible stories the teacher doubts, one of which is the "demons entering the swine." But that must be true, or why do demon-loving lawmakers (and those who elect 'em) do so much to safeguard hogs and so little to safeguard children? "Mere Men" are queer animals.

Minnie J. Ellet.

Another Priest Who Fraternizes

In looking over The Continent last evening I was surprised that Mr. Ellis, the editor afield, made so much of the fact that the Wellsboro minister and the priest were such good friends.

My experience has been that all the priests are as friendly as the ministers of other denominations. This will explain my meaning: When leaving Salmon, Idaho, last April I was entertained at a banquet by the ministers of the town at the Episcopal rectory the evening before I left. There were present Rev. and Mrs. T. Z. Vincent, Jr. (Episcopal), Rev. and Mrs. H. Ellis Bush (Methodist) and Father Gresl of the Catholic church. It did not occur to me that it was strange at all for the priest and the Episcopal minister to be present, as we had worked harmoniously.

Ways of Working

What the Church Really Means

Rev. F. Hyatt Smith, preaching in Kenmore church in the suburbs of Buffalo, was asked by his elders to prepare something which would impress upon the people of the community more deeply the rightful place and power of the church as a community institution, as well as quicken the enthusiasm and loyalty of the church members themselves. Mr. Smith worked out a statement of the individual member's relation to the church which so pleased the eldership that they had it printed on heavy motto paper and distributed it through the congregation. Many of the members have framed it. Interest has moreover been created in other congregations and communities, and the Kenmore church has been obliged to supply a considerable demand from outside. A number of churches, Presbyterian and others, have purchased copies to post in their porches and vestibules. One Presbyterian elder gave three of them to Catholic priests, all of whom accepted the sentiments as entirely suitable to be displayed in a Catholic church building. The statement thus prepared and copyrighted by Mr. Smith is as follows:

My Church and I

MY Church is the place where the Word of God is preached, the power of God is felt, the Spirit of God is manifested, the Love of God is revealed, and the Unity of God is perceived.

THERE I am to meet my Saviour, to meditate on His redemption, to listen to His commands, to bow in reverence before Him, to pray for His guidance, to sing His praise, to ask for His help, and to sit quietly in His house.

IT is the home of my soul, the altar of my devotion, the hearth of my faith, the center of my affections, and the foretaste of heaven

I HAVE united with it in solemn covenant, pledging myself to attend its services, to pray for its members, to give to its support, to obey its laws, to protect its name, to reverence its building, to honor its officers, and to maintain its permanence

IT claims the first place in my heart, the highest place in my mind, the principal place in my activities, and its unity, peace, and progress concern my life in this world and that which is to come

I OWE it my zeal, my endeavor, my sympathy, my devotion, my benevolence, my sacrifice, and my prayers When I neglect its services I injure its good name, I lessen its power, I discourage its members, and I chill my own soul.

I HAVE solemnly promised, in the sight of God and men, to advance its interests by my faithful attendance, by reading the Holy Bible, by never neglecting its ordinances, by contributing to its support, by meeting with my fellow-members, by watching over their welfare, and by joining with them in prayer and praise and service, and that promise I this day renew, before God my Father, Christ my Redeemer, and the Holy Spirit my Sanctifier

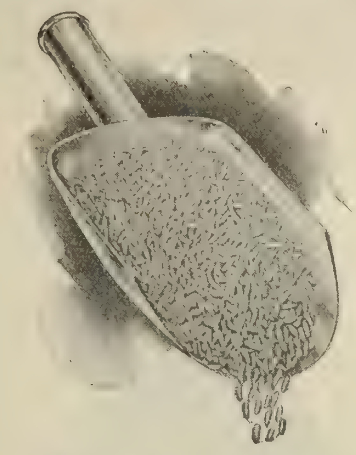
Have Parents Meet Teachers

Some schools have spent a little energy to good result in holding a reception for the parents of pupils a few days before Rally Day. The teachers and officers are present and Jane's mother has an opportunity to get better acquainted with Miss Jones, her teacher, and Miss Jones can inquire about some of the peculiarities which Jane has shown in her behavior. The mere announcement that such a gathering is to be held, perhaps at the home of the superintendent, will serve to attract the attention of the parents to the school. At the meeting the superintendent can outline some of the work which the school will attempt, perhaps explain the system of grading in use in the school and urge the responsibility of the parent for home instruction.

Tickets for Bible School Train

The Bible school of North Yakima, Wash., church in issuing an announcement of the special meetings in connection with the beginning of the fall work evolved an imitation railway ticket, the five coupons of which corresponded to different special programs in the school. The ticket was marked "Not transferable and not good for you unless you help a little. No sleeping car attached." The exercises of the month will close Sept. 29 with a Bible school banquet at the Y. W. C. A. A picture of the Bible school on Rally Day a year ago was shown on the reverse side of the imitation ticket.

As the result of an exhibit of Coe College at Iowa fair at least five students were obtained.



At 9 a. m.

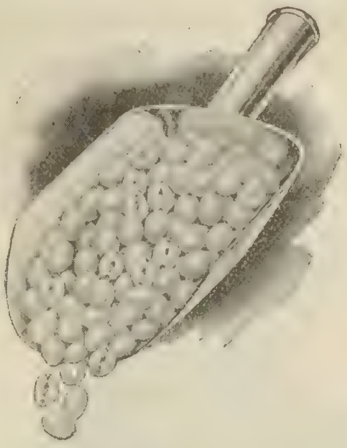
The wheat or rice kernels are sealed up in mammoth guns.

Then for one whole hour those guns are revolved in a heat of 550 degrees.

Each grain is made up of a hundred million granules. Inside of each granule is a trifle of moisture which this heat turns into steam.

In sixty minutes this superheated steam has attained a tremendous pressure.

Then we are ready to blast those granules to pieces, by a hundred million steam explosions.



At 10 a. m.

The guns are shot. The steam in each granule explodes.

The grains that shoot out are eight times normal size. All the food granules are literally blasted to pieces, so digestion can instantly act.

Each grain is filled with a myriad cells, surrounded by toasted walls Yet the grains remain unbroken, shaped exactly as they grew.

That is Prof. Anderson's process for making whole grains wholly digestible. And it never was done before.

Puffed Wheat 10c
Puffed Rice 15c
Except in Extreme West

At 7 a. m.

Countless people every morning serve these Puffed Grains with cream and sugar. Or mix them with any fruit.

They have grains that are crisp and porous bubble-like and thin. Grains that melt at a touch of the teeth. Grains that taste like toasted nuts.

They have the most enticing cereals ever brought to the morning table.

At dinners, sometimes, people use these same grains as a garnish to ice cream. They use them in candy making.

People crisp the grains with butter, and eat them like popcorn or peanuts—between meals. They use them as wafers in soup.

Wherever you want a crisp, nutlike taste these exploded grains are ideal.

At 7 p. m.

In many a home these grains are served like crackers in bowls of milk.

These Puffed Grains float. They are crisp and inviting. They are four times as porous as bread.

They are whole-grain foods which don't tax the stomach. Digestion acts instantly on them. They are ideal bedtime dishes.

Thus forty million dishes every month are served by people who like good things.

You should have them in your home. There is nothing else like them.

The first package of either reveals a new delight. Tell your grocer that you want to try them.

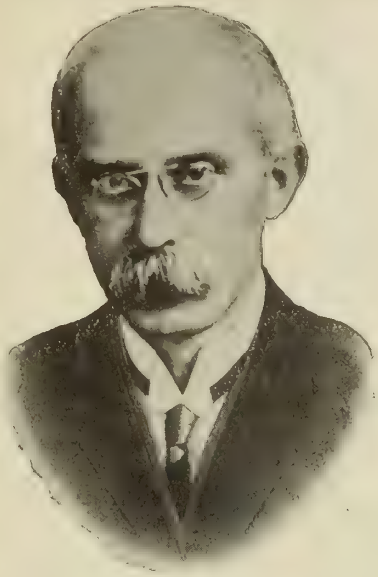
A Successful Paper Plus Successful Writers makes The Continent the most necessary publication for your church and for your home



J. H. JOWETT

"Dr. Jowett's devotional articles alone are worth the subscription price of THE CONTINENT." "The greatest preacher in this country." These and many other phrases are the comments we receive concerning his messages in THE CONTINENT

NOLAN R. BEST

The first page editorials by Mr. Best, editor of THE CONTINENT, are widely read by pastors and laymen alike; often reproduced by the secular press. They are considered the most helpful utterances of present day religious journalism.

WILLIAM T. ELLIS

Of THE CONTINENT is a lecturer and writer who commands a wide and appreciative audience. His regular and special contributions to THE CONTINENT are always highly interesting to pastors and to thoughtful laymen and women.

PRESBYTERIAN

WEEKLY

The Continent's Increasing Popularity

The publishing year ending with September, 1913, has in every way been the most satisfactory in the history of The Continent. Our paid circulation is larger than that ever secured by a periodical of The Continent's special class. No better guaranty could be given of our increasing popularity.

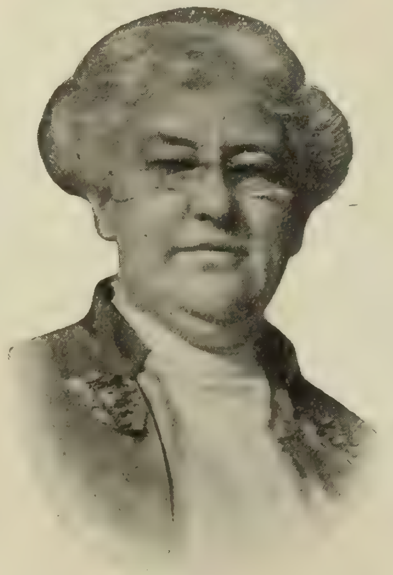
The Continent's family of readers extends to every state in the union, besides all provinces in Canada. The completeness with which it covers every section where there are Presbyterians, and the high character of its subscribers, put its recognized standing as the National Presbyterian Weekly beyond just dispute.

Published for Christian Service

The Continent is not given away in order to swell its circulation. Every dollar paid in by its subscribers goes into the paper to make it more attractive and more helpful. The Continent is conducted for service—not for dividends.

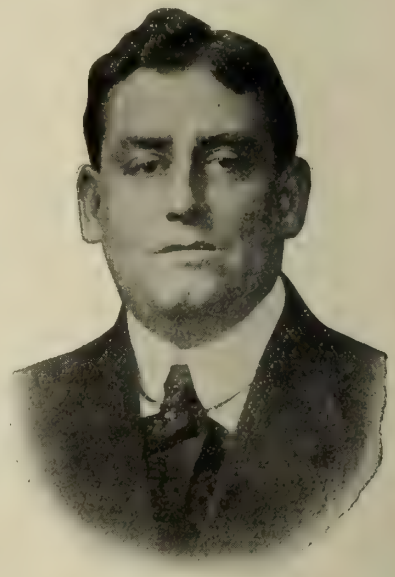
EDWARD A. WICHER

From his experience as pastor and theological professor offers his best thought on the weekly devotional topic.



MARY E. MCDOWELL

Tells CONTINENT readers what she has seen and learned in social work near the Chicago stockyards—chapters of real life.



JOHN TIMOTHY STONE

Moderator, busy pastor in a busy city; but he takes time to write inspiring devotional articles for THE CONTINENT.

The Continent Has a Larger Paid Circulation than ever before secured by any periodical of its class. This attests genuine appreciation

J. L. SCOTT

Every Sunday school superintendent and teacher in THE CONTINENT family knows what a valuable help his comments are.

MARION HARLAND

"Chief counselor to the women of America." Respected and loved by all. Writes for no other religious paper.

WILLIAM PIERSON MERRILL

His devotional articles in THE CONTINENT are notable. Dr. Merrill is pastor of the famous Brick church, New York.

Our list of contributors could scarcely be excelled. The men and women actively associated with the management are successful workers of large publishing experience. The fifty-two issues of each year, embodying the best family religious journalism, give to our readers, for only $2.50, a paper that, if measured by commercial standards of value, should cost the subscriber a much larger amount.

Our ambition for the coming year is a constantly better paper. We have faith that continued support and cooperation of our readers will extend The Continent's field of influence.

Many New and Important Features

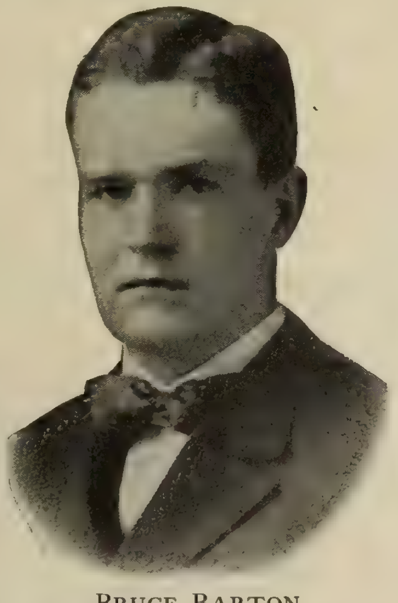
It is impossible in the limited space of this issue to tell, even in a small way, what we are planning for the year to come. The portraits shown on these pages are only a few of those on our list of contributors. We will endeavor to tell from week to week about some of the special features, and the several departments. Watch for these announcements. It will be worth your while, for it is our purpose to make such a paper that you cannot afford to miss a single issue.

WILFRED T. GRENFELL

The missionary physician among the people of isolated Labrador. His stories give a reality to Christian life.

HELEN B. MONTGOMERY

Women interested in missions read her messages with eagerness. She writes from a heart full of love for this work.



BRUCE BARTON

In his own fresh and vigorous style tells of men whose influence has changed the lives of others. His work is unique.

ADA PATTERSON

Writes the actual experience of those who are living for others. Hers are "human interest" stories of the best sort.

Find Name of Forgotten Church

Philadelphia Has Live Subject of Research for Historical Society—Work for Uniform Sunday School Lessons.

PHILADELPHIA—There was recently dug up near Seventh and Lombard streets a white marble slab on which was inscribed "The Fourteenth Presbyterian Church, Founded A. D. 1823. Enlarged A. D. 1837." Strange to say, no one seems to have any knowledge of the church and no records of it exist. It opens opportunity for research on the part of the Presbyterian Historical society.

Dr. Robert Hunter will celebrate the thirtieth anniversary of his pastorate of Union Tabernacle church Sept. 28. This church was formed in 1892 by the consolidation of Kensington church, of which Dr. Hunter had been pastor for nine years, and York Street church, formerly Reformed Presbyterian. It is one of the strongest churches, having a membership of 971 and 1,201 in the Sunday school.

May Syndicate Lesson Studies

The following representatives of the Presbyterian and Reformed Boards of Publication met recently in the Witherspoon building: Dr. Alexander Henry, Presbyterian church; Rev. R. J. Miller, U. P. church; Dr. A. L. Phillips, Southern Presbyterian; Dr. Houser, Reformed Church, and Dr. R. Douglass Fraser of Toronto, Canada. Lesson syndication was the subject of the conference. An effort will be made to bring the publication agencies of the Presbyterian and Reformed Churches into closer union and cooperation.

The Woman's Foreign Missionary society of the Presbyterian church held its opening fall prayer meeting in Westminster hall Sept. 16. Miss M. E. Allis and Mrs. Woodruff Jones were the leaders.

Following the arrangement of the business department of the Board of Publication to introduce moving pictures into churches and Sunday schools as a means of education for the children there have been afternoon and evening exhibitions in the Witherspoon auditorium by a private company of scenes and characters from Victor Hugo's "Les Miserables."

Dr. W. B. Dixon, for many years an elder in Frankford First church, recently celebrated with Mrs. Dixon the sixty-third anniversary of their marriage. They are 86 and 84 years of age, respectively, and have long been active in charitable work.

The most prominent Congregational church of the city, Central, has called as pastor Rev. W. V. D. Berg of St. Louis. Mr. Berg is the grandson of a somewhat famous former Philadelphia Dutch Reformed pastor, Dr. Joseph Berg. He is a graduate of Lafayette College and Hartford Theological Seminary.

Refuse New Per Capita Assessment

Philadelphia North Presbytery was entertained by the ladies of Ambler church, Rev. George J. Crist pastor. It dissolved the pastoral relation of Rev. A. D. Baillie with Edington church and upon his declaration that he renounced the authority of and all connection with the Presbyterian Church and intended to be an independent minister, it was ordered that his name be dropped from the roll of presbytery and publication made of the fact. Presbytery declined to add one-half cent per communicant to the regular assessment for the use of the General Assembly committee on vacancy and supply. It approved the steps already taken for union with the Reformed Church. Mission aid from the synod was asked to the extent of $2,800. It was directed that out of the funds contributed by the churches for home missions the presbyterial treasurer be directed to apply $5,000 to church extension work of presbytery, $3,500 to missionary work of synod and the balance of the $16,000 aimed to be raised to the work of the Home Board. The report of the committee on foreign missions showed $51,696 contributed the past year as against $39,465 the previous year, a rate of $2.58 per member.

At the meeting of Philadelphia Presbytery Rev. R. A. Stout was received from the Reformed Church and will be installed pastor of Green Hill church Oct. 25. Four young men were taken under the care of presbytery as candidates for the ministry, one being the son of Dr. C. A. R. Janvier, recently departed to India. A resolution protesting against the renomination of Judge Norris S. Barratt to the common pleas bench, owing to his action favoring the licensing of saloons, was passed.

The Africa Inland Mission, with office in this city, recently held a reception for a party of five missionaries who with nine others soon after departed for interior Africa.

Two Sons Will Enter Ministry

St. Louis Pastor Gives Children for Church Service—Merged Congregations Rescind Action—Study Presbyterial Needs.

ST. LOUIS—William D. Johnson and O. M. Johnson, both sons of Rev. Jerrie Johnson, pastor of Winnebago church, presented themselves simultaneously at the September meeting of presbytery as candidates for the ministry. The two young men, together with Irving Heinritz, who was also taken under the care of presbytery, will enter Dubuque College and Seminary this fall. A fourth young man, James Ferguson of Washington and Compton Avenue church, was received and will pursue his studies at Louisville Seminary.

Covenant church, previously granted permission to dissolve its merger with North church, has effected a separate organization.

The regular fall meeting of presbytery was held in Tyler Place church Sept. 22 and 23. Moderator Francis W. Russell of West church spoke on "Present Presbyterial Needs and Conditions," instead of delivering a sermon. On the second day besides the usual business there was a series of conferences on "Prayer Meeting and Personal Work," "Work Among the Young People," "Men's Work," and "The Sabbath School Situation." The closing session was devoted to a consideration of the "Sunday Evening Service," the discussion being led by Dr. W. J. McKittrick.

Rev. Frank B. Cleland, for three years assistant to Dr. S. J. Niccolls of Second church, has been supplying Carondelet church since the middle of June. The church has extended a call to him to become its pastor.

Rev. Wayne H. Bowers, former pastor of Maple Avenue Reformed church and more recently summer supply pastor at West church, will sail November 1 for Spain, where he has been assigned to duty by the American Board of the Congregational church. He will succeed Dr. William H. Gulick, pioneer in the Spanish field, who went there more than forty years ago. Mr. Bowers will have supervision of several churches having native pastors, and also a school for girls at Barcelona.

Rev. A. F. McGarrah, church extension superintendent of Presbytery, has been granted a leave of absence for a few months to serve as special representative of Assembly's joint executive committee. He will make his headquarters in New York until after the simultaneous every-member campaign. Church extension work in this presbytery will in the meantime be in the hands of the federated committee.

The Bible Training School opened in Washington and Compton Avenue church. Dr. J. H. Gauss, superintendent, is encouraged with the enrollment.

Expect Many at Purity Congress

It is expected that there will be at least 2,000 delegates at the congress of the World's Purity Federation in Minneapolis Nov. 7-12. Two-thirds of the governors of states have named official representatives to the meeting, which will be addressed by a large number of prominent speakers, including Senator W. S. Kenyon, Virginia Brooks Washburne, Catherine Booth Clibborn, Dr. Charles M. Sheldon, Dr. C. W. Gordon ("Ralph Connor"), Mary M. Bartelme, Mrs. Florence Kelly, R. P. Hobson, Dr. Wilbur F. Crafts and Arthur Capper.

HAPPY OLD AGE

Most Likely to Follow Proper Eating

As old age advances we require less food to replace waste, and food that will not overtax the digestive organs, while supplying true nourishment.

Such an ideal food is found in Grape-Nuts, made of whole wheat and barley by long baking and action of diastase in the barley which changes the starch into a most digestible sugar.

The phosphates also, placed up under the outer coat of the wheat, are included in Grape-Nuts, but are lacking in white flour because the outer coat of the wheat darkens the flour and is left out by the miller. These natural phosphates are necessary to the well balanced building of muscle, brain and nerve cells.

"I have used Grape-Nuts," writes an Iowa man, "for eight years and feel as good and am stronger than I was ten years ago.

"Among my customers I meet a man every day who is well along in years and attributes his good health to Grape-Nuts and Postum, which he has used for the last five years. He mixes Grape-Nuts with Postum and says they go fine together.

"For many years before I began to eat Grape-Nuts, I could not say that I enjoyed life or knew what it was to be able to say 'I am well.' I suffered greatly with constipation, but now my habits are as regular as ever in my life.

"Whenever I make extra effort I depend on Grape-Nuts food and it just fills the bill. I can think and write a great deal easier."

"There's a Reason." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true and full of human interest.

Eight Sail for African Fields

California Contributes Four Presbyterians—Bright Prospects for New York Bible Training School Home Board Enriched.

NEW YORK—A party of eight missionary recruits sailed Saturday to join the Africa Inland Mission, whose stations in British and German East Africa were made famous by the commendation they received from ex-President Roosevelt. Six more, including two Americans who sailed earlier, will join the party in London. Among these recruits are six Presbyterians, four from California: Rev. Thomas Hannay and wife of Berkeley and Harry P. Herdman and Hugh H. Wallace, Los Angeles. Mr. Hannay, formerly a cowboy in Nevada, has exercised an exceptional influence among young people of the Christian Endeavor fellowship in California. Mr. and Mrs. Isaac Caldwell of Wisconsin are graduates of Moody Bible Institute and were recently engaged in home mission work in North Dakota.

Dr. J. C. Rauscher of Astoria Reformed church will speak before the Ministers' association next Monday.

Rev. Bayard Dodge, nephew of Dr. David Stuart Dodge, president of the Home Board, is now en route to Beirut, Syria, to become Y. M. C. A. college secretary. Mr. Dodge is traveling with Dr. Howard S. Bliss, president of Syrian Protestant College at Beirut, and his daughter, Miss Mary S. Bliss, who is to wed Mr. Dodge and join him in his missionary work.

The new year of the Bible Teachers' Training School opens Oct. 1. Dr. O. P. Gifford of Brookline, Mass., will deliver an address at 4 o'clock. During the summer alterations have been made which will greatly improve the school facilities. The adjoining property to the rear of the main building has been altered. This will enable the consolidation of the office force. It will also increase the space of the library and will give another dining room. The prospects are that the attendance will exceed that of any previous year.

MR. STELZLE SPEAKS ON EFFICIENCY

On Sunday Rev. Charles Stelzle spoke on church efficiency before the convention of the National Efficiency Society at Lake Placid. Except for Mr. Stelzle, the membership of the association is almost wholly composed of manufacturers and mechanical engineers.

By the will of the late Arthur Alexander Anderson the Home Board will receive $35,000 and possibly more "to be separately invested and the income used for mission work in New York City." An equal amount is left to the New York Bible society.

David G. Wylie, Jr., son of Dr. David G. Wylie, pastor of Scotch church, has decided to study for the ministry and has just entered Princeton Seminary. Mr. Wylie was graduated two years ago from New York University and since that time has been connected with the engineering department of the Consolidated Gas company of New York.

Rev. William Wallace Tenney is now serving as assistant to Dr. Hillis in Plymouth church, Brooklyn. This church is to dedicate the Beecher memorial next month, to which persons all over the United States have contributed. The memorial consists of a park as well as buildings, and it is possible that the body of the great preacher may be removed from Greenwood cemetery and find a resting place there.

Edward E. Peterson of Brooklyn, who has been associated with the evangelistic committee of New York City during the summer, went immediately at the close of the campaign to Madison Avenue church to work in the interests of the men's club for a short period.

Dr. Walter Laidlaw of the Federation of Churches addressed the civic forum of Labor Temple last evening on "Some Social Problems of the City." Dr. Jonathan C. Day, the pastor, will occupy his pulpit Oct. 5, when all activities in Labor Temple will be resumed.

Dr. George Alexander of New York City having found it impossible to serve on General Assembly's committee on relations with Union Seminary, A. V. V. Raymond, D. D., of Buffalo has been appointed by Moderator Stone to fill the vacancy.

Perry Week Blocked Churches

Rally Sunday Observed by Many Congregations Despite Distraction—Presbytery Meeting Postponed—Candidates Examined.

CLEVELAND—Gala week, devoted to the contennial commemoration of the battle of Lake Erie, was not the best time for special work in churches leading to the "Everybody in Church" Sunday, but many congregation made Sept. 21 a rally occasion, while others deferred that event until the first Sunday in October. Notwithstanding inclement weather the Perry parade was of extraordinary proportions.

On account of the Perry celebration the fall meeting of presbytery was postponed a week, meeting with Central church of Akron Sept. 23.

Presbyterial committee on examination of candidates met Sept. 15 in Old Stone church to examine Clarence S. Gee for licensure, prior to his returning as a senior to Auburn Seminary. Mr. Gee is a member of First church of Ashtabula and passed a very creditable test.

Phillips Avenue church has extended a call to Rev. William P. Thomas, at present in charge of Mayflower church. Mr. Thomas was the first pastor of Boulevard church and in the decade of that relationship laid a splendid foundation for that prosperous congregation. The Mayflower section of the city offers one of the best possible oportunities for work among foreigners. During the past summer the vacation school enrollment at Mayflower was the largest, reaching 300.

Rev. Howard D. Chandler, son of Elder F. M. Chandler of Woodland Avenue church, has accepted a call to home mission work in Washington. He spent a number of years teaching in Turkey.

A Mother's Monument

A loving daughter and son of a sainted mother sent the following letter to Ministerial Relief and Sustentation, under date of August 25th, 1913.

"Enclosed we hand you check for ten thousand dollars ($10,000).

"This sum we donate for the use and maintenance of your society in loving memory of our mother, ____________, who, during her lifetime, took keen interest in your work, and we feel that the stamp of approval would be set upon this donation by her, were she living."

These faithful children have erected a monument more enduring than marble to the memory of their mother. Are there other sons and daughters who will follow their example?

Prepare for the Sunday Meetings

Pittsburg Evangelistic Committee Is Active—Presbytery Plans the Elimination of Overchurched Conditions.

PITTSBURG—The city evangelistic committee has just closed one of its most successful summer campaigns. At the meeting Sept. 15 encouraging reports were heard from the community extension committee, which has carried on work in the shops, parks and downtown centers. One of the leading features of the summer work was the vacation Bible schools in the neglected districts. The committee will proceed at once to prepare for the Billy Sunday meetings, which will begin Dec. 28 and continue for eight weeks.

The September meeting of presbytery was held in First church with an unusually large attendance. A feature of the meeting was the adoption of rules to govern the election of delegates to synod and Assembly. Nominations are to be made to a special committee, which will print them with the date of last representation of the church. The name of the church that has been longest without representation will be placed first. A committee on church polity was instructed to seek the appointment of similar committees in other church bodies with a view to an adjustment of churches in overcrowded sections.

Pittsburg is observing the 125th anniversary of the organization of Allegheny county. The exercises began Sunday, Sept. 21, in the churches. Every pastor was asked to observe the day by preaching a patriotic sermon. At 3 o'clock a general meeting was held in Soldiers' Memorial hall.

Evangelist Lyons and R. E. Mitchell are holding a union evangelistic campaign in Crafton. P. W. SNYDER.

At a recent meeting of the Presbyterian association Dr. McJunkin of Oakdale read a paper on "The Country Churches in Pennsylvania." Among the ministers who discussed the paper were Chancellor S. B. McCormick, Dr. J. T. Gibson, Dr. J. M. Duff and Dr. P. W. Snyder. Dr. R. J. ("Catch-My-Pal") Patterson of Ireland made a plea for the movement of which he is the originator.

An evangelistic movement of all the churches of Carnegie has been inaugurated.

The Continent's Cover Page This Week

The indoor days have come once more; days when the porch is exchanged for the fireside, and the pungent odor of burning logs fills the air. Chopping bowl and pickling jar hold honor places beside the kitchen range; shelves are filling with the fruits of farm and orchard, turned by housewifely alchemy into golden promises of joys to come. Family life, interrupted by vacation flittings, with renewed tenderness reknits itself together around the study lamp. Father with his paper, mother, busy-fingered, with her needle, the young folks with their books—what fairer picture has the summer held? What ardent beauty that can match the hearthside cheer when the wind sings in the chimney and the nights are chill? The Dutch maiden in the cover picture feels, too, a tranquil joy in her indoor task, as she winds her yarn and dreams of grown-up days when spindle and reel shall be perchance her own. Little maid over the seas, you in your neat-tiled kitchen, we by our study lamp—one flame warms us both. It is the hearthfire of home. (The picture is from a painting by Herman Knopf.)

Dr. Holt for Relief Board

W. S. Holt, D. D., of Portland, Ore., who has been with the Home Mission Board on the Pacific coast for many years, has been elected associate secretary with Dr. William Hiram Foulkes of the Board of Ministerial Relief and Sustentation. He will begin his work in November.

Local committees have been appointed in Oklahoma City to supervise the preliminary arrangements for the missionary campaign in which a number of denominations will join, to be held in Oklahoma for three weeks beginning Dec. 7. Dr. C. E. Bradt and J. M. Patterson of the Foreign Board will join forces with their workers and hold a series of meetings similar to the conferences last winter at Fargo, N. D. The program will embrace missionary talks and conferences concerning all foreign fields, leading to special emphasis on the every-member canvass. The best known men of a number of denominations, including Robert E. Speer, and Bishop Hendrix of the M. E. Church South, are expected to participate. Efforts will be made to carry the message of the conference to other cities of the state.

Tennessee

A new church was dedicated Sept. 7 by Kirkwood congregation in Burlington, a suburb of Knoxville.

W. R. Dawson, D. D., and Rev. J. M. Alexander, both busy pastors, took a part of their vacation in conducting evangelistic services in two of the vacant churches, Morganton and Caledonia. As a result a number of members were added to each church.

As a result of the recent decision involving the ownership of Presbyterian property in Tennessee, Grace church, Nashville, which for eighteen months has been in possession of the Cumberland Church, has passed to the possession of the Presbyterian Church U. S. A. This congregation has recently been worshiping in the chapel of Peabody College. Grace church cost about $27,000 and belonged to the Cumberland Church at the time of the union. It is expected that a pastor will be called soon. The Cumberland congregation will probably worship in Westminster church.

South Dakota

According to the agreement under which Presbyterians and Congregationalists of South Dakota are operating, the temporary suspension of church work by any denomination occupying a field is not of itself sufficient warrant for the entrance of another denomination there. It has also been decided that a feeble church should be strengthened if possible rather than a new one established. The preferences of the community in regard to the denomination of a church are respected not only by the two denominations joining in this agreement but also by other communions participating in the state federation of churches.

Idaho

An organization of Boy Scouts has recently been added to the activities of Hollister church, where the interest has been growing under the pastorate of Rev. B. J. Treiber.

On account of the large number of accessions since the coming of Dr. John F. Shepherd of Twin Falls church, the construction of a larger church has become imperative.

Georgia

The corner stone of First church, Brooklyn, was laid Sept. 6 by the pastor, Rev. S. E. Koons, assisted by Rev. J. H. Burnworth, pastor of the Brethren church, Brooklyn. When completed about Feb. 1 it will be one of the most complete church buildings for all kinds of church activity in the vicinity.

Ohio

The Sunday evangelistic association of Columbus has issued a pamphlet containing signed statements of the results of the evangelistic campaign of Rev. William A. Sunday in that city. There is also a spirited defense of Mr. Sunday and his methods by Judge David F. Pugh in answer to a recently published criticism of Mr. Sunday by Dr. Washington Gladden.

The 100th anniversary of Troy First church was celebrated Sept. 7-14 by a reunion of former pastors and members of the church. The church entertained presbytery during the week of its celebration and the event brought to Troy a large number of Ohio church men. Special programs were held each evening. Among the speakers during the week were Dr. William Hiram Foulkes, Dr. Edward T. Swiggett, Dr. Lester F. Boyce, Dr. J. King Gibson, Dr. Samuel S. Palmer and Rev. Theophilus J. Gaehr. Rev. Robert H. Dunaway is pastor.

New York

The wife of Dr. C. Grant Hazard, the pastor of Christ church, Catskill, died recently.

After being closed for a number of months for improvements, North church, Binghamton, resumed services with a concert. The interior of the building has been entirely redecorated.

Repairs costing $2,300 are being made in Cohocton church. There has been a marked increase in all the services during the year. Rev. S. Horace Beshgatour has been on the field.

West church, Binghamton, mourns the recent accident which prevents its long-time sexton from doing his accustomed work. Mr. Tanner was struck by a street car while riding a bicycle and narrowly escaped with his life.

Women who desire entertainment at the meeting of the synodical society of home missions in Auburn Oct. 22 are requested to send their names to Miss Minnie E. Lauren, 107½ Franklin street, Auburn.

On the return of Rev. Charles G. Richards from his vacation the congregation of First church, Auburn, met him at the train and after taking him to an informal gathering on the church lawn gave him an automobile to assist him in covering his large parish.

The centennial of First church, Franklinville, was celebrated Aug. 31 and Sept. 1. Although the society was organized in 1813 by a representative of the Connecticut Missionary Society, it was not until 1828 that it was reorganized as a Presbyterian church. Since 1865 the church has been growing in strength to a marked degree. At the services there were present all of the former pastors who are now living—J. E. Tinker, J. L. Landis, R. R. Watkins, George Storner—and the present pastor, Robert G. Higginbotham. A number of neighboring pastors of other denominations assisted in the services.

Missouri

A stone and stucco building to cost $3,000 has been planned at Hollister, to be located on a site overlooking the lake.

According to Associated Press reports, Rev. E. H. Gelvin, pastor of First church, Warrensburg, in announcing his acceptance of the call to Hammond Avenue church, Superior, Wis., said that he first had received the call in a dream.

Evangelists Burk and Hobbs are in the midst of a union meeting at Callao. The whole community is being moved, and the different churches are working together. There have been a large number of professions and the interest is increasing. The meeting is being held in a large tabernacle and over a thousand people were present on a recent Sunday night.

Utah

Twenty-two missionaries en route from the East to China and Japan under the Foreign Board on a recent Sunday evening took the principal part in a special missionary service at First church, Salt Lake City. A number of the vistors told of their reason for going to the foreign field.

Michigan

Half of the basement of the Warren Avenue church, Saginaw, which was left unfinished when the building was completed, is now to be fitted up at a cost of $2,500 and used for social gatherings. In order to accommodate the 900 pupils in Sunday school a twelve-room residence adjoining the church was obtained some time ago and transformed into a church house. The Sunday school organized in the Bohemian settlement by the pastor, Rev. J. A. Dunkel, promises to grow into a mission church.

Illinois

A class for the study of Presbyterian church history has been organized among the C. E members of Equality church by the pastor, Rev T. V. Hunt.

Arrangements have been made by Rev. E. Craven, pastor at Cobden, to exchange services with Rev. O. S. Edwards of Grand Tower for a series of revival meetings this fall. The Cobden church has recently been redecorated.

Evangelist Frank A. Miller of Elgin, who gave chalk talks at Winona Bible conference, has been engaged by the management to take charge of the work for boys and girls next year and enlarge the work to include care of little children on the grounds during audito-

Advancing in Food Sense

The Servant Problem and the Meat Problem Are Easily Solved by the Housewife Who Knows How to Use Well-Cooked Cereals and Fruits in Season

The servant problem in summer in most homes is even more troublous than the meat problem. A discussion of the meat question is idle and futile, anyway, if there is no one in the house to cook the meat. It is rather amazing in these times of widespread dietetic intelligence to find in most homes the housewife baking and stewing over the kitchen stove in an effort to cook meat for a dinner or supper when the family would be in much better health and their appetites much better satisfied with a meal of ready-cooked, ready-to-serve shredded wheat biscuit with fresh fruit and some green vegetables, such as lettuce, peas, or string beans. A diet of this kind not only relieves the housekeeper of much worry and care, but also relieves the body that has been laboring under a burden of indigestible meats and starchy vegetables.

Shredded wheat biscuit is a boon to housekeepers in summer not only because it supplies all the strength-giving nutriment needed during the hot months and in a most digestible form, but because it is ready-cooked and ready-to-serve. With shredded wheat biscuit in the house it is easy to prepare a delicious wholesome, nourishing meal in a few moments by serving the biscuit with milk or cream or with sliced peaches, berries or other fresh fruits. If the appetite is not fully satisfied with a meal of this kind it is easy to add some of the green vegetables, such as lettuce peas and string beans, forming a combination that will keep a person at top-notch efficiency whether employed in mental or physical pursuits. It is one of the remarkable things about shredded wheat biscuit that it is eaten by athletes as well as invalids. It is the favorite food of rowing crews training for college regattas and also the favorite food of convalescents in hospitals and sanitariums. For children it supplies all the elements needed to perfectly build every part of the growing body, while in adults it supplies the material necessary to repair the daily waste of tissue and energy and it does it in such a way as to impose no tax or burden upon the digestive organs.

While it is true that we are advancing every year in food sense, it is a remarkable fact that there are still many women in this country who do not know how easily they could close up their kitchens in the hot summer months and have wholesome, nourishing and delicious meals, without ever building a fire in the cook stove. The fact is most families in summer would be much better off if the kitchen door were padlocked and the cook discharged. This happy consummation is possible in any home where the housewife knows the nutritive value and culinary uses of shredded wheat biscuit, a food that contains all the body-building elements in the whole wheat grain in their most digestible form.

rium meetings. Mr. Miller opened his fall evangelistic work at Peoria Sept. 14 and Oct. 1 goes to Huntley.

An evangelistic campaign commenced in Fancy Prairie church Sept. 7 under the leadership of Evangelist J. C. Ludgate. Splendid crowds have attended the services. Rev. Benjamin Berryhill is pastor.

Dr. W. S. Plumer Bryan, moderator of synod and chairman of synod's committee on education, addressed the educational conference which was held in connection with the meeting of Alton Presbytery at Carlinville.

New Jersey

Dr. John Macnaughtan, who has just resigned as pastor of Ogden Memorial church at Chatham, on account of advancing years, will not accept another regular pastorate.

Dr. William W. Knox, pastor of First church, New Brunswick, Sept. 14 celebrated the twentieth anniversary of his pastorate there. In addition to other congregations, presbytery sent a committee to express its good wishes.

The New Jersey team representing the united missionary campaign got together for the first time in Atlantic City last Sunday and Monday. It is composed of David McConaughy, Presbyterian; Colonel Halford, Methodist; Dr. Breed, Congregationalist; Dr. Farnum, Baptist.

Dr. George T. Liggett has begun work as pastor of the historic church of Springfield, which is famous for its association with the revolutionary battle in which Parson Caldwell tore up the hymnbooks and served out the fragments to the patriot troops for wadding for their guns.

The recently published posters by the city of Cambridge, Mass., and by the city government of Paris, France, concerning the danger of alcoholism were reproduced in connection with a large announcement of meetings recently held at Ridgewood, N. J., to oppose the licensing of local hotels to sell liquor.

Hackettstown church, Rev. James W. Martyn pastor, celebrated last week its 150th anniversary. To give distinction to the celebration, Newton Presbytery held its autumn meeting with the church and the congratulations of all the presbyters were extended in the closing session of the body, when greetings were presented by the moderator, Rev. James Ferguson of Stewartsville, and by the stated clerk, Rev. E. Clarke Cline.

Washington

Rev. A. M. Williams, district educational superintendent, recently held a conference at First church, North Yakima.

Work on the new building of First church, Walla Walla, is being pushed rapidly and it is expected that the edifice will be completed soon.

The plan of the men of First church, Seattle, to present their pastor, Dr. Mark A. Matthews, with an automobile for his pastoral use was frustrated by the refusal of Dr. Matthews to accept the prospective gift. He said that he thought the money could be spent better for the extension of the kingdom of God, although he was grateful to the men for their interest.

Indiana

The corner stone of Remington church was laid Sept. 14. Mrs. V. M. Beal had the place of honor as the only charter member present. Local fellow pastors of M. E. and Christian churches spoke briefly and Rev. J. C. Parrett of Renssalaer church and Rev. Gibson Wilson of Oxford church participated. The old church built in 1865 was valued at $2,000, the present one at $12,000. Rev. Edward H. Bull is pastor.

Wisconsin

President W. O. Carrier of Carroll College says that the enrollment of students at Waukesha is more than last year and that the new college year is specially hopeful.

Student Alexander C. McMullen when Gordon was destroyed by fire and the place of meeting wiped out rallied the Christian people and friends and is erecting a neat and comfortable chapel which will soon be ready for meetings and Sunday school. At Wascott and Gordon communicant classes have been formed and nearly twenty young people enrolled.

In addition to his labors as pastor at Shawano Rev. A. J. McGreaham holds regular services in the new church at Gresham with good attendance and promise of growth.

Student E. C. Morgan during the past summer has been doing effective service at New Amsterdam and when Rev. R. A. Carnahan came to conduct the communion service several adults were baptized and a number of new members received.

The missionary work of seminary students has been remarkably successful in Wisconsin. Ward F. Boyd, a senior in McCormick Seminary, has been serving the church in Belleville for the third year and the church has been strengthened in numbers and power for service.

Rev. D. C. Jones, pastor of First church, La Crosse, and his workers have been greatly blessed during his five years' ministry there. During the past year all the departments of the work were greatly strengthened. A mothers' circle of nearly a hundred has been organized.

Pennsylvania

Dr. C. G. Jordan, who has been pastor at Second church, Wilkinsburg, has resigned to reenter evangelistic work.

Pastors of Carlisle have started a movement among the clergy of the entire state in opposition to the remarriage of divorced persons.

Presbyteries Admit Many Candidates

Reports from the presbytery meetings which are now taking place show that the overture concerning the union with the Reformed Church is receiving favorable action practically everywhere it is presented. The cause of Christian education was well represented in most of the presbyteries, special meetings being held for the consideration of this subject. A large number of candidates for the ministry were examined and received in different parts of the country. The every-member canvass campaign has been entered upon with enthusiasm.

Approves Union — Marion Presbytery met in Spring Hills church. The proposed union with the Reformed Church was answered affirmatively.

Families Come with Dinner—Pleasant Valley church, the youngest in the youngest presbytery of South Dakota Synod, entertained the fall meeting of Reserve Presbytery. Whole families attended and feasted the presbytery with a picnic dinner in the shade of the schoolhouse on the prairie.

Favor Church Union—Fort Dodge Presbytery at Armstrong made Rev. J. H. Tice moderator. Ortie C. Carden of Lohrville and Omaha Seminary was licensed, as was H. T. Sockett. The union with the Reformed Church was favored. The committee on vacancy and supply was rejected as being an additional expense of doubtful value.

Business Man to Be Minister—Logansport Presbytery at Rensselaer received Thompson Turner, a business man of Walkerton, as a candidate for the ministry. He will enter McCormick Seminary. Sixty-four Hungarians from Gary presented a petition asking for the organization of a church. Presbytery favors union with Reformed Church. Presbytery decided to push every-member campaign in March.

Receive Two Ministerial Candidates—Zanesville Presbytery in Kane church elected Rev. John W. Myers moderator. Hobart C. Chapin and Howard T. Bay of New Concord were received as candidates for the ministry. Overture on union with Reformed Church was approved. Rev. Clair S. Adams of Decatur, Ill., gave an inspiring address on country life and work.

Plan to Use Bible in School—Des Moines Presbytery in session at Panora, Iowa, adopted resolutions presented by Rev. J. McGaughy directing the attention of ministers and the members of churches to the fact that the law says the Bible shall not be excluded from the public schools and that they be urged to use their utmost influence with school boards and parents, and the teachers to the end that the opportunity for the moral training of our youth be improved.

Every Church Has Minister—Sioux Falls Presbytery met at Hurley, S. D., Sept. 9. Rev. William E. Roberts was elected moderator. There were a number of things which made this meeting one of the best ever held by Presbytery. Every church was represented except one. For the first time in many years every church has either a stated supply or pastor. The conference on Christian education held the interest of all members of presbytery. Harry P. Gage, president elect of Huron College, gave an address.

Education Occupies Attention—Brownwood Presbytery met at Goldthwaite, Tex. The chief interest in the meeting was in the cause of education. President Hornbeak of Trinity University addressed the presbytery and the congregation present. Interest was shown in the contemplated campaign in the interest of Trinity University. Elder Arthur Low of Brownwood church was elected moderator. Permission was given Rev. R. E. Joiner to organize a Mexican church at San Angelo.

Organize C. E. Union—Rev. S. X. Cross was chosen moderator of Council Bluffs Presbytery at Avoca, Iowa, Sept. 16. Alister Short of Missouri Valley church was received as a candidate for the ministry. A committee was appointed to confer with and advise the students of Omaha Seminary now laboring in presbytery. The overture on union with the Reformed Church was affirmed. A presbyterial C. E. union was organized with W. C. Joseph as president. It will hold annual conferences in connection with the fall meetings of presbytery.

May Reduce Number of Committees—Rushville Presbytery at Warsaw, Ill., elected Rev. D. W. Morgan moderator. The plan to combine the Sunday school committee with those on home missions and church erection was defeated because of probable neglect of the religious education department in the discussions of presbytery and synod. Dr. W. R. King's resolution to reduce presbytery's permanent committees to two is being seriously considered. The plan contemplates making each committee member responsible for the work now assigned to a committee. These two committees will meet and deliberate before presbytery convenes. One stated meeting of presbytery annually is also being considered. Roy H. Boyd was received as a candidate for the ministry, recommended by Rushville church. Overture concerning union with the Reformed Church answered affirmatively. Special addresses were delivered by Rev. W. R. King and Rev. W. A. Hutchison.

Speaks on Men's Work—An address on brotherhood work was given by Dr. J. T. Henderson, associate secretary of the brotherhood, at the meeting of Rock River Presbytery, Rock Island, Ill. Other special speakers during the sessions were Dr. John S. Nollen, Lake Forest College, and Rev. N. W. Thornton, president of Geneseo Collegiate Institute.

Mission Churches Progress—At the fall meeting of West Jersey Presbytery at Pleasantville Rev. Samuel A. Harker was elected moderator. The Barrington church, lately a mission, was commended for its progress during the year. The presbytery heard with pleasure that the churches of Audubon, Camden Fourth and Haddon Heights have voluntarily assumed self-support.

Cooperate in Evangelism—Ozark Presbytery met at Everton. Rev. Hartford Pinkston was elected moderator. A special program of Christian education was carried out by Henry Little, D. D., Elder T. B. Davis and Dr. Harrison Hale. Rev. E. S. Brownlee presented the claims of Relief and Sustentation. A special committee reported a cooperative plan of evangelism for the entire presbytery.

Discuss Christian Education—Wheeling Presbytery met in Allen Grove church, Sherrard, W. Va., being preceded by a conference on Christian education with addresses by members of presbytery and by Rev. H. O. Gilson of Pittsburg. Rev. T. C. Pears, Jr., was elected moderator. Leroy Meyer of Second church, Wheeling, was received as a candidate for the ministry. Presbytery heartily voted to cooperate in the every-member canvass.

Hear of Philippine Missions—Columbia Presbytery at Greenvile, N. Y., Sept. 16, elected Rev. S. R. Warrender moderator and agreed to the proposed union with the Reformed Church. Rev. J. L. Harrington was elected director of Auburn Seminary. Resolutions of respect and esteem were adopted in view of the death of Rev. C. C. Thorne. J. B. Rodgers, D. D., of Manila addressed presbytery upon missions in the Philippines and Rev. F. E. Stockwell of Newburg presented the cause of Christian education as fostered by the College Board and Board of Education.

Enroll a New Church—Kearney Presbytery met at St. Paul, Neb. Rev. P. A. Davies of St. Paul was elected moderator. Favorable action was taken on the question of union with the Reformed Church. The proposed every-member canvass was heartily indorsed and the necessary committee appointed. A new church was reported by Rev. W. J. Primrose of Spaulding and enrolled as the Cedar Valley church. Christian education received a large consideration. President Crone of Hastings College gave an address at a popular meeting and Rev. Ralph H. Houseman spoke on efficiency in the Sunday school.

Christian Education Dominant Note—Indianapolis Presbytery met in Irvington church, Indianapolis, being opened with an address by F. W. Hinitt, D. D., president of Central University, Danville, Ky., upon the theme "Christian Education." This was the dominant note of the session and was followed by a conference in which Christian education was discussed by Rev. A. C. V. Skinner, Ph. D., Dr. F. O. Ballard and R. C. Hughes, D. D., who also spoke of the newly purchased house for the university pastor at Bloomington. David Van Dyke, D. D., was placed upon the honorably retired roll, having served over fifty-one years. Owing to the removal of many of the members of Beech Grove church it was dissolved. The church building will be purchased by the Methodists. The dissolution of two other churches was encouraged—Putnamville and Bainbridge. This action was not due to any late changes in the community so much as to the modern principle of denominational comity. The every-member canvass was approved. Harry W. Campbell of Second church was examined and taken under care of presbytery. The standing rules were amended to provide for a permanent committee on brotherhood.

MINISTERIAL OBITUARY

Benjamin F. Bittinger, D. D.—Dr. Bittinger, who had been stated clerk of Washington City Presbytery for forty years, died last week at the age of 90. He was born in Waynesboro, Pa., and was graduated from Princeton Seminary in 1847. After holding pastorates in Pennsylvania he was called to Washington in 1868. He was the author of a manual on Presbyterian law and usage.

Financial Situation

Farmer Profits Largely by Smaller Production This Year—Consumer Is Paying Constantly Increasing Prices.

In spite of the reduction in the size of the harvest due to drought, which in some sections is the worst experienced for thirty years, there has been no effect of corresponding importance upon trade or investments. Bonds seem to grow stronger in appeal, although some issues now are the lowest they have been in fifteen years. Holders of farm mortgages who have studied the situation in which the average farmer finds himself this fall are not at all concerned about the safety of their security. Farm loans are usually made for five years and in a country like this a serious setback in one harvest in parts of the country is overcome before the end of that period.

According to figures compiled by agricultural publications, the farmer will be the one to profit most by the short crop of corn and oats this fall. It is estimated that while the total agricultural product is 22 per cent less than last year the revenue will be 6 per cent greater on account of the higher price per unit. This means, it is estimated, that the farmer will receive about $5,000,000,000, or $269,000,000 more than last year. Various individuals with small reserves undoubtedly have been hit hard in some sections of the country, but business in general will not suffer. The decrease in the cotton crop has been followed by a rise in price so that the farmers of the South share in this increase in wealth.

One Year Shows Big Price Advance

Meanwhile the consumer is paying as much for food as he was last May, according to the index figure of Bradstreet's, which for September showed an upward slant of 1 per cent. The federal government has just published the result of a long study of retail prices in forty large cities of the country. The result only confirms the other reports and shows that on June 15 the cost of living was 60 per cent higher than the average between 1890 and 1900 and nearly 15 per cent higher than two years ago. Of the fourteen articles of food investigated bacon showed the largest advance, soaring 128 per cent. All meats advanced more than 72 per cent from the average of 1890 to 1900. Sugar alone declined. During the past year in the forty cities bacon went up 16 per cent, smoked ham 14 per cent, eggs 11, butter 5.8, and milk 4 per cent.

E. H. Gary, chairman of the United States Steel Corporation, on his return from Europe recently pointed to the large money value of the crops and suggested that it would be difficult seriously to affect a country which can produce as much wealth each year as this. The Balkan war caused a large depression of business in foreign countries.

A reader of this column in commenting on the report of the discussion between church officials on various investments urges that the moral and civic advantages of owning a home often outweigh purely financial considerations. It is true that many men gain a larger interest in affairs of their town, pay more attention to candidates for office and examine more closely how the taxes are spent after buying a home than before. For men of comparatively small means, a home is one of the best investments that can be made. It provides a shelter for the family, no matter what may befall, whereas in a rented house a regular income must be assured to retain a place to sleep. More than one man has been led first to save by his desire to have a home of his own.

Views of a Minister's Daughter

He looks complacently content in his pew.

The patient reader, if he has read so far, is going to ask what all this has to do with the question of our ministers' marrying. It has a great deal to do with it. Only one side of the problem has been touched. Shall the minister sacrifice his wife and children, or deny himself, provided the average salary remains what it now is? I feel perfectly safe in making the statement that from the professional classes a larger per cent of ministers' children enter into their life work with broader, richer visions of usefulness than many of their richer neighbors ever possess. It would be interesting to know how many of our able men not in the ministry have been raised in a parsonage. It would be worth the trouble, if one knew where to look, to discover the ministers' children among our literary people. There are certainly opportunities for a liberal education in a minister's home, provided, of course, the minister has a breadth of vision.

If the young minister feels he has a moral right to ask a woman to face privation and sacrifice with him, we can, I fear, never prevent it, but we can certainly lessen the sting of poverty and the load of care for them by seeing that the minister receives his proper amount of salary. At present his average salary reduces him to the laboring class. The carpenter and the bricklayer earn more a day. The high cost of living, or spending, has given cook, chambermaid, gardener, chauffeur and mill hand a corresponding increase of wages, but never a penny goes to the increase of the minister's salary. The high cost of living affects the minister fully as much as it does the butcher. True, the minister can often take advantage of reduced fares and discounts offered as a "sop to Cerberus," but "Paddy" has a pass, and the lawyer, the doctor, the writer and the actor have the same discount, with the certainty that their wages will be paid when due, while the poor minister waits and hopes and struggles along because he as a minister must "possess his soul in patience." The lawyer will not consider your case without his fee; if your doctor cannot collect his bills you are probably put on a "blacklist," and yet you are willing to place your minister in the list of the uncertain or slow pay because it is not convenient to meet his salary on time or his salary is but a mere pittance when paid.

It is well occasionally to ask ourselves a few plain questions. Am I paying as much, not as little as I can? Do we pay our minister by the month or by the quarter? If in quarterly installments, why? Does not the minister have to meet his obligations as well as other honest folk? Is he not liable to misfortune and special needs as well as the rest of us? If our church owns a parsonage what kind of a landlord are we? Do we really look after repairs? Do I personally ever inquire about the finances of my own church, or do I grumble and postpone my dues? Would I neglect my club dues in the same way?

The "dead line at 50"—what an ugly phrase it is. Can we not change it to "the firing line at 50"?—for at 50 a man is just in his prime. Who wants to hear a youth fresh from the seminary discourse a pretty little essay on the trials of this life? His faith has not been tempered by trial; his hopes have not been seasoned by experience; his life has not been strengthened by temptation, he is just entering the lists with a soul untried by suffering. What are you going to do for him? Handicap him by the "shabby gentility" of an insufficient income, and when he reaches the age of 50, put him on the "invalid corps" with a pittance of $200 or $300 per year while his faithful wife either starves to death or lives on her relations?

A Great Mistake for Ministers Not to Wed

The minister makes many mistakes—he is very human—but it would be a great mistake for him to remain single. In order to enter fully and understand the experiences of others he must know these experiences first hand. The home training is quite as essential for the minister as the pulpit practice. He must know to know others. Somebody asks about the priest. This is not a discussion of priesthood. The priest has the confessional, wherein he hears the experiences of his parishioners, while the minister hears only what you choose to tell him. There are incompetent ministers in the church and many incompetent wives, but they are in the minority. There are incompetent persons in other callings. We must not forget the splendid services, the faithful devotion of the great majority while we are looking at the failures and the weaknesses of the minority who have mistaken their calling or are too sadly handicapped to carry on their work in the proper way.

As a minister's daughter I am glad to be of some service, however slight it may be, to the church and the community. I am glad to entertain the "strangers," for we have discovered many real friends among them. I am glad to teach in the Sunday school; it is giving me courage and power for better work. A class in the Sunday school is an inspiration and those who do not teach miss a great deal. I am glad to help in every way I can the missionary society; it is opening my heart to a larger view of the world's needs. I am glad to do what I can. At the most it will never be all that I want it to be. But I do object to doing somebody else's work. I object to being both Martha and Mary. I only ask for justice. I ask enough merely to do my work well without having the constant dread of poverty, without the constant burden and fear of how shall I end my days. I do not want to be better off than the parishioners, but I do want enough to feel that I can relax occasionally without making redoubled efforts when the work is resumed. I do not want to have to work all through the vacation. I do not want to deny myself the "tools" needed in my work because the church is too stingy to provide a living wage.

I ask this in the name of the ministers' wives and families and for the ministers who have grown weary of holding out empty hands to you.

Taking Fees for Funerals

Anent Marion Harland's article "Should Protestant Ministers Marry?" particularly the statement that the salary paid the ministers secures all his energies and time, I wish to express a somewhat divergent view and call attention to an abuse on the part of many ministers of their high calling.

I refer to the practice of ministers' accepting fees for their services at funerals. Now if there is ever a time when a pastor should show forth the spirit of his Master it is in visiting the widow and fatherless in their affliction. Instead, some ministers look upon such an occasion as an opportunity to add to their salary, be it sufficient or insufficient, and thereby they earn the merited contempt of worldling and Christian alike, for such conduct savors of "graft." It at least puts the recipient on the plane of the flunky who accepts tips for services that his employer is supposed to pay him for.

As a concrete instance I know of a prominent minister of our denomination who, when one of his members died, told the widow that he would make no charge for his services, as the deceased was a member of his church. When a nonmember, the husband of one of his members, died he did not hesitate to accept a fee from the widow.

Another minister in teaching his Bible class spoke of a special fund in which he kept marriage and funeral fees. Now these are instances that came to my knowledge in a very limited acquaintance with such matters and the fact that two prominent ministers should accept such fees as a matter of course leads me to conclude that it is a common practice. I should be most happy to learn that I am mistaken.

There are other points in the article that I might discuss, but will simply quote one of the brainiest and most successful Y. M. C. A. secretaries in that work, who in speaking of an assistant secretary in another city who applied to him for a position, stating he wished a change in order to secure an increase of salary, said that such a man had not the proper conception of his calling; in entering such service he must expect to make a sacrifice in the matter of salary, and anyone unwilling to do it was not the man for the place. I grant that the ministerial calling is underpaid, and until we laymen are educated up to a higher conception of our duty in the matter of giving it will call for some sacrifice on the part of anyone entering the ministry, but the desire to have the clergy remain single I consider most remote in the minds of all Christians. ELDER.

"Now, stand still," said Benjy, "and I will take your pictures."

They were all so pleased and raised such glad, bright faces, that click! went the shutter, and Benjy knew he had one good picture. He took several more of them on the lawn and then it was time to go home. Mrs. Bradford showed Benjy and Betty how to develop and print the pictures they took of all the little children they entertained.

Benjy showed the pictures to their mothers, and every one was so pleased that he sold many dozen of them. Mrs. Bradford bought Margery's pictures and put the money in her bank, and Margery also received some pennies for playing with the little visitors.

By the time school opened there were many entries in the notebooks and the red apple banks were nearly full.

The Busyfeet Club had a delightful summer and now are looking forward to the time when they can open their banks and go shopping with mother.

THIRD PRIZE

BETTY'S NEEDLE ran slowly in and out of the stocking, but despite the slowness of her needle, it easily outstripped her thoughts.

"I wish I wasn't a girl. I wish I wasn't a twin!" she scolded.

"My, what a lot of wishes!" It was jolly Uncle Ned who stuck his head into the room. "Well, little lady, what's the matter?"

Betty began to explain her inability to earn Christmas money.

"A bad case indeed, but I think I've a remedy," exclaimed Uncle Ned in his deepest tone.

"What—oh, what?" begged the eager twins, for Benjy had returned.

"My plan is this: Make a garden and sell the vegetables." He could not proceed for the vigorous hug from Betty.

They joined the Garden Club and planted the seed. Then the time of waiting began. What excitement there was when the first little green spout showed itself! Betty went out every morning gathering orders, when the vegetables were large enough to sell. Even cross Mrs. Black, when she saw Betty's smiling face, on second thought decided to become a regular customer.

In the afternoons Benjy, with his little cart, delivered. He carried his camera with him, for he had become well known as the "little photographer." The children were not always successful, for it was but a game of chance, this depending on nature.

One day a man approached the two. Benjy was weeding and Betty was looking with satisfaction at her own little flower bed. The man looked at their garden, smiling mystically as he departed. The following week a letter came to the twins. Briefly it stated that they had won the garden prize. Benjy drew the precious check out. "Five dollars! Hurrah!"

Betty now opened a letter addressed to her. It was from the rich lady on the hill, who wanted to buy Betty's flowers. That was but the beginning.

At the end of the season Uncle Ned brought over the neat accounts. The total reached $8 without counting Betty's flowers and Benjy's pictures. As for Margery, she earned her money by being a good little miss and by acquiring a fondness for washing her face. Thus their summer ended with well-filled banks.

DEAR YOUNG AMERICA: The editor is afraid that you are not very much interested in earning Christmas money, for only a third of the usual number of Betty and Benjy stories came in. Or was it just that you were having too good a time to want to write? If that was the case, the editor will look for some specially interesting vacation stories from you. Don't forget to send pictures, too, if you have them. And—be careful about writing too long! Some of the very best stories in this contest had to be discarded because of length.

MEN PLAN WORK FOR CHURCH

Will Confer on Benevolences—Plans have been made for a brotherhood conference at Lafayette, Ind., some time this fall. Brotherhood officers will join with Rev. A. F. McGarrah in five district conferences in Indiana and adjoining states in the interest of the every-member canvass campaign.

Men Plan Reception—Plans for the annual reception of First church, Seattle, Wash., were recently made at a meeting of the council of the brotherhood of men's clubs of the church, of which the pastor, Dr. M. A. Matthews, is ex-officio president.

Brotherhood Organized—A brotherhood was recently organized at Trinity church, South Bend, Ind.—Plans have been made for a midwinter conference in Dayton Presbytery to consider the possibilities of men's work—The Pioneer Bible class of First church, Johnstown, Pa., at its meeting to organize for the fall work adopted plans for a banquet to be held soon.

Start Mission Sunday School—The organized Bible class of New Prospect church, Tenn., has established a mission in a near-by schoolhouse.

Dubuque Directors Remember Mr. Severance

At a recent meeting of the directors of Dubuque German College and Seminary an expression of the appreciation of the counsel and gifts of Louis H. Severance was adopted. The resolutions recognized that "Mr. Severance was one who was the gift of God to his people to lead and to encourage and strengthen them and to make life sweeter and nobler." Mr. Severance was especially interested in the Dubuque institution and no small part of its success is due to his sympathy and generosity.

Obituary

Morris—Rev. John H. C. Morris was born near Hanover, Ind., on Sept. 27, 1872. He graduated from Hanover College and McCormick Seminary, and was licensed and ordained by the Presbytery of New Albany. On July 3, 1900, he married Miss Nellie Covert of Greenview, Ill. To this union were born two children, a son, Paul T., who died in early infancy, and a daughter, Edith Margaret. The thirteen years of Mr. Morris's ministry were spent in the Synod of Kansas, where he served the following churches: Conway Springs, 1900-03; White City, 1903-06; Richmond, 1906-12; Culver, 1912-13. Although in failing health for a year, he kept up his work in Culver till three weeks before his death. He filled his pulpit for the last time on Sunday, July 6, preaching from Revelation 22:5. He passed away at the St. Barnabas hospital in Salina, Kans., on Sunday, July 27. Short funeral services were conducted in Salina by the U. B. and M. E. ministers of Culver in the presence of a large number of his parishioners who had come to Culver. His remains were taken to his old home in Indiana and the services there were conducted by the Rev. W. A. Cravens, who paid a noble tribute to a loving husband and father, son and brother, as well as a consecrated preacher and pastor. The Lord has taken from his militant church one whose holy influence has blessed the lives of many.

A chance to enlist in a kindly service

To Our Subscribers:

The Continent has many requests every week to place deserving institutions on its free list.

There are thousands of worthy objects. Thus:

Home missionaries
Foreign missionaries
Retired ministers
Orphans' homes
Industrial homes
"Shut ins"
Church libraries
Y. M. C. A. libraries
College libraries
Old people's homes
Soldiers' homes
Institutional churches
Sunday school libraries

And so on. Then there are opportunities to present Christian truths to the public. Christian Scientists are about the only persons who avail themselves of the opportunity to place literature in railway stations. There are thousands of hotels where men cannot secure good literature.

The number of copies The Continent may legally send free is limited; and extra postage is required. And while it may seem a small thing to send one copy one time, every paper represents an actual expenditure of money that, multiplied by fifty-two and by hundreds of beneficiaries, represents an amount no one would expect to be paid out solely by us.

Here is the chance to do a kindly service at a small cost which any one can meet. Think it over. If you do not know of a person or institution that would benefit we can find one readily enough. Send us a card indicating your desire and you will receive information as to rate, and the recipient of your kindness will be informed of it.

PRESBYTERIAN TRAINING SCHOOL of Chicago for Christian Workers

Organized in 1908 by the Board of Church Extension of the Presbytery of Chicago

The demand for people who "know how to do it" is one of the conspicuous signs of the times.

Every trade and line of work is opening schools for training its workers.

It all means that we are awake to the need of people knowing how to do things and learning it in school instead of wasting time, and doing harm, experimenting on the public.

Shall we be less wise in our church affairs?

Don't you think it is time for us to undertake more seriously the training of church workers, other than ministers?

Directors of education, pastors' assistants, church secretaries, deaconesses, visitors—call them what you will or vary the duties as may be required—all should be trained in the School and come to the pastor ready for helpfulness.

That is part of the task of the Presbyterian Training School of Chicago. (Open this year to women only.)

If you are a prospective student, or if you want to help such a School, let us hear from you.

Around the Shop

Perhaps you, as well as the Around-the-Shop Man, remember Rollo. Not Rollo of the story books, but the real Rollo of our own little town. He was the boy that was finicky about his neckties, who seemed always to know just what to do when the girls were around, and whose Chesterfieldian manners (we just called them "slick") were the envy or the disgust of the barbarians.

Rollo was so polite that when his mother came in on a blustery winter day with an armful of firewood, he would always lay down his book, open the door for her with a lovely bow, and perhaps even move a chair that interfered with her reaching the woodbox.

Rollo meant well, but he hadn't thought out his politeness. His book of etiquette spoke of rising to open the door for a lady but said nothing about carrying in wood. Nowadays, if you come the side way into Smith's dry goods store, across from the P. O., you are pretty sure to see a bald head projected above the thread cabinet. That belongs to Rollo—the head, not the thread cabinet. Somehow, nothing worth much has ever come to belong to Rollo. His superficially polite ways make him a passable salesman, but he never has thought of his work from the purchaser's viewpoint.

The periodical representatives who do most to extend subscription lists are those who honestly believe they are rendering a service to the people they visit in presenting something helpful and more than full value for the money paid. If they are only perfunctorily following the rules of salesmanship they fail. The ministers —and there are a host of them—who are not merely willing but anxious to have their people read a good religious paper are the ones who think for themselves, and who have thought down to principles. They know that such a paper is either of unique service and therefore a thing to encourage actively, or it should have no standing whatever.

Organizing the Church Better

"TOO MUCH ORGANIZATION ALREADY!"

So one is answered nearly always if he speaks for a better organized church. Belief that the present-day church is over-organized seems deeper seated among church people than almost any other creed.

Proof of it invariably cited is the enormous array of societies, clubs and committees that adorn the average congregation.

And from that point of view it is not difficult to concede that churches often have too many organizations. But too much organization—that doesn't follow.

The mass of church workers enjoy a pretty thorough misunderstanding of what organization really signifies. It should help to attempt a rock-bottom definition of the idea. Here's a try at it: Organization is the process of analyzing in logical order the whole task of the church and then assigning the several parts of that task to individuals according to their respective adaptations.

Or to come nearer to the vernacular, organizing a church is sizing up its job and then pointing out to each member his place to get busy.

And as long as it is done understandingly and tactfully by a real leader, there can't be too much of that in any church. Just now there is a vast lack of it in most churches.

Who is the leader whose business it is thus to organize the church—survey, comprehend, divide and distribute the church's task?

You can come at the answer very quickly by process of elimination if not in any other way. It is the pastor.

Now, from one angle it does seem a shame to suggest anything more for the already overcrowded budget of a pastor's duty. But this matter of being responsible for the effectiveness of his church organization is not an appendix put in at the back of a minister's book. It comes right up among the first chapters.

Two things clinch the obligation on a pastor inevitably.

In the first place, the church summoned him to be its leader. That is the main meaning of his call. Somebody merely to conduct public worship could have been secured cheaper. Somebody to head up the congregation and marshal it for success was wanted.

In the second place, the pastor is the only man in the church so situated that he can make church work his biggest topic of thought. He is the only man who is on the church job all the time.

Let there be no misunderstanding here. Every layman is just as much obliged as the pastor to put his whole life into Christian service. But the big end of a layman's service has to be manifested through his daily work at his livelihood. The church can come in for only fragments of time and intervals of attention.

The minister on the contrary has church work for his livelihood. He can put himself into it completely. He can always be watching it. Of course, he thus comes to know the minutiæ of parish conditions in a way that no layman can.

Necessarily then he is the man to plan the church's work. He only grasps the situation broadly enough to see all that ought to be done. He only can lay out a policy covering everything.

Better, too, than any layman himself can know, the pastor can tell where that layman ought to work in the church. He knows better what needs doing and he knows better what the layman can do. Another man's judgment on one's capacity is always better than one's own.

The rational thing for a church member to do, then, is to go to his pastor and ask to be assigned to that nook and corner in church operations where he will amount to most.

And the pastor ought to be ready to accept the responsibility of telling that particular man where is the place for him in the working scheme of the church.

That is organization. And the pastor is organizer.

The attainment of any such ideal depends, however, on a thorough understanding between the pastor and his laymen. It must be based on a clear conception of their proper shares of a common load.

If the minister strides pertly into the midst of things and proclaims his clerical right to put everybody to work, nothing will happen in that church but an enormous ruction.

But if everybody begins right, with mutual appreciation that the pastor is not taking to himself any lordship but only trying to fill in the church's life the place he is paid for filling, no boldness of initiative on his part can cause offense.

On that understanding businesslike and system-loving laymen will respond as they never do respond when matters run along haphazard with free leave for everybody to work or not work as the mood may take him.

Laymen who hear their pastors appealing from the pulpit with vague generalities for their help in the church's tasks, find it easy to put off responding.

But when the pastor comes to a member saying, "Here's a thing which you can do—one specific service that needs doing right now; won't you take hold and handle it?"—that man is going to find it awfully hard to refuse. In fact, if he respects the pastor and has some reasonable modicum of religion himself, he can't refuse.

Such certainly is the secret, by and large, of a harder working laity in the average American church—definite jobs set off to definite men on a definite program of church activity.

There's a supplement to add, however, of prime importance.

Whenever the directors of any business corporation hire a general manager, they look out to lift off his shoulders all trifling detail. They know that no man can plan big and aggressive policies if his mind is dulled with routine drudge work.

So they hire help to take the drudgery, and set the manager's brain free to study conditions and plan betterments.

Laymen who really care for an efficient church will surely be no less wise and just in regard to their pastor.

If they expect him to serve as general manager of the church, they must secure to him the liberty for it; they must not wear him out by requiring attention to fussy items of church mechanics.

Particularly they owe it to him to relieve his mind of financial bothers. Finances are peculiarly a lay responsibility.

No church partnership can work to much advantage unless the lay partners show liberal good sense in giving their pastoral manager fit room and chance to manage.

The World

Ulster Unionist Volunteers in Military Parade

Twelve thousand trained volunteers marched and countermarched in the presence of 25,000 spectators at Belfast last Saturday afternoon, the parade being reviewed by leaders of the "provisional government" of Ulster and the ceremonies concluding with a speech by Sir Edward Carson, the potential premier. The whole affair was carried out with military precision and so large a body of trained men has not been marshaled in Belfast since the historic battle of the Boyne. It was, of course, a demonstration against the home rule bill—which is yet to receive final action—and each volunteer, besides the Belfast division members, is sworn to prove his loyalty to his country by opposing this feature of the program of his country's government. For the Orangemen and the anti-home rulers of the North of Ireland sharply differentiate between king and country and between the Liberal party and the coalition majority in parliament. The motto of the Orangemen is announced to be "One king, one flag, one parliament," which certainly will be a decided novelty in the way of a war cry for "rebels," if the protesting Ulstermen can possibly be called such. The anti-home rulers declare that all the steps have been taken for repudiating and resisting the decrees of a Nationalist parliament—which contemplates the rule of the Irish Catholic majority—and for the taking over of the government of Ulster "in trust for the British nation."

In spite of this and other demonstrations, the mass of the English people have remained apathetic and the government is ostensibly indifferent, but the Ulster "tragedy" or the Ulster "farce" will probably not be overlooked indefinitely. Premier Asquith, Chancellor Lloyd George and Winston Churchill, first lord of the admiralty, have just met at the home of the chief Liberal parliamentary whip for a conference, and James Bryce, former ambassador to the United States and a former chief secretary for Ireland, has been visiting Belfast and Dublin. But it is denied that this is preliminary to a general conference of the leaders of all the factions, such as has been earnestly urged by Lord Loreburn, a prominent member of the Liberal party.

John E. Redmond, the Irish Nationalist chieftain, made a public offer to Sir Edward to discuss the provisions of the home rule bill and to meet every desire of the Ulster champions if the principle of a local parliament for Ulster were conceded. To this Sir Edward telegraphed The London Express announcing his willingness to discuss any measures for the improvement of conditions in Ireland if Ireland's position under the imperial parliament is retained. Thus an irreconcilable conflict is apparent.

British Business in Northern South America

Great Britain is about to make a gigantic strike in Ecuador and in Colombia through concessions obtained from the governments of those two countries by Lord Murray of Elibank for the famous firm of Pearson and Son. Lord Murray was formerly chief whip of the Liberal party, the party in power in England, and resigned from parliament to become a partner in the Pearson firm, which is headed by Lord Cowdray. Lord Cowdray and his wealthy associates have extensive interests in Mexico, and it was asserted a few weeks ago that their influence was used to induce the British government to extend prompt recognition to the Huerta regime.

The concession obtained in Ecuador, says The London Standard, practically amounts to exploiting all the virgin territory of the country for a term of forty years. It means the expenditure of huge sums of money, and also means, says the same London authority, that American and European concession hunters have been defeated. Colombians have not been favorably disposed toward the United States since the loss of Panama. Special significance is attached to the possibility of canal construction under this program, for therein lies dormant competition for the Panama canal. The English concessionaires are to acquire lands and harbor facilities in the Gulf of Darien, hard by the Caribbean entrance to the Panama channel, also interests along the Atrato river, which is navigable far back into Colombia. Its headwaters almost meet those of the San Juan river, which flows into the Pacific and is also navigable. The state department at Washington is making inquiry into the scope of the grant.

Besides the Colombian commercial coup Lord Murray also engineered a grant from Ecuador of valuable oil and mineral rights. Half a million dollars is to be spent within ten years in exploring for oil, which is being increasingly used as fuel for ships in place of coal, and all necessary privileges are given for the development of the enterprise. However, the congress of Ecuador has been reluctant to ratify the contract, and its terms have been severely criticised by a newspaper in Guayaquil as a huge joke or worse. But The London Times insists that the contract would be a good thing for Ecuador and that the congress at Quito would be ill-advised to reject it. The Times also hints that it ought to be pleasing for Ecuadorian patriots to have their undeveloped wealth exploited by subjects of a disinterested power rather than by some one else—Americans, for instance.

If Englishmen succeed in these broad and ambitious plans British prestige in South America will be vastly enhanced. Indirectly the cause of peace may be advanced, as commercial activities may check or divert Latin-American energies away from war and revolution.

Crossing the Mediterranean by Aeroplane

A fresh impetus has been given to aviation and to France as its chief exponent by the feat of a young Frenchman, Roland G. Garros, last week in flying from Europe to Africa across the Mediterranean, a distance of 560 miles, from St. Raphael, near Nice, to Bizerta in Tunis. The trip was made in eight hours, at a high altitude, with a speed of seventy miles an hour, and is regarded as a remarkable example of sustained flight. The French were pleased to see that if the cables between France and her African possessions were cut quick communication would still be possible. It is not long ago that the crossing of the English channel by aeroplanes was an astonishing accomplishment, but now the aerial passage of the Atlantic begins to seem both possible and practical. Garros, the hero of the Mediterranean achievement, says it will be done "some day," in a light, swift monoplane, flying from England to Ireland, thence to Newfoundland.

Two other French aviators, Vedrines and Prevost, last Saturday at Rheims made the terrific speed of 118.6 miles an hour over a measured course, thus setting another world's record.

Directors Blamed for Wreck; Hadley on the Board

The interstate commerce commission's report of its investigation of the recent fatal wreck on the New York, New Haven and Hartford railroad at Wallingford was made public last week. Minor employees are blamed, but for the first time in railroad history the directors and the chief managers of a great transportation system were held definitely and officially responsible for "inefficiency." A list of these men, many of them high in the financial world, is given, to which is appended this scathing comment:

"On this directorate were and are men whom the confiding public recognize as magicians in the art of finance and wizards in the construction, operation and consolidation of great systems of railroads. The public therefore rested secure that with the knowledge of the railroad art possessed by such men investments and travel should both be made safe. Experience has shown that this reliance of the public was not justified as to either finance or safety."

The commission proposes to ask Congress for specific authority to regulate the speed and operation of trains with a view to securing greater safety.

President Arthur T. Hadley of Yale University has just been elected a director of the New Haven system as part of the new regime marked by the retirement of the former president, Mr. Mellen. Dr. Hadley is a new type of railroad director whose advent has been welcome both because of his personal standing and his special knowledge of railroad problems in their economic and scientific aspects.

Farmers' Congress Considers Live Problems

The Farmers' National Congress, an influential organization, held its annual session last week at Plano, Illinois, and its discussions attracted more than perfunctory attention, for the human as well as the technical side of agricultural problems was considered. For example, the president, Charles F. Sanford, foresaw the day when this country might have as serious a land question as England is confronted with. Because of the extraordinary rise in the valuation of farm lands, he said, it is no longer an easy or a simple matter for the average man to become the owner of an improved farm, and the number of tenant farmers is increasing—"in some states with alarming rapidity." And he simply but forcefully added: "It cannot be said with any show of reason that the growth of a tenant class indicates a stable or desirable economic condition."

Farm finance was another live topic and a resolution was adopted asking for an amendment to the federal banking laws to provide for rural banks to make long loans at low rates. The resolution was framed by delegates from Georgia, Nebraska and California. The general subject of rural credits is one with which the wiseheads at Washington are expected to grapple at the next session of Congress.

The most enlivening address was on how to keep girls—not boys this time—on the farm. A. P. Sandell, state secretary of agriculture of Ohio, declared the cultivating of woman is a bigger job today than the making of poor ground to yield. "Modern education must not take away the corner stone of motherhood," said Mr. Sandell. "Poor cooking is sending men to hades. Good baking, sewing and the other arts of our mothers are necessary to make the home a decent place in which to live. Of course, the farmer must see his wife is properly clothed and is not made a drudge, and has those little recreations dear to the feminine heart.

"Three girls who were marooned in the recent Ohio floods were helpless when raw meat was brought to them to be cooked. Newspapers would do more good if they ran the pictures of girls who won prizes at cooking schools on the front page instead of constantly parading Evelyn Thaw. Our statistics show three-fourths of the convicts in the Ohio penitentiary are men who went from the country to the city. In the girls' reformatory there are ten girls who came from the country to one who was reared in the city."

Three Bureaus to Fight Alcohol Planned

At the fourteenth international congress on alcoholism, which met at Milan, Italy, last week, three bureaus of worldwide scope were projected—one to combat alcoholism, one a federation of physicians opposed to the prescribing of liquors for medicinal purposes, and the other a federation for the protection of native races. The economic importance of the liquor traffic was discussed by Italian, German and Finnish delegates, and all agreed that legislation could be framed for the suppression of alcoholism without endangering the economic conditions.

The Gothenburg license system, originated nearly fifty years ago and frequently praised as solving the liquor problem without ending the traffic, was criticised by several speakers. Among the critics was a London woman, Agnes Dack, an officer of the Universal Temperance Federation, who expressed the hope that the American delegates would join in disapproving the system. Under the Gothenburg plan the exclusive control of the sale of liquor in a city or town is given to a company licensed by the municipality, and the business is conducted by salaried managers, all profits above 5 per cent going into the public treasury. In Sweden, according to an experienced observer, it had proved a source of corruption and abuse. A modification of the plan has had a lengthy trial in South Carolina.

One of the principal addresses was made by William Johnson of Westerville, Ohio, who summarized the story of the battle against alcoholism in the United States for the last century, culminating in the Webb law, which bridges the gap between state and federal legislation. Miss Marie C. Brehm, lecturer for the Presbyterian Temperance Board, spoke for temperance instruction based on scientific and hygienic grounds.

Mr. Bryan Will Not Desert Lecture Platform

Newspapers and individuals at home and abroad who have been criticising Mr. Bryan because he refuses completely to desert the lecture platform during his term of office as secretary of state can still persist in their objections, because the secretary of state announced that his lecture at Warrenton, Pennsylvania, September 20, was his latest, not his last, appearance as a paid speaker. The chautauqua season is ended, said Mr. Bryan, but he will continue to lecture whenever he feels inclined to do so. Incidentally he informed the inquisitive critics that his net profits for this season were about $6,500, and the total number of whole week days consumed was seven, not including engagements at points near the capital. Lecturing he regards as an entirely legitimate field, and he declares he does not believe that any person whose good opinion is "worth having" will blame him for persisting in his work.

—Federico Gamboa, minister of foreign affairs, was last week nominated by the Catholic party for president of Mexico, and, it was announced, will have the support of President Huerta. Washington authorities regard this as a complete vindication of President Wilson's policy and a fulfillment of ex-Governor Lind's mission to Mexico.

Welsh Presbyterians Advancing in Missions

The General Assembly of the Welsh Calvinistic Methodist Church was in session in Utica, New York, September 17 to 21. The Assembly meets triennially. The body is composed of six synods: New York and Vermont, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Wisconsin, Minnesota, and the West. It comprises 152 churches in charge of ninety-four pastors, with a membership of 14,326, an increase of 567 members since the last report. Sunday school membership has decreased and a committee was appointed to suggest a remedy.

The combined offerings for the past year amounted to $147,151, which is $10.27 per member. The missionary zeal and activity of the body have been growing in the past few years, until now it is proposed to raise $100,000 for home and foreign missionary work.

Interesting special features of the meeting began with the address of T. Solomon Griffiths of Utica, the retiring moderator. He is the only layman who has held that office. His successor is Dr. John C. Jones of Chicago. A paper of great interest by Rev. John W. Morris of Vermont dealt with "The Welsh Theology of the Past Fifty Years in America." Greetings from the brethren present from Wales evinced a gratifying harmony of spirit. The address of Rev. R. T. Roberts of Rome, New York, representing the Alliance of the Reformed Churches in the World, was enthusiastically received, as was also the address of Dr. Ralph W. Brokaw of Utica, commissioned with its greetings by the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church U. S. A.

Utica is a center of Welsh people in this country. The first church of the Calvinistic Methodist order (sometimes called Welsh Presbyterian) was organized in the town of Steuben some time after 1800. The church was burned and those who worshiped there in 1824 organized a church at Penycaeran, near Remsen. This church flourished for seventy-five years, but of late has dwindled owing to the decrease in the number of Welsh people in the vicinity. A fund has been secured for the rehabilitation of the property and its preservation as a memorial.

Baptist Preacher Free from Russian Police

Rev. William Fetler, the Baptist evangelist and pastor in St. Petersburg who has been under bond to a Russian court in Moscow to answer for public Protestant preaching, was met on his return from the Baptist world congress in Stockholm by the gratifying news that he had been included, with three other Baptist preachers, in an amnesty proclamation which extended the mercy of the czar to "many criminals." At the same time the Moscow court issued an order that Mr. Fetler should no longer be subject to police surveillance. The bail bond of 5,000 rubles which had been given by Rev. J. H. Shakespeare of London on behalf of British Baptists has been returned to Mr. Shakespeare with 4 per cent interest added. After the bond came back to London, however, news was received that Russian priests had filed a protest in Moscow against the release of Fetler and were trying to get his case reopened. It seems certain that this effort of the hierarchy will be futile, but it is another sign of the fashion in which liberality and bigotry seesaw with each other in Russia.

Epworth Leaguers Called to Win Chums

Dr. W. F. Sheridan, the secretary of the Epworth League, is calling young Methodists to prepare for a very significant evangelistic movement devised on interestingly original lines. Dr. Sheridan's summons to this activity designates November 9 to 16 as "win-my-chum" week. Within that week all Epworth members are expected to bend every energy to persuade young people of their acquaintance, and especially young people of Christian homes, to declare out and out for Christ.

In preparation for such service, every league is exhorted to conduct through October a training class for personal work. Mahood's "Art of Soul Winning" and Ober's "Personal Work" are recommended as textbooks. The first ten days of November are to be occupied with a systematic scheme of friendly calls on every young person whom any local league has recorded in its "constituency" list. Pledged prayer is to accompany the undertaking at every step of the way. Finally, on Sunday night, November 16, each pastor is expected to conduct a "round-up" at the meeting of his league, and on that evening it is hoped a great host of young people will identify themselves with the church.

Perennial Themes

A PRESBYTERIAN ELDER of our acquaintance recently said that in his judgment there were certain themes on which every pastor owes it to his people to preach instructively every year. No matter how many other things might demand attention, these could not be left out or pushed off without injury to the church. He said he always missed them, because they were the "bones" of his faith around which he built up his daily living.

We asked him for a list of such themes and now we share them with our readers, laymen and ministers, for consideration and such comment as may seem wise. Our elder friend thinks every year's preaching ought to include at least one sermon definitely meant for instruction on each of these themes:

"The Fatherhood and Love of God," "Inspiration of the Bible," "The Person and Work of Christ," "Prayer," "The Person and Work of the Holy Spirit," "Sin and Its Meaning," "Worldwide Missions," "Atonement," "Christian Citizenship."

As we understand him, he would admit that many more sermons than one should be preached regarding such themes, and that they are implied in many sermons which are not specifically on them. He feels, however, that every church needs and deserves explicit instruction regarding these nine subjects, with all the variety in wording that the trained intelligence of the minister can give them.

We confess to some interest in the way this will strike our readers. They are very old themes, but they seem fundamental. We suppose they could be made narrowly doctrinal and very dreary, but that was not implied in our good elder's idea. They are certainly themes on which it may be expected that educated men—say nothing of ministers—should have some ideas by this time. It is difficult to see how a well trained church could fail to have ideas regarding them all.

Yet some of them are among the most discussed and mooted subjects of the times. We notice that when Dr. Gladden preached a series of doctrinal sermons on such themes, the papers reported surprisingly large attendance of his own and other people. How much of that may have been due to the spirit of controversy which was somewhat in the atmosphere around his pulpit, we do not know, and certainly we should not like to think of a church being instructed controversially in such great themes. But there is a strong current of inquiry regarding these truths of which we believe, with our friend, any minister might take advantage.

Another point of interest comes to mind. These are times of much peculiar religious teaching. Some if it looks so plausible that even the very elect are being deceived by it. People who have long been in churches are going astray after it. It is often declared that a minister ought to preach about such things and attack them at their vulnerable points which he can see and others may miss. The trouble with that, as many know to their sorrow, is that such attacks often serve to advertise the notions and give them the attractive position of martyrdom.

Sometimes it is doubtless wise to make the attack in any case. Generally, however, it would seem far better to meet the peculiar ideas by definite teaching of the thing that is true, with no mention of the error by name or description. No man who is trained in the truth regarding the nature of sin or the work of Christ or the true doctrine of his atonement will follow Mrs. Eddy's teaching. No one who is wisely taught regarding the inspiration of the Bible will tremble for it under the assaults of the times. Doubts about prayer will most easily be answered in a full affirmative treatment of the subject of prayer. A sermon on the worldwide value of the gospel, not followed by a missionary collection, will be a delightful and inspiring novelty in some churches.

We see another advantage. There is much peril of a minister and a congregation becoming addicted to petty, even if showy, themes. We are far from saying that such themes have no place. A perpetual diet of strong meat is more than some spiritual digestions are equal to. The preparation of such a diet is more than some ministers are equal to. But a diet without strong meat is much worse. Themes like these will keep the minister at the kind of work which will be best for him. Keeping them ahead, having some definite place for them in his yearly plan, as our friend suggests, will safeguard him and the people against that worse peril, of savory but unsubstantial food. Preparation of worthy sermons on great themes like these, year by year, without tiresome reiteration, will put any man up to solid reading and severe thinking. Thinking about them until they are clear enough to be preached will affect all the rest of his preaching.

Still, we are interested in the way it strikes our readers, laymen and ministers. Is the position well taken? Is the list a good one? Do laymen want sermons on such themes? How are sermons on such themes received? It would be helpful to many to know.

Little Discussion Where There's No Negative

This year it is expected of the presbyteries under the "U. S. A." Assembly that they will informally express their opinion on union between the Presbyterian and "German" Reformed Churches. In writing for Presbyterians it is still necessary to use—with an apology to the good people who have long since left it behind—this quoted historical adjective "German" in order to make sure of distinguishing the Reformed Church in the United States from the Reformed Church in America, whose historical antecedents are Dutch. But with explanation thus made, the more exact statement may be set down that the proposed union concerns the Reformed Church in the United States and the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America.

It must be frankly acknowledged that this union suggestion has not as yet awakened more than a passing ripple of discussion among Presbyterians. There can't, indeed, be much discussion aroused where the proposition in hand is so self-evidently excellent that not even a man of straw can be constructed on the opposite side for advocates of the idea to demolish. There is not even a dreamable reason why Presbyterians should not want to enter into fellowship with 300,000 of the finest people in the country—nearly all of German extraction but now as thoroughly American as any scion of Jamestown or Plymouth dares be. These Reformed brothers and sisters are all so orthodox that not the most rigid conservatives can fear them, and all so genial that not the most touchy liberal can doubt getting on amiably with them. Moreover, the plan of union as drawn provides for such gradual amalgamation that everybody will have time to get used to new relations before they are compacted into rigid organizational bonds. It is a very wise union scheme in this regard which the committees of conference have submitted—worthy of all the heartier indorsement because it is stamped in so many places with the wisdom of making haste slowly.

Besides acquiring so many new comrades in church life, Presbyterians will profit from the union by getting a new coordinate standard for prospective ministers to subscribe to when they join presbytery. It is provided that the conjoined church may use the Reformed creed, expressed in the Heidelberg Catechism, as equivalent in value to the Westminster Confession. In practice it will doubtless prove the more acceptable. Nobody thinks the Heidelberg document a whit less "sound" in theology, while for ministers to affirm in their ordination it is much better suited, since it expresses doctrine in terms of Christian experience rather than as propositions of religious philosophy. So the Reformed friends will be extra welcome because they bring with them that catechism of theirs.

Only one possible occasion for delaying this auspicious union is visible. If the "German" Reformed and the "Dutch" Reformed Churches—begging their pardon again for those convenient words of distinction—could only manage, by taking a little time for it, to work out a union between themselves, Presbyterians would gladly wait for the greater joy of uniting after that with all of them together.

Lincoln Was a Christian—Plenty of Proof

It sounds trite to say that a man has done a public service by publishing a certain book; in these days of superabundant publication, indeed, there may be reason for the suggestion that service to the public would most often be found in not putting forth a book. But it is not a formal commonplace to acknowledge a tangible patriotic and religious benefit for the whole nation in one modest volume to be found in this fall's catalogue of new books. That is "Abraham Lincoln the Christian," of which the author is Rev. William J. Johnson, well known in the Presbyterian fellowship as a successful agent of the campaign for the endowment of Ministerial Relief and Sustentation.

The book is the product of studies and inquiries prosecuted through several years, all prompted in the first instance by the horror of hearing an infidel boast of Lincoln as an exemplar of his own atheism. Such a use of the most revered name of American history shocked Mr. Johnson inexpressibly, and he determined to find out for himself whether such an estimate of Lincoln was justified. What he discovered this little volume records, and it suffices here to say that the book makes it forever impossible for an intelligent citizen to repeat, either boastfully or sorrowfully, that Lincoln was an infidel. Instead, Mr. Johnson demonstrates that the martyr President was throughout his life a man of reverent religious feeling, which under the responsibilities of his incomparable task became a clear-burning personal Christian faith, and led him to express, shortly before his assassination, the purpose to make a public confession of Christ. Most of the material of the book, of course, is drawn from well known biographical sources, but it has been the author's fortune to discover considerable important new material, all corroborative of the conclusions just stated. With the cumulative effect of all these facts put together in one place, popular appreciation for Lincoln's Christian character is now permanently safeguarded.

Third Sort of Job for a Human Dynamo

After all these many and fruitful years in which Dr. W. S. Holt has been searching through the mountains and forests of Oregon and the other Pacific states for new settlements in need of gospel preaching, is it possible now to think of him as other than a foreordained home mission man? In the capacity of home mission superintendent his temperament has fitted his task so perfectly that the work and the man have seemed an indivisible unit. Yet we must remember that a good long while ago—longer than a face which refuses to age would seem to admit—there was found in this man the making of an extra good foreign missionary. So it is not lawful to conclude that there is but one kind of capability stored up in this compact human framework, which anticipated the ambition of scientists to invent a small-sized, high-power dynamo. There is therefore no reason to doubt that when this dynamo is presently hitched up to a third sort of church job, he will go whirling along with just as many revolutions a second and just as high production of energy per revolution as ever.

At any rate, it is soon to be incumbent on all Presbyterians to salute Dr. Holt as another associate secretary for ministerial relief and sustentation—a coworker with Doctors Foulkes and Sutherland in accumulating that $10,000,000 which is forever to stand between Presbyterian ministers and dread of want in their old age. And the salute will be unanimously hearty. Moreover, come to think of it, Dr. Holt will not even then be outside home missions; every bit of success he registers in this new relation will make it easier for pastors to give themselves self-forgetfully to hard service in pioneer fields of ministry. The only trouble in fact that remains to worry over, in the choice which the Board of Ministerial Relief and Sustentation has made for its second associate, is the transfer to the East of so great a portion of the supply of joy and jollity on which the Far West has depended. It will be necessary forthwith for Pacific Coast folks to arrange for importing two or three tremendously funny men from the East in order to restore equilibrium in the gayety of states.

The Unpictured Madonna of the Gray Hair

There is a picture yet unpainted. It is the picture of the aged Madonna. A host of artists have put on canvas their dreams of the virgin mother brooding over her Babe. Many have painted her in her eager hope for her growing Boy. More have sought to delineate the awful sorrow of "mater dolorosa" at the cross. But who has had imagination to show the face of gray-haired Mary in her latest days? Perhaps it is beyond the reach of human genius. Reverent art already seems to ascend its highest pinnacle as it strives to express the heart that pondered mysteries in Bethlehem and the soul that was pierced with a sword on Golgotha. But to read into the lines of a painter's brush Mary's understanding and peace after she had seen of the travail of her Son's life and was satisfied—after she had beheld his living power in missionary courage and martyr endurance, while she waited for him to fulfill his promise to come again and receive her unto himself—could there ever be an artist with the daring to venture that? Surely nothing less than a divine inspiration could qualify a painter to accomplish such a picture. And surely when done it would be the world's greatest picture.

—The passage of a resolution in the New Jersey State Federation of Labor providing that daily sessions of the annual convention shall be opened with prayer cannot be regarded as a pharisaic formality. At least, it was bitterly opposed in debate by speakers who contended that a labor convention was no place for religion, and the majority voting to adopt must have thought the opposite—that labor does need religion. And where the need of religion is felt is the place where it is surest to appear.

—The National Bible Institute of New York City is having a difficult year. Yet so steadfast and dauntless are President Don O. Shelton and his associates that no relaxation of their work is permitted to come within the range of even theoretical discussion. The occasion of the institute's present hardship is the loss of its strong and constant backer, William W. Borden, the young millionaire missionary who died last winter in Cairo on his way to China. Mr. Borden left in his will a considerable bequest to the institute, but his executors are not yet able to pay over the money, and meantime the young benefactor's liberal annual gift is missing. Yet all the while the institute must carry forward unimpaired the service of the Yale Hope Mission which Mr. Borden established at New Haven, and left to the institute's care. No more is it possible to neglect the Jerry McAuley work which the institute inherited in New York City, or any other of its rescue missions on Manhattan. It also feels constrained to go forward with Jewish work. But by just as much as Mr. Shelton is sure that all this is bounden duty, by just so much is he sure that the Lord will bring in the money for it. So he goes on.

—Governor Cox of Ohio was elected to his high office with the cordial consent of the saloon men of his state, for he was understood to be their kind of man. But he has shown good signs of not being altogether their man. In appointing new state license commissioners Governor Cox told them in terms decidedly unminced that they must keep all saloons closed on Sunday or they would lose their jobs. And the attorney general of the state chimed in to remark that this meant to keep them closed in the big cities as well as other places. Both officials have told the saloon men that the new state license system of Ohio hangs on this one question of Sunday law enforcement; if the saloons don't obey that one-day-in-seven law, they will soon have to obey something a lot harsher.

—Collier's has this pungent comment worth thinking about in towns that pride themselves on their civic celebrations of various sorts, and its application doesn't need to be limited to the small towns; it can be extended very well to big cities that celebrate "carnival week": "Suppose for one year the country town should devote to the liquor question the same amount of earnest thought and action which it expends every year on Old Home Week and the county fair. Results would be astonishing. Such progress would be worth the sacrifice of the pumped-up good fellowship for one year. The social gatherings are commendable in supplying an actual need, but why not concentrate effort on the hardest problem for once? The energy now spent in back-slapping would hit booze hard."

—Dr. Jenkin Lloyd Jones, editor of Unity in Chicago, tells his readers that he had been pretty successfully persuading himself that if left alone Mormonism would die out—that is, he was able to believe it until he read Dr. Josiah Strong's new pamphlet, "The Menace of Mormonism." Since then Dr. Jones confesses he has an uneasy doubt whether something stronger than letting alone is not necessary to affect Mormonism fatally. And he advises other people to read the pamphlet, for he is clearly of the opinion that were Mormonism to grow and extend, "the long climb toward purity in all departments of life and in all ages of history" would be disastrously reversed.

—The Inter-Church, a journal which was started last winter at Clinton, South Carolina, with the ambitious purpose of supplying the need its promoters thought they saw for "a national interdenominational weekly," in its forty-first number announces its own suspension "on account of lack of funds." Two weeks earlier The Inter-Church had offered hints of a coming big development which would locate it in some larger city and enable it to branch out in many ways. But the hope did not materialize.

—For those who speak in round numbers it has been convenient to refer to the Southern Presbyterian Church as a body of a quarter of a million members. But it is high time now to revise that statement. Southern Presbyterians have achieved another round number, and whoever does them justice today must name them as a company of 300,000. Their last annual statistical report carried them just across that line, the total coming out at 300,771.

—It is understood that Secretary of the Navy Daniels, despairing of an appropriation from Congress sufficient to put a chaplain on every battleship afloat, is now urging the Young Men's Christian Association to put one of its secretaries aboard every vessel under the flag. The great $2,000,000 bequest of Mrs. Butterfield for army and navy work will likely be used in considerable part for this purpose.

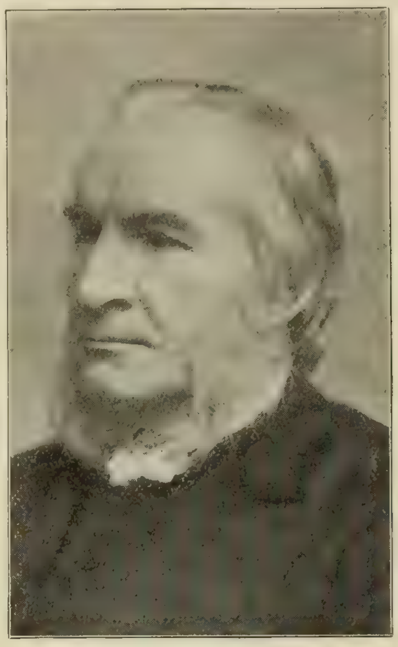
The Dean of the Scotch Preachers

An Appreciation by an American Visitor

BY HOWARD ARNOLD WALTER

Mr. Walter has lately gone out to India to engage in missionary work, and is now located at Calcutta under Young Men's Christian Association auspices. His sketch of "the grand old man" of the Scotch pulpit will prove of interest.

THE PRESENT dean of Scotland's preachers is by universal consent the beloved senior pastor of Free St. George's church and principal of New College, Edinburgh, Alexander Whyte, D. D. Although his memories of events and personalities and his own active service to the church reach far back into the years, he is one whom the years have signally crowned with perennial youth. Possessing all the ardor, if not quite all the strength, of a stripling on life's threshold, he still performs his manifold tasks as preacher, pastor, author, lecturer and teacher, and inevitably infuses into all he touches the spirit of his rich and virile personality.



Alexander Whyte, D. D.
Copyright by Elliott & Fry

He belongs not to Free St. George's and New College only, but to all Edinburgh, which recently extended to him the freedom of the city, and indeed, to all the British isles. No occasion of importance in Edinburgh, whether civic, religious, or social, is complete without the benediction of his noble face, reminiscent of a tenderer Gladstone, and the encouragement of his hearty, earnest words. Like Mr. Twichell of Hartford, of whom he reminds one in certain ways, his long life has compassed many notable friendships among all classes of men and women.

The power he has thus achieved to weave into his discourses personal recollections of good men and great who have passed away has given birth to the hope that he will add to his many works an autobiographical volume which would permanently preserve his reminiscences.

The Sunday Evening Men's Class

This wide personal acquaintance, combined with his numerous and pronounced enthusiasms for sterling characters in life or fiction (Christian in "Pilgrim's Progress" par excellence), has served to make his historic Sunday evening men's class uniquely profitable and justly renowned. At the close of the regular evening service at Free St. George's, the men of the congregation gather in the body of the church, and the numbers are rapidly augmented by men from other churches, until the auditorium is quite comfortably filled. After prayer, Dr. Whyte speaks for a half or three quarters of an hour in his emphatic, inimitable way, upon the appointed theme in the course which he happens to be following for the winter. Many of the series have later been published, notably those relating to celebrated Bible characters. During the winter of my stay in Edinburgh he spoke on some favorite nineteenth century authors and divines. One left each lecture with notebook scored with the names of books, articles and sermons by hitherto unknown or unregarded authors whom Dr. Whyte's enthusiastic championship had shamed one into a determination to know better. Closing my eyes today, I can see his massive figure swaying intensely backward and forward, and can hear the staccato, impressive sentences emphasized by many repetitions, and interspersed with delightful witticisms.

In his sermons on Sunday mornings the greater formality and rigidity enforced by the occasion detracts a little, perhaps, from his charming originality, but it is all recovered in another realm through his wonderful prayers. Then the fine old saint seems to lose his earthly vision and memory entirely, and to stand rapt in adoring supplication before the throne of Almightly God, there to present his own and his people's gratitude and praise and needs. No other man's prayers ever lifted me so clear of this world, so near heaven's gates.

I heard him preach a characteristic series of sermons upon the theme, "The Great Experiential Passages in St. Paul," one of his favorite characters, and I remember especially a sermon from the text of Romans 7:7 where he pictured Saul of Tarsus, strong and sternly self-complacent, in his conscious fulfillment of all the prescribed commandments, meditating one day on the Torah, when there leaped forth and pierced his self-righteousness like a sword the livid words, "Thou shalt not covet," leaving him ever thereafter a changed man. Before the sermon was ended, the preacher had brought us all to share his own emphasis upon the dread importance of the tenth commandment and his own penitence for its continual transgression. While his point of view in interpreting the Bible would not always be called strictly modern, yet as his distinguished colleague, Dr. John Kelman, intimated one day as were were discussing the series of sermons referred to, it is marvelous to see how his unerring homiletic instinct and his genuinely sympathetic insight carry him so far in the heart of essential truth that he appears always as a leader rather than a follower in the way of progress.

Dr. Whyte's recently accepted position as principal of New College interferes little with his pastoral duties, as in his case it is rather honorary than onerous. He comes frequently to the common noonday meal in the large dining rom with some one of the professors, and presides at various missionary meetings and social gatherings, but he gives no actual discourses, a fact certainly to be regretted.

At Worship in the Heart of His Home

We have glimpsed him in many places, always a welcome and inspiring figure, but the post he graces most happily and memorably is that of husband, father, and host in his hospitable home. No one who has there ended an entertaining evening in the parlors by resorting with all the family, guests and servants to the magnificent study on the second floor for the family worship with which the day closes, can ever forget the scene. Interesting to a stranger as are the laden walls and bookcases, the interest centers for all in the honored master of the house sitting pensively with the Bible across his knees. Half-forgetful of his auditors, he then alternately reads and ruminates aloud upon the verses so dearly loved and so clearly discerned. Finally, the diverse company kneels with him as for many moments he utters his heart's longings and praise to his heavenly Father, into the intimate presence of whom he ushers us all.

We believe and pray that many years of active service may still stretch before "the grand old man" of the Scotch pulpit, although he has already outlived so many of his princely contemporaries and friends, like Dods and Rainy, Davidson and Drummond and Robertson Smith. He is the last and not the least of that noble company of deathless personalities—deathless here as well as hereafter, for George Eliot has told us that we live essentially and eternally in the lives made richer by our influence.

The Cry of the Children

BY JOSEPH ERNEST McAFEE

A READING of current newspapers, coupled with statistics from recent child labor reports, impresses the fact that there is much yet to be accomplished to make the life of the immigrant child the happy, free existence every childhood should be. The story of tiny tots of 3 years old bearing the burdens of life with brothers and sisters from 8 to 10, and measuring up to laboring hours that stretch from early dawn toward midnight, is one of the darkest passages in American industrial annals.

From Italy we get our most beautiful conceptions of the Christ Child—yet in the dark, dingy noisome tenements of our Christian cities, in the dank marshes of our blueberry and cranberry fields, in the grimy, cheerless darkness of our coal mines, on the rough banks of oyster shells, the little aliens are expending their vitality and losing their childhood for a mere pittance.

As long as her eyes will stay open, a tiny tot of 3 or 5 works busily away at artificial flowers. In another corner of the room an 8-year-old ties knots in willow plumes, while little Assunta, only 12, nods wearily over the lace she has been making all day. Across the hall two young neighbors pick nut meats far into the night, and the visiting nurse, whose indignation and heartache keep pace with each other, will tell you pitiful tales of lives ruined and bodies blighted by this tyrant of industry that saps the children of our tenements.

Within the last two years much has been said and written of the employment of children in the canneries. Shucking peas, stringing beans, flaking fish, shelling oysters, picking fruit—these are tasks that fall to the deft fingers of the little workers. Long hours, heavy loads, crowded and unsanitary environments, no schooling, no religious instruction, all help to make the child's condition pitiable and give poor promise of the citizenship of coming generations.

In New York state alone 543 children, under 14 years of age, were found at work under terrible conditions. In one factory the majority ranged in age from 7 to 9. In the Italian section children from 2 years old were working beside their mothers. Hours were long, extending from 7 in the morning to midnight. The children work till late in the fall, and when opportunity is finally given for school, they are far behind in classes and have little or no mental or physical reserves for further effort.

So far this is a field neglected by the church. Much might and should be done during the canning season for the women and children, and more as they come back into the towns and cities for the winter. Last year the National Child Welfare Bureau was established at Washington, and this will form a good medium of cooperation through which we may hope to obtain their rights for the children. Meantime, the call comes to every Christian community throughout the land for special effort for the children from across the waters who will some day be either American citizens or missionaries to their homelands.

Getting Down to Bed Rock in Men's Work

BY HERBERT H. SMITH

Robert E. Ross

Francis M. Fox, D. D.

"IF OUR men will handle the job under their hands in their own churches, we need not worry about the 'big' things to be done by our organization." It was this idea expressed in various forms which led the Chicago Presbyterian Brotherhood to give its cordial cooperation to the National Council of the Brotherhood in an experiment which seems to have proved worth while. The plan contemplated a demonstration of intensive work in local Chicago churches and its application brought to Chicago Francis M. Fox, D. D., for several years university pastor at Iowa City. "Make the local units efficient" has been the policy toward which the Chicago Brotherhood, under the presidency of Robert E. Ross, has been turning. Local and national leaders were in sympathy. A conference of the pastors of Chicago Presbytery was held and Dr. Fox was invited to visit several churches in succession and to work with the pastor, session and men in studying the field, devising plans to meet special conditions, and developing local leadership. In nearly all of fifteen churches he has settled down to two full weeks of direct association with the pastor and laymen in their activities.

The results of this six months' campaign cannot be represented in figures. The aim has been to create a spirit of true brotherliness among the men, and the cultivation of this spirit, together with a deepening of the devotional life, has led to additional recruits to Bible study classes, and larger use of the facilities at hand. At least two churches have gymnasium projects well under way. Men in many churches have been persuaded to invite other men to join the church and its various organizations, and much good working material has been brought into active use. One man living only two blocks from a church but not previously interested told the men that he never had an idea that any church in the vicinity was doing the sort of work that he found there. Over 100 Presbyterian families in one suburb were discovered by the house-to-house canvass which the men decided was necessary in order that they might know definitely just what they had to work upon. Men in another church have been surprised at the ability of their own sons who were put upon the program at a dinner given by "the fathers" to "the sons" of the church. Many men have been led to take a deeper interest in the welfare of the boys.

Dr. Fox goes before the men with no preconceived program for local work. He tries to discover the things in which the men are most interested, and urges that they can do better work if they really know their community and its peculiar needs. Usually they don't know. This has in most cases resulted in a survey undertaken by the men, and this survey has always revealed previously unsuspected facts. If the congregation has not already an active missionary committee, the opportunities of service through it are suggested. Bringing the local church to the notice of possible churchgoers through newspapers, church papers and other means of publicity is also a part of the brotherhood program. Not all of these details are urged upon any one church, but suggestions are made in accordance with the need as revealed by observation and discussion with the men on the field.

Dr. Fox enters heartily with the pastor and men into the details of "trying out" the work which he suggests, and from his experience in other congregations is able to present ways of overcoming difficulties. The brotherhood program of intensified work as demonstrated in Chicago churches will fit any church with proper modifications. Chicago pastors who have joined heartily in these plans assert that their churches have been greatly benefited.

Newcomers to Chicago are being brought into relationship with the men of the church through the "Strangers' Bureau," an idea that had long persisted in the mind of Calvin H. Mills, for years the indefatigable secretary of the Chicago Brotherhood, and now given practical demonstration under Dr. Fox. Through advertisements in The Continent and other papers and by letters to pastors there has been developed a continuous inflow of names of young men who have come to Chicago. These newcomers had in most cases not connected themselves with a church and through a visit by the nearest minister or a member of the brotherhood a large number have been brought into active service.

Why Progress Lags in Turkey

At the gate of many a large Turkish mansion or palace or konak is an official known as a yassakji, or forbidder. His duty is to block the way of as many people as he can, to save his master from annoyance. The yassakji is typical of much that is Turkish. Blocking the wheels of progress has not been the work of foreigners so much as of the very character and customs of the average people of the land. Every effort at reform finds either stolid indifference or active opposition on the part of either higher or lower officials or the Moslem clergy or the ignorant country folk. This truth may not be palatable, but it is only just in the face of this attack to tell the honest truth.—The Orient.

—Growth in grace does not consist in a man's becoming better than others, but in becoming better than himself.

AN AMERICAN SIR
HIGGINBOTTOM OF ALLAHABAD

Fifty-Two Lepers Were Baptized in This Leper Church, 1910 to 1912

JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL has told well the story of the young knight who learned, after his lesson in life, to share his best with an outcast leper. The poem teaches that tossing a gold coin to a leper is not charity. With it sympathy must go.

An American Sir Launfal is Higginbottom of Allahabad, whose appeals for the relief of lepers who in India now number nearly a fifth of a million have been heard by many. There is no title connected with his name; the signature is plain "Sam." Higginbottom is a name the untutored Indian tongue has some trouble in pronouncing, just as was that of the father of William Makepeace Thackeray of the Indian civil service. The Indians a century ago called him "Tickery Sahib." Their attempts today to pronounce the name of Higginbottom are often not much more successful.

When I went to Allahabad to teach in the Ewing College, I had heard much about the lepers; but somehow when it was suggested that I visit the asylum, my heart failed me. Every day I could look across the blue river and see the home of the untainted leper children shining in the sun, and I thought that was close enough to go. Saturday mornings were free, but week after week passed with good excuses for postponing my visit to Mr. Higginbottom's institution. The old dread of the disease acquired from reading "Ben Hur" years ago was the real reason for my procrastination. Even the authoritative statement in the Encyclopedia Britannica was not enough to overcome my prejudice.

But one fine morning we mounted our bicycles and were off for a ride across the bridge of the Jumna river, here half a mile wide. Down the avenue of trees we rode on one of those splendid roads that the British have built all over the empire. When the sun begins to warm up, one is grateful for the foresight of the early officials in remitting the taxes of those who planted these trees along the thoroughfares. The jackals that flit about the road in evening time were not in evidence.

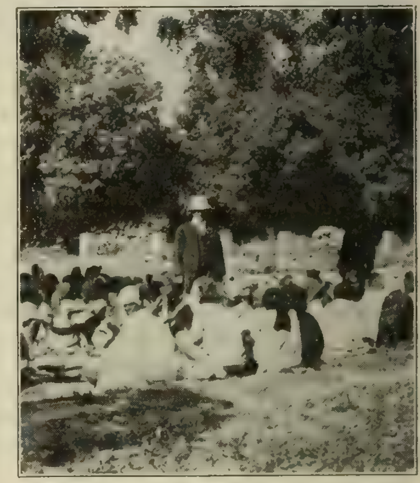
A Joyous Salute from the Poor Inmates

Somehow a feeling of horror comes over one as, leaving his bicycle outside, he walks through the great opened gate of the wall inside which live 250 men, women and children. The feeling is enhanced by what greets his eye. Poor mortals with fingers and hands gone were there with raucous voice and lusterless eyes. The artist has depicted Napoleon in the lazaretto at Jerusalem gazing on such wrecks of humanity; and even he was moved to pity. And yet somehow when one hears the joyful greeting and the "Salaam Sahib-ji" that comes from a score of men and then passes on down the line the feeling changes. Any critic of missions who can follow the superintendent through the asylum on his rounds, watching the faces light up with joy and hearing the affectionate salutation of the inmates, without modifying his opinions, is built on different lines from most men. We enjoyed the preliminary feu-de-joie the soldiers fired in quick succession as King George V. entered Delhi for the durbar; and the welcome that is accorded the superintendent and his visitors by the long line of lepers gathered before the barracks on inspection is something on the same order. Their cheerfulness dissipates one's horror and dread. Even those poor fellows that have only a stump of an arm left raise it in loving salaam.

Even the pet monkey seems to bound about to the full length of his chain with more agility than usual. One is tempted to ask if there is not a danger of his contracting leprosy. If there were, and if animals were not immune to the disease, perhaps before this scientists would have found by experimentation the bacillus of leprosy and its cure. I was grateful to the monkey, for he seemed with his antics to bring a little cheer into the neighborhood. Over in the other end was a pet deer, almost as large as an elk, which was a rival attraction.

One is impressed with the kind of buildings the men had for their rooms. The old mud houses with their thatched roofs that existed five years ago have been replaced by buildings of brick and tile with iron girders and concrete floors. Only the snakes, rats and other representatives of the animal kingdom suffer by the change, for there is no longer adequate hiding place for them. Large trees contribute welcome shade and the asylum is like a big garden. Gardening is Mr. Higginbottom's hobby. He saw no reason why it should not be the lepers' also. So each man was given a little plot of ground of his own to cultivate, an engine was put in to pump water for irrigation, and seeds were supplied free. Fighting and quarreling had been the recreation of the men before this. It is still a favorite diversion among the lower classes of India. One sometimes goes through the bazar in the morning and sees two women hurling the most contemptuous epithets across the wall at each other—and whatever else be their failings the vernaculars of India are rich in epithets—while the quarrel probably proceeds until one's return in the afternoon. The rule of the nation, however, is words, not blows.

In the asylum agriculture has solved this problem of amusement. One has to admire judiciously and tactfully the prize banana tree of one plot, the mangoes of another, and the luscious papyas of a third. Pepsin comes from this last fruit, but the products of this asylum are for home consumption and not manufacture. I asked several of the men to stand before their plots while I took a picture. One poor old man called out something and the pathos of it all came home when the interpreter said, "He says he would like to stand to oblige the young sahib, but his feet are gone!"



Mr. Higginbottom and Some of the Lepers at the Christmas Feast

Cheerfulness in the Women's Ward

The women's ward is just as cheerful, bright and happy. The superintendent tells how each is given six yards of cloth, which solves the dressmaker's problem for them. The men are given four yards of the same material when they enter. The blankets distributed are very coarse. They cost about 50 cents apiece. A non-Christian merchant of the city has donated many to the asylum.

Each inmate gets about twenty ounces of ground wheat a day and 4 annas a week. Translated into American currency that is only 8 cents, but that is the wages of two days' work for the laborer in India. With the 4 annas is purchased all that goes to make the meal of grain appetizing.

Salt and red pepper are the garnishings. Rice is too great a luxury for most of them. Preparing the food takes up a good many hours in the day, for "every man his own cook" is the rule for Hindustan. I think a little firewood is also given with the week's allowance. The cooperative store has put a new interest in life. Formerly everything was given outright, but now the 250 inmates experience a certain pleasure in spending their 8 cents a week. It reminds them they are not wholly unlike their fellow men.

We see the leper hospital next, but decline the invitation to enter. One likes to keep at a respectful distance at first. On its wall is the inscription 'Cleanse the Lepers." It means much to those men and women to know that these buildings were built in the name of Him who had a place in his heart for sufferers like themselves.

The hospital was the first of the new buildings. In charge of it is an Agra College graduate, Hospital Assistant West, to use the medical degree he has obtained after passing the government examination. He is also an ordained minister and is in charge of the church, although he is not a leper.

The church was built last of all. Though last, it is not least. Over half of the lepers are Christian; fifty-two were baptized in the two years preceding May, 1912. The bell is rung for an impromptu service. The tall young man from the Punjab who teaches the asylum school presides at the drums. He is assisted by other members of the orchestra, and how the lepers sing! There are some interesting stories connected with the church which show the unselfishness of the members. Every week a collection is taken up, but it is not used for themselves. The pulpit Bible in Hindi which they gave to the church represented a real sacrifice. One feels that their faith means much to them; certainly it teaches them to bear their cross with smiles.

LAUNFAL IN INDIA

AND HIS WORK ❯ BY STANLEY A. HUNTER

Many outsiders pass by the asylum every day. It must impress them as an object lesson in Christianity. The church has only wire screens for doors, to let the purifying sunlight in during the day. At evening time, at the vesper services, the Christian hymns may be heard for a great distance, for the doors do not shut in the sound. When I was saying good-by to one of my fourth year students, a boy of some wealth and of the highest caste, whom I had taken through William James's psychology and met every day for half an hour in the college Bible class, there was testimony given of how the Christianity of these outcaste lepers had affected him. He said, "I have just come in from a walk across the river and heard those lepers sing, for whom we Hindus have done nothing. I am not ready to become a Christian, but I do love Christ. I have seen what faith in him means to his followers."

Christmas Feast for the Lepers Is Notable

After a first visit one goes frequently. To be present on an occasion like the Christmas feast and see the 250 inmates sit down to a Christmas dinner under the mango trees, while music plays, is an inspiration. Mr. Higginbottom when he was at home told friends "every leper regards his Christmas as about complete if he can get a new warm muffler—the more color the better." I had the pleasure of helping to unpack a box of these mufflers, which were to be used as turbans by day and coverings by night, and can testify that the color was all that could be desired. It was a happy day. The sixteen "brownies" from the untainted children's home were there to be admired by their parents—at a distance. Mrs. Higginbottom takes good care that they shall run no danger.

This, then, is a glimpse of the Naini asylum. It does not take all of Mr. Higginbottom's time. It is only his hobby. Most of his time has always been spent in the Presbyterian College teaching young men. It shows his wide range of sympathy. When he came home on a furlough he had a plan for an agricultural college, and he spent two years in Ohio State University fitting himself to teach agriculture instead of economics. Part of his economics and jurisprudence he learned in Woodrow Wilson's classroom at Princeton, for he graduated there, an enthusiastic admirer of the President, in the class of 1903.

The Mission to Lepers in India and the East owns the asylum. The Presbyterian mission gladly lends Mr. Higginbottom's services, for that mission has supplied superintendents for the asylum for over fifty years. The British government grant and local charity help greatly in the finances. It is a mission institution that convinces the skeptical—and it is only one of fifty-nine such in India.

"Freedom, Good Will and Peace"

BY JAMES A. MACDONALD

ONE HUNDRED YEARS AGO was fought the battle of Lake Erie. In the light of modern naval warfare, judged by the standard of the superdreadnaught and the submarine, of the airship and the fourteen-inch gun, that battle was a small affair. As a struggle between man and man, and as an incident in the war of which it formed a part, the battle of Lake Erie has its own interest and its own importance.

In the light of the hundred years through which we of today read the story of that one battle, and of that whole war, the lesson, the supreme and abiding lesson, for the United States and for Canada is this: The utter futility and inconsequence of war as a means for the just settlement of disputes between these two nations. That lesson we both have learned. That war was our last war. It will remain our last. And having learned that great lesson, having proved its worth through a hundred years, the United States and Canada, these two English-speaking peoples of America, have earned the right to stand up and teach the nations. International peace and good-will is America's message to all the world.

Not only is war ineffectual as a means for the just settlement of disputes between civilized nations, but, by the very irony of fate, most wars have reactions quite the opposite of their original intention. The undesigned reactions of war are the surprises of history.

In 1812 the dominant war party in this newborn republic, blind to the real genius of the nation, deaf to the warnings of the highest instincts, and in defiance of the recorded protests of some of the greatest of its states, cherished the hope of shifting its northern boundary from the Great Lakes to the Arctic and making the republic coterminous with the continent. They failed. The fates were against them. The Canadian pioneers, they also, were men of British blood. The undesigned reaction of the war of 1812 is the Canada of today.

Our deepest concern is not with the wars of the past, but with the peace of the future; not with the glory that either nation achieved a hundred years ago, but with the message which both nations, speaking in the name of our common North American civilization, shall give to the world through the hundred years to come.

That message is one message. It is America's message that on this continent, between two proud peoples, the barbarism of brute force has long yielded to civilized internationalism. It is the assurance that Canada's national standing on this continent binds the British empire and the American republic in one world-spanning English speaking fraternity.

Once men dreamed of peace through the world sovereignty of some master mind like Alexander or some ruling race like the Romans. But that dream of peace, the peace not of free men but of weaklings and slaves, was doomed forever when Napoleon and his army staggered under the curse of God.

But a new day dawned, dawned for the statesmen, dawned for the nations. It is the day of national rights and national responsibilities. The two nations of America have seen the coming of that day, have seen it through these generations of peace, have seen it and are glad. We of today are pledged, we and our nations with us, pledged to preach this gospel of freedom, good will and peace. This is America's vision; this America's message; this America's obligation to the world.

Some Problems of the Everyday

A SUNDAY SCHOOL TEACHER TRAVELS ON SUNDAY

"One of our teachers deserted her class and used all day Sunday traveling to visit a friend," announced the superintendent to a meeting of Sunday school officers recently. The question of the strictness with which a superintendent should hold teachers for their personal conduct was then discussed thoroughly. It was suggested that if all of the teachers were required to abstain from the things the superintendent believed harmful there would not be enough teachers to conduct the classes, yet there was a congregation of 800 to draw from.

"I have traveled on Sunday only once," said the head of the school. "I was then working for others and got orders to leave Saturday night for a ride of 750 miles and to report Monday morning. I was fearful all Sunday that the train would run off the track. I had an unaccountable fear of that ride."

Other officers of the school, business men in a large city, freely confessed that they did not travel on Sunday, but agreed that the question of what action to be taken, if any, toward the teacher who set a bad example was not easily solved without injured feelings.

HIGH IDEALS ON ONE FINANCIAL PROBLEM

"I have been appointed administrator for an estate lately," said the pastor of a medium-sized church composed of members whose means are not ample and who depend upon their pastor for much of the leadership.

In response to a suggestion from a lawyer friend that the minister should not be so self-sacrificing as to refuse a fee for the performance of this legal duty, the pastor explained his position. "While this member of my congregation was sick I visited him very often and frequently was able to serve him in a business way before his death. I did this gladly as part of my regular work of the church. My position as administrator after his death I look upon merely as an extension of my pastoral duties. I certainly don't think it would be the proper thing for me to take a fee for my personal use, although the attorney has urged that I do this. There is also some hard feeling among the relatives of the man on account of the fact that all of his property, amounting to $1,500, was left to a niece who was very kind to him during his illness. Other relatives who avoided the sick man are now saying that they should have some of this money. They are members of my church and I don't want them to be able to say that I received any of the disputed funds. Whenever I am forced to take money for funerals I invariably turn the money into the benevolent treasury of the church, and I will do the same thing if I decide to take a fee as administrator."

The Place of Peace

At the heart of the cyclone tearing the sky
And flinging the clouds and the towers by,
  Is a place of central calm:
So here in the roar of mortal things
I have a place where my spirit sings,
  In the hollow of God's palm.

—Edwin Markham in The Nautilus.

The clever young Englishman spent a vacation in the country at a house where the landlady professed to give bed and board for 25 shillings a week. "I assure you," he reported, gravely, "I was there a week before I discovered which was the bed and which was the board."

THE WAYFARER

One Woman, Just Kate

If THE FAT drummer who rode with The Wayfarer from the Lackawanna station in the public hack should chance to see these lines he will please accept them as thanks for his insistence upon the merits of the older hotel in town, those merits being typified by the virtues of a certain head waitress called Kate.

Now what traveling salesmen commonly say about hotel waitresses is not designed to make an article in The Continent. But this Kate, it seemed, is a wonder—the mother friend and guardian angel of an army of traveling men. Her tables are as near to a home as some of these knights of trade ever get. The excellence of the covering and service under Kate's eye; the cleanliness of everything; the abundance and personal interest—all blended in the fat drummer's song.

And so it proved. Whether that particular York state hostelry partakes of the spirit of Kate, or Kate is the result of her environment, it boots little to discuss. In the dining room The Wayfarer fell into the hands of this genius among head waiters. Followed good food, immaculate service, and then such a solicitude as is associated only with the perfect English butler on his native shores. "Let me bring you some hotter biscuit. Won't you have a little more salad? I may fill your cup, may I not?"—thus ran the suggestions like those of a solicitous hostess. And that in a commercial American-plan hotel!

* * * * *

One table in the big dining room is reserved exclusively for traveling salesmen. This is Kate's peculiar domain. To her these hungry, lonely men are a sacred charge, her life work. And the devotion which the favorites of the stage receive from their public is not comparable with the loyalty of these men to their friend Kate. Most of them do not know any other name for her. She seeks no praise or reward. In simple, faithful, thoughtfulness she ministers to the many of the little human kindnesses that are commonly reserved for one man on the part of one woman. Her lot would be esteemed humble; she has made it great. Because of her example the worth of all womanhood has been sweetened and exalted in the eyes of thousands of men. She has honorably represented her sex.

* * * * *

Because of Kate the other waitresses in her hotel have the same unaffectedly friendly, helpful attitude toward the guests in the dining room. They have exalted their calling into an art. Would that all the slack and slovenly and silly and sentimental waitresses of the land, toward whom the traveling men turn their worst nature, might learn the lesson of Kate, that

"A servant with this clause
  Makes drudgery divine;
Who sweeps a room as by Thy laws
  Makes that and the action fine."

It is not the work we do, but the way we do it, that determines success.

* * * * *

Already the traveling men are planning for a memorial to Kate. What a funeral she will have—in a day which thousands hope is far distant. This gray-haired woman, whose sphere has been apparently limited to the four walls of a hotel, has expressed herself in terms of life. She has made deposit of her personality in uncounted characters. Her friends have carried the fragrance of her ministering life into the far corners of the country. Measured by the oldest standards, her career has been successful. In woman's way she has done a woman's work in the world.

"Perils of the Press"

Something of the trials of an editor may be found in the tragic meaning which the change of a single letter in a word may give to a sentence. A paragraph in a recent number of Our Church Bell, published by the Oak Park church, Chicago, relating to a good friend who has been in Scotland for a visit, almost passed the scrutiny of the editor pro tem., who had referred to his friend's home as the "land of the heather," but the printer called it "the land of the heathen"! The words are in no sense synonymous, and a Scottish proofreader would have detected the unintentional insult to his native flower.

THE HOME COUNCIL

Tinkering Our Faults

By Cora S. Day

Why beholdest thou the mote that is in thy brother's eye, but considerest not the beam that is in thine own eye? Or how wilt thou say to thy brother, Let me cast out the mote out of thine eye; and lo, the beam is in thine own eye? Thou hypocrite, cast out first the beam out of thine own eye; and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother's eye.—Matthew 7:3-5.

"WHEN I FEEL as if the world is all out of kilter," said Aunt Hannah in her shrewd way, "I begin tinkerin' it right at home. By the time I get myself in good runnin' order, I generally find that the rest of the folks are going along at about the usual jog."

Maude had just been complaining that her best friend had treated her coolly at their last meeting. Anne had expressed her unfavorable opinion of the way last night's concert had been planned and carried out. Ralph had only a few minutes before confided to the others that to his mind the manners of certain new young folks in the place were open to much revision.

Three young faces flushed when Aunt Hannah looked up from her darning and placidly gave her recipe for setting the world right. The homely statement struck home. One of her hearers was prompt to acknowledge it.

"You're right, Aunt Hannah," he declared. "I guess we'd better try that, too—hadn't we, girls? Do you remember that lecture we heard the other night? The speaker spoke about some one, Mattheman I think it was, who wrote, 'When looking for faults that need correcting use a mirror, not a telescope.' Let's try the mirror method—and do our tinkering at home, like Aunt Hannah."

Seeing the glaring faults of others and steadfastly ignoring our own little peculiarities is a human trait of quite ancient origin. Observance of the mote in our brother's eye and neglect of the beam in our own is a practice indulged in for countless years. And it is pretty poor business.

Why not form a League for Ignoring Other Folk's Faults? Or a Society for Beginning Reform at Home? It might be called the Mirror Club, or the Anti-Telescope Union. Or at least, each one of us can, like Aunt Hannah, be a reform element of one, laying honest claim to his share of the world's faults, and leaving others to handle theirs. He will at once "begin tinkerin' right at home" on his own mistakes and failings. If each one did that conscientiously the world would get into good "kilter" in short order.

"Tinkerin'" won't be easy. We shall have to bear constantly in mind that we can never work too earnestly and sincerely and prayerfully to correct our faults. We can never set our hopes and ideals too high. Our standards should never be short of perfection. There is a Gaelic proverb that says: "If the best man's faults were written on his forehead, it would make him pull his hat over his eyes." Nevertheless because of faults not yet overcome the best men never cease to strive after holiness. Like them, we can win only by untiring faith and effort; by climbing a little higher after each fall, by trying harder after each failure. Only so can we hold what gain we make and advance, step by step, toward the perfection taught in the Book; toward that time when the faults shall be erased and on our foreheads shall be written that new name which we shall be proud to let the very angels read.

We have but to look honestly into our hearts to see there the flaws that need tinkering. That straightforward look will bring us face to face with the fact that we have enough to do at home without trying to tinker the faults of others, or condemning or meddling with our nighbor, save to lend a loving, helping hand when we can. Such a soul-searching will enable us to say sincerely with Coleridge—

"Frail creatures are we all; to be the best,
Is but the fewest faults to have,"

and to take to our hearts his advice—

"Look thou then to thyself, and leave the rest
To God, thy conscience, and the grave."

Doing this, we shall soon find that we have taken up a lifework. For "tinkerin' right at home" is a never-ending task. Yet there is none more worth while, for it is full of glad possibilities of wonderful victories, of moments of supreme joy, of precious glimpses of the glorious things some day to be attained in His good time.

Our Homely Friend, the Prune

With the fresh fruit fast going from tree and vine, and the rows of canned fruit on the shelves still a bit too sacred for invasion, the housewife's mental eyes take a hurried look round for something to bridge the gap. It stops at the good, homely, steady-going prune and rests there.

The prune, as a really valuable fruit-citizen, is rather more interesting than its unmerited reputation as a mere boarding house standby would lead one to suppose. In its fresh state it is a beautiful bluish plum, says Leslie's, either lusciously sweet or tartly sweet, according to the variety. The very sweet are the French, and the tart the Italian and German. While any variety of plum having the requisite amount of sugar and solids will make a prune, the great mass of production is confined to the varieties above named.

California is the home of the prune in America, although large quantities are now produced in Oregon and Washington. But it is the climate of California, with its dry, rainless summers, warm days and cool nights, that makes it ideal both for producing and drying.

The first large prune orchard in California was planted in 1870 and today the state's crop is gathered from thousands of orchards representing nearly 5,000,000 trees in the aggregate, and the production in California alone has reached the enormous figure of 200,000,000 pounds, to produce which 500,000,000 pounds of fresh fruit must be gathered and dried, for it takes about two and one-half pounds of fresh fruit to produce one pound of the dried product.

Think of all these individual pieces dropping from the trees and gathered by the orchardists of California, then spread on wooden trays and placed in the sun to dry in a climate where it rarely rains during July, August and September, the fruit drying season. Thousands of orchardists and their helpers empty this vast product into bags and boxes and lines of wagons deliver it at the packing houses of the commercial packers and shippers, where each variety (sweet or tart) is kept separate and every prune is passed through mechanical "graders" to separate the commercial sizes. Prunes the world over are bought and sold on what is known as the "point" system (or size), that is, 30 to 40, 40 to 50 and so on up to 100 to 120 to the pound, the 30-40's being the largest and the 100-120 and over the smallest.

Verily, our friend the prune is not so lowly and insignificant as the humorist would have us believe.

Prayers for the Little Ones

The first of these prayers we have found valuable to teach to our children at the breakfast table. We do not know its author. I have written its companion for the evening prayer. They may be used as short prayers for the children in the morning and evening, at the bedside. I trust that they will be found valuable in inculcating the prayer life among children.

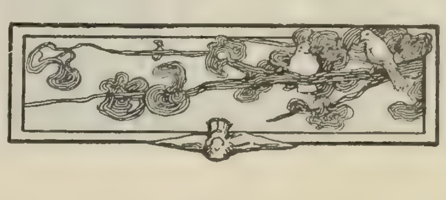
MORNING PRAYER

Now before we work today,
We must not forget to pray
To God who kept us through the night,
And brought us safe to morning light.
This is the prayer we bring to thee:
Open our eyes thy works to see;
Raise up our heads to praise thee still;
Open our hands to do thy will.

EVENING PRAYER

Now before we rest in sleep,
We must pray to God to keep
Us safe until the morning light.
He will protect us by his might,
Whatever comes of good or ill.
We trust our all to his great will;
We trust ourselves and all we love
To God, who rules and reigns above.

FRANK M. WOOD.



For a "Sane" Thanksgiving

What does Thanksgiving mean in your home? Do you make of it really a day of Thanksgiving? Do your children look upon it simply as a day for feasting and fun? Or do you teach them that it is a time for special gratitude to their heavenly Father? Do you tell them the story of its origin and what has made it an integral part of our national health and life? Do you help them to see that to be truly thankful, we must also make it possible for someone else to be thankful?

Or is Thanksgiving simply a feast day with you—a day of food and fun?

Our national holidays are growing farther and farther away from their original significance. Decoration Day, with the passing of the brave men who have kept its spirit alive, grows yearly less that soldiers' day. The Fourth, shorn of its crackers and guns, is in danger, even while we applaud the reform, of losing its hold on the patriotic ardor of Young America. Thanksgiving is exchanging Plymouth Rock for feast and football.

What are you doing in your family to preserve the spirit of Thanksgiving in its true essence? Will you not tell the Home Council how you are cherishing and nurturing that spirit, while sacrificing nothing of the cheer and jollity which is also the day's rightful due?

The Continent will pay $1 each for letters which it considers worthy of publication, giving practical suggestions, based on actual experience, for making a "sane" Thanksgiving Day. Letters must contain not more than 300 words, must be written in ink on one side of the paper only, and signed with full name and address. They must be at The Continent office by Oct. 25.

One Man in a Thousand

"Yes, indeed, my husband is a remarkable man," insisted Mrs. Rogers.

"I suppose nearly every woman has that opinion of her husband," replied her friend.

"But I'm sure my husband is an extraordinary man," persisted Mrs. Rogers. "I told him, this morning, where something was in one of the closets, and he found it."

How You Can Make a Store

BY HELEN WILCOX

THERE IS A NEW STORE in Harold Bridge's yard. It was built Saturday morning and was open for business a few hours later. In fact, Harold built it himself. Wouldn't you like to know how to make a store like Harold's and how to stock it afterwards?

Get a strong wooden box—a soap box will do nicely—about two feet long, a foot deep and a foot high, for the store itself. Take off the cover and paint the box white inside and out. When the paint has dried, set the box up with the opening toward you, so that the inside top and bottom make the floor and ceiling of the store.

Make the shelves first of all. You will need many shelves in an old-fashioned country store such as yours is going to be. For the shelves use pasteboard partitions such as come in egg boxes; use as many as you need to cover the wall space behind the counters. Or if you can, make the shelves of stiff cardboard. Each shelf should be as long as the wall to which you intend to fasten it, and three inches wide when it is finished. If you want two rows of shelves on the three walls of the store, cut six strips, four inches wide. Four of these should be twelve inches long and two twenty-four inches long. Make each strip three inches wide by turning down the fourth inch of width to form a support for the shelf. Glue the supports firmly to the walls of the store.

The egg box partitions are especially convenient for a country store because they have upright divisions which divide the shelves into little compartments. On the edges of the shelves paste a neat trimming of lace paper, such as is found in candy boxes.

Build counters in front of the shelves, using two large spools as supports for each counter. For the top and sides of the counters, fold pieces of cardboard so as to cover the spools and glue them in place. Boxes in which preserved fruits are sold have glass tops. They make splendid showcases. If you have one, place it on two spools and you will have a showcase just right for the display of make-believe candies.

Make the storekeeper's old-fashioned swinging scales next. Use the covers of two small-sized baking powder tins for the balances. One is to hold the bag of flour or whatever else you intend to weigh, and the other the weights, small stones of different sizes. Punch four holes, equal distances apart, in the rim of each cover and in each hole fasten a string, three and a half inches long. Bring the four strings together in a knot. Screw a brass hook into the ceiling of the store and over it slip a strong elastic band. The balances are to hang at either end of a wire made of a straightened hairpin. Fasten on one of them by bending up the wire at one end over the knot of the four strings. Then run the other end of the wire through the elastic band and fasten on the remaining balance. If the elastic band is over the exact center of the wire, your scales will balance nicely.

Stools on which your paper doll customers may sit will complete the inside furnishings. Make these by pasting circles of cardboard on spools. Collect all the bright pictures advertising such articles as you have for sale and paste them on the walls. Most real stores have signs, you know. Print your sign neatly on a strip of paper a little shorter than your store is long. Print the letters red or black, then tack or paste the sign to the upper front edge of the box.

Now you must lay in your stock. All the sample packages of foods, little boxes and bottles that mother can find for you help to fill the shelves, counters and floor space. The small round wooden boxes with tight covers which some manufacturers use for putting up their goods are just the thing for firkins or tubs. Print "Butter" in black letters on one and set it under the counter. You can mark others "Oats," "Barley," "Corn," and so on and fill them with sawdust. The bottom of a round pill box is the measure for your storekeeper to use in dipping out his grain.

A country store always has barrels—apple barrels, cracker barrels and so on. The barrels in your store are baking powder tins covered with white paper. Draw or paint black lines on the paper to imitate the hoops and staves. Label one "Snow Apples" and fill it with cranberries, and another "Hardtack" and fill it with tiny oyster crackers. The sugar barrel may hold sand and the bean barrel small white beads. What would a store be without a barrel of potatoes! Fill one of your barrels with big red kidney beans. Label them "Potatoes" and your little doll customers will be satisfied.

If the shelves look empty after your sample packages are in place, make a number of little bags of white cotton an inch and a half long by three-quarters of an inch wide. Stuff them with sawdust or sand and tie up the tops with string. Print "Salt" on some and "Pepper" on others. Tie up some tiny paper packages and add them to the collection on the grocery side of the store. On one end of one counter rest a porcelain cold cream jar bottom side up. This is a cover for the big orange cheese that country storekeepers sell. A round, flat cork painted orange is the cheese. On the other end pile four or five English walnuts that you have painted bright orange to look like pumpkins.

There must be something in your store to tempt the paper doll children. Cut up a straw into inch pieces and paint around it red strips to imitate peppermint stick candy. Fill some tiny glass jars with these and set them on the shelves behind the showcase. Put round and yellow glass beads in the glass topped case. A red bead stuck on the end of a straw is a perfect lollipop for a paper doll child.

Keep one side of the store for the dry goods. Roll a strip of red or green cotton around a piece of cardboard two inches long by an inch wide and you will have a doll-size bale of cloth. Look in the rag bag for scraps of wool, silk and satin to make more bales. Wind some of the narrowest of paper lace on bits of cardboard for sale to customers who want lace. Twist a few strands of worsted into little skeins of yarn, red, gray, black, not forgetting pink and blue, for little paper doll girls' caps and mittens. Wee bolts of bright colored ribbon can be made by winding very narrow strips of tissue paper on little rolls of cardboard. Cut some little squares of white tissue paper, too, for handkerchiefs, and a few larger red and blue ones for bandannas.

Your store is now ready for a storekeeper, his clerks and the customers. Any paper dolls will make good customers. Hunt through the advertising supplement of the magazines, and you will find pictures from which you can cut the storekeeper and his clerks. Stiffen their backs with cardboard and paste them on blocks of wood so they can stand behind the counter.

The front of the shop, of course, stands open so that you may look in, but if you wish to have a store front to close at night it is easily

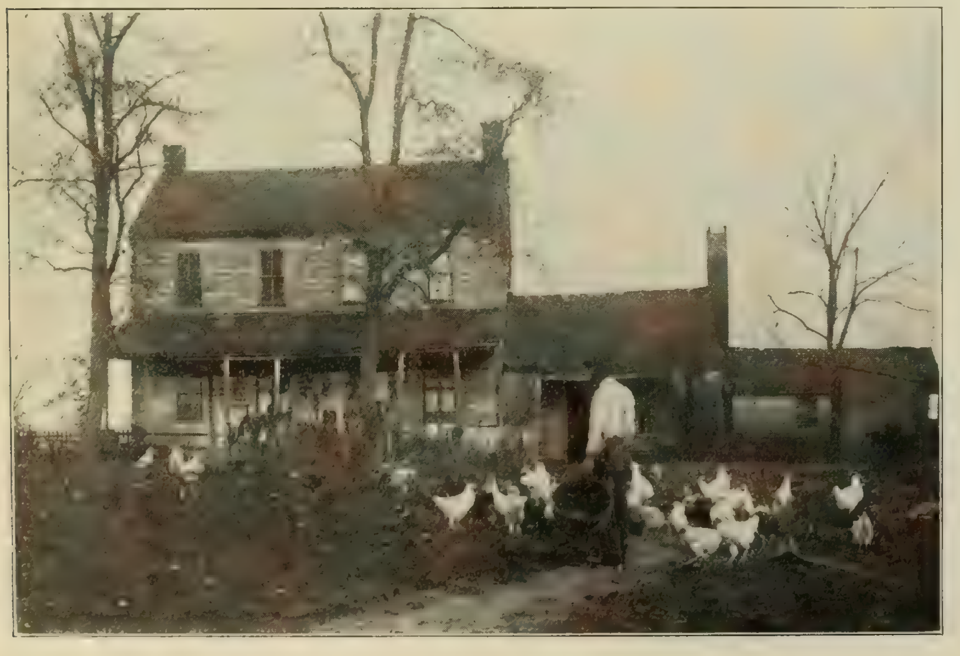
What Story Does This Picture Tell You?

DEAR YOUNG AMERICA: Of course you know what holiday falls next month. Every patriotic girl and boy knows about Thanksgiving Day. And if you are like the editor and the editor's brothers and sisters when they were your age, you are counting the days until it comes. They loved Thanksgiving because they always went—— But that's telling, and we never mean to drop any hints that will help anybody when there's going to be a contest. For that's what this is—a Thanksgiving story contest.



This Thanksgiving story must be about the accompanying picture, and not over 500 words long; and you're going to write it for this page. The best stories will be printed in the Thanksgiving number of The Continent. Of course you need not limit your story to just what you see in the picture, but the picture must be brought in in some way. And it's to be a real once-upon-a-time story, too, not a description of the picture.

Boys and girls 15 years and under may compete for the prizes. There will be two first prizes of $3 each, one for the best story written by a boy, the other for the best girl's story. The other prizes, three of them, will be books—recently published books for young people that you will be sure to like.

You remember the conditions: Stories must be written in ink, or typewritten, on one side of the paper only, and signed with your full name, address and age. And here's a new condition: The number of words in your story must be written in the upper right hand corner of page 1 of your manuscript. This will keep you from exceeding the word limit.

Your stories must be at the Young America headquarters by November 1. If they are as good as the editor expects them to be you will help her to have just what she wishes for you—a very happy Thanksgiving.

P. S.—Only two weeks more for those "vacation" stories of yours.

NEW BOOKS

Churchmen and Nonconformists

THE CHURCH AND RELIGIOUS UNITY, by Herbert Kelly, with preface by the Lord Bishop of Winchester. Mr. Kelly's first effort appears to be to realize the essential differences between churchmen and nonconformists. He does not dismiss the beliefs of the latter as unworthy of serious and careful thought. Nor does he assume that the doctrines of the church are easy to understand, or that, as presented by churchmen in general, the church position is above criticism. He aims through a careful analysis to determine what is permanently true and what is only of vanishing significance in each of the contending standpoints, and to show that, without surrendering anything of vital importance, churchmen and nonconformists can come together upon a common platform. To show what place, according to Mr. Kelly, sacrament and priesthood on the one side and freedom and evangelical piety on the other must be conceded on this platform would lead to a too lengthy discussion. Suffice it to say that the book is pervaded by the best spirit possible, and is entirely worthy of consideration at the hands of churchmen and evangelical leaders alike. For the Art Lover

THE ART OF THE WALLACE COLLECTION, by Henry C. Shelley. Mr. Shelley tells us that the Wallace collection of London is not only the most popular gallery from the viewpoint of the man in the street, but that for once connoisseurs agree with the popular judgment. As far as the amateur estimation of the gallery is concerned its romantic history has something to do with the matter, for before the last thirteen years in which it has been open to the public, the fame of its pictures and the romantic stories of its founding had spread far and wide. These stories Mr. Shelley tells us before entering upon his critical and expository chapters in which he notices all the pictures of outstanding interest. The author is a sane and appreciative critic, and never superficial in his judgments. The illustrations are reproductions in soft brown tints. [L. C. Page and Company, Boston. $2 net.

BRITISH PICTURES AND THEIR PAINTERS: An Anecdotal Guide to the British Section of the National Gallery, by E. V. Lucas. A little book for artists and all who are interested in art, giving a historical sketch of how the National Gallery began and something of its pictures and the men who painted them. Starting with Lemuel Francis Abbott, the book gives brief biographies and something about the work of each artist in the permanent exhibit. There are sixteen illustrations of famous pictures by Hogarth, Reynolds, Lawrence, Romney, Constable and others. [Macmillan Company, New York, $1.25 net.

Religious Topics

LETTERS TO UNKNOWN FRIENDS, by Lyman Abbott. The editor of The Outlook has always been a pastor at large for many troubled souls. Much of his ministry in their behalf has been by mail. Some time ago he began printing replies to what seemed typical inquiries, and he has gathered a score of them into this neat little volume. The solutions will satisfy scme, perhaps not all, but their spirit is so fine and trustful, so assured of God and his love, that they will be received widely with gratitude. [Doubleday, Page and Company, New York.

A CRITICAL INTRODUCTION TO THE OLD TESTAMENT, by George Buchanan Gray. Dr. Gray's book belongs to the class of shorter and more condensed works in Old Testament introductory study, and has been prepared primarily for the Studies in Theology Series. Though limited in compass it covers all the essentials and many matters which the ordinary student will consider unessential. Parts of the little volume make good readable material; other parts can be used only for reference. It is scarcely necessary to add that the standpoint, methods and views of Dr. Gray on all points in dispute between conservatives and "higher critics" agree with those of the latter, and also that he is an evangelical believer as distinguished from a rationalist. [Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. 75 cents net.

RELIGION AS LIFE, by Henry Churchill King. Here is President King at his best. The six talks which he prints have been given to student and other audiences, and are milled from high grade ore. There is steady pressure on the great realities of life, and it is urged that every vital decision is at heart a religious decision. The abiding significance of the Bible and of Christ is made plain. The essence of life is found in sharing the life of God by doing his will. [Macmillan Company, New York. $1 net.

THINGS THAT MATTER MOST, by John Henry Jowett. Here are thirty-eight tenderly helpful brief chapters for what Dr. Jowett describes as interludes of the soul in the incessant movement of the times. Though they are not sermons, each is really an exposition of some deep truth of God's revelation for life. [Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. $1.25 net.

HOW TO PREPARE SERMONS AND GOSPEL ADDRESSES, by William Evans. This is not intended as an exhaustive scheme of homiletics, but will be helpful to many preachers and men or women who are called to make formal religious addresses. The emphasis laid on thorough preparation is of special importance. [Bible Institute Colportage Association, Chicago. $1 net.

Three New Song Books

THE HYMNAL OF PRAISE makes one heartily sure that its publication was wise. The bulk of its material is the same as that to be found in all good modern hymn books, but its arrangement and character adapt it admirably to use in schools and colleges, and in churches of educational aim and spirit—uses for which it was especially designed. Some of the uncommon material is rich in devotional value—notably hymns by Richard Watson Gilder, an evening hymn by William H. Furness, Gill's adoration of the Master, two hymns for students by Ebenezer Oakley, Milton's strong verses, "The Lord Will Come," Kingsley's calm and wholesome prayer. A few faults are plain. It is hard to excuse the omission of the great second stanza from "When I Survey the Wondrous Cross," and lovers of James Russell Lowell cannot easily forgive the mutilation of "The Present Crisis." The proofreading has been painstaking, the only serious error noted being in No. 412, where a tune in three-four time is marked four-four. Perhaps it is too much to say that this is the best of all hymnals; but it is certainly one of the best, and we may confidently call it the best for the special uses for which it was designed. [A. S. Barnes and Company, New York.] WILLIAM PIERSON MERRILL.

BEST TEMPERANCE SONGS, compiled by W. E. Biederwolf and J. Gilchrist Lawson; musical editors, B. D. Ackley and Thoro Harris. This little collection contains a well-varied selection of songs serviceable in rousing enthusiasm in temperance meetings. Some of the tunes are old favorites, others are new. [Paper, 10 cents. Glad Tidings Publishing Company, Chicago.

THE VOICE OF THANKSGIVING, prepared by D. B. Towner. Probably nowhere in the world is there heartier congregational singing than at Moody Institute, where Dr. Towner is musical director. Presumably all of the hymns and tunes embraced in this collection have had ample demonstration and the fact that Dr. Towner himself is author of much of the music is in itself a guaranty of excellence. The 350 numbers include many that have stood the test of time, with an ample selection of newer ones, and the book is excellently adapted to the varied services of evangelistic churches. Scripture readings are included. [Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. 50 cents.

Of Varied Interest

THE KALLIKAK FAMILY: A Study in the Heredity of Feeble-Mindedness, by Henry Goddard. For years the Jukes family have been the classic and horrible example of hereditary undesirability. Now comes a much more instructive and closely studied family, the Kallikaks—a fictitious name of course—to take their place. The investigation into the Kallikaks came about through the study of the feeble-minded children in the Training School of Backward and Feeble-Minded Children at Vineland, New Jersey. In order to understand the causes of the feeble-minded cases there inquiries were made at the children's homes, and 65 per cent of the cases were found to be hereditary. The Kallikak family was the most notorious and had one of the most instructive histories unearthed. This record of it has been given out in advance of a larger and more systematic treatise which the author will publish, and in which he will make some important applications of the Mendelian law in the cases of inherited feeble-mindedness. As a clear piece of undogmatic scientific writing with the solidest kind of work behind it the book cannot be too strongly praised. [Macmillan Company, New York. $1.50 net.

A CHILD'S VISIONS, by Daphne Allen. This beautiful book is made up of drawing by a little girl only 12 years old. Her grandfather was the George Allen who was the publisher and intimate friend of Ruskin. The "visions" are of religious themes, showing Christ at the nativity, during youth and manhood, at the last supper, the crucifixion, Calvary and the ascension. "As a bird sings so were these drawings made," says C. Lewis Hind, who writes an introduction. W. D. Ellis in a preface explains that both in design and execution the pictures are entirely the unaided work of the child artist. The drawings are in color and pen and ink, and are remarkably expressive. Famous verses and songs, most of them by well known authors, such as "That Sweet Story of Old," are used to illustrate each of the forty-two pictures. [E. P. Dutton and Company, New York. $2 net.

THE TRUTH ABOUT THE TITANIC, by Archibald Gracie. The late Colonel Archibald Gracie was one of the heroes who so gallantly distinguished themselves on the night that the Titanic sank. Like others, he went down with the boat, but through a fortunate leap to an upper deck at a critical moment was saved the fate of the other men who had been with him on the starboard side of the Titanic, helping the women and children. This account of the tragedy is a most poignant as well as a most realistic document. But the most pathetic thing about the book is an afterword by another hand, telling of Colonel Gracie's succumbing eight months after the disaster to the strain of the long ordeal through which he passed. All the historical part of the work was done before his death, and, it may be said, done with a fairness, fullness and accuracy that cannot be too highly praised. THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

October 12, 1913—Jealousy and Envy Punished

Everyday View of the Lesson

By J. L. Scott

Lesson Text, Numbers 12. Golden Text, I. Corinthians 13:4-5: Love envieth not; love vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up, doth not behave itself unseemly.

The saying that blood is thicker than water applies quite as truly in the matter of hating as it does in loving. The author of Proverbs out of the depths of his knowledge of human nature voiced this conclusion: "A brother offended is harder to be won than a strong city; and such contentions are like the bars of a castle."

Last week there was war in the camp of Israel. Complaint had spread from tent to tent until the people were arrayed against their leader. This week the winds have shifted. The tents are at peace, while the tabernacle burns like a furnace. Sin is never purely local. It attacks the high and the low alike.

Miriam and Aaron Enter Into Conspiracy Against Moses

Miriam and Aaron, sister and brother, enter into a conspiracy against Moses. The professed cause of their attack was not primarily a grievance against him, but one against his wife. The record says that Moses had married an Ethiopian woman, a Cushite. There was nothing especially startling about this fact. Moses had done a similar thing while he was a resident in Midian many years before, or perhaps the wife of those days is meant. Zipporah, his wife, for some reason did not accompany him to Egypt. Quite possibly she had now rejoined him in the desert. If so, Miriam and her sister-in-law had but recently met for the first time. Or it may be that Zipporah had died and the lawgiver had taken another wife from the same country. The matter is immaterial, else it would not have been left in doubt.

When one wishes to be disagreeable an occasion is never hard to find. Whatever Miriam may have claimed, the real cause of the plot against Moses was the personal jealousy that flashed up when she saw herself officially supplanted by another. As the sister of Moses she had ranked as first among the women of the nation, and she wished to retain her position. Her grievance was not that Moses had married a foreigner, but that he had married at all.

Jealousy is ever lonely. It seeks companionship and sympathy, and both of these Miriam found in Aaron. The vine is only strong as it clings to the oak, but in this instance it outgrew itself. Most men are weak in some respects, and Miriam knew Aaron better than she did Moses. He, too, appears to have been envious of his brother, but for a different reason. The two agreed, however, to attack the Ethiopian woman and thus indirectly annoy their brother.

Moses Remains Silent in the Face of Accusation

A more contemptible form of attack could not have been devised. But Moses appears to have made no reply. He was no coward, but personalities were beneath him. That his wife was a foreigner he did not deny. There was no crime in that, and he refused to accord the accusation the dignity of war. The real sword had not as yet been drawn. It seldom is at the beginning of trouble. The greatest victories are often won by quietly looking on. Moses looked on while the two conspirators revealed themselves. "Hath Jehovah indeed spoken only with Moses? hath he not spoken also with us?" That was the cord behind the arrow.

It is well to remember this incident. In the play of life few parts are more generally taken than those assumed by Miriam and Aaron. But still Moses remained silent. His spirituality was called into question and that is something that cannot be defended in words. There was no doubt a silent communion going on between God and himself. Contrary to his nature, he retained his self-control. One of the most fiery men ever known in this way became the most patient. Many a time we have seen the flames of wrath blaze out on his face, while his lips moved in conversation with One far away.

The Lord took up his defense. The trial was in open court. There was a face to face meeting before the tabernacle, but the accusers stood dumb. Slanderous lips are always silent in the presence of the accused. They speak to the back, but never to the face. God vindicated his servant, while Miriam stood by, leprous as snow. Falsity always reacts. Slander is a dangerous sword, all blade and no handle. This same miracle is being repeated every day. The effects of sin are a universal leprosy. Body and soul are alike touched by it; both alike are destroyed by it.

The sight awoke Aaron to his better self and aroused the man within him. There was no longer any question as to the prophetic relation of Moses. "My Lord, lay not, I pray thee, sin upon us." Like a man he confessed his part of the conspiracy and prayed God to forgive.

Moses Becomes, Even as Christ, an Advocate with the Father

Moses stood forth that day the forerunner of Christ. He was the one advocate with the Almighty. "Heal her, O God, I beseech thee." Miriam was healed, but for seven days she was shut out from Israel. God forgives, but the results of sin are not soon forgotten by one's fellows. Confidence demands time, and Miriam lingering about the camp is a type of millions. The people did not journey until she was restored. The type is suggestive. No church or individual should ever abandon the penitent. Miriam had retarded the progress of Israel, but she had not fatally destroyed it. The individual backslider can never do more than retard. The people refused to go on without her. Let that be recorded to their praise. But do not keep the penitent waiting too long. There are more temptations outside than in, and the salvation of a soul is of more consequence than discipline.

Sin, punishment, penitence and restoration. These are the footprints that mark the way from man to God.

The Lesson Verse by Verse

By Hermon D. Jenkins

Analysis—Even deeply religious families need to be on their guard against sin. Jealousy will creep in where watchfulness is relaxed. The most deadly attack is that which is made upon the authority and sincerity of a religious leader, whether in church or school.

Jealousy is bad enough anywhere, but it is as hideous as leprosy when in the family. There are very few families in which intellectual gifts or physical graces are evenly distributed. Doubtless God meant this should be so that we might mutually aid one another in love. But the natural man is not always unselfish enough to realize this. The sons of David were bitter rivals for his throne (I. Kings 1:5-21). Modern history is full of the wars which have arisen from the jealousy with which the various branches of the Bourbon, Napoleonic and Stuart dynasties have regarded one another. It is told of one of the greatest of violinists that he refused to give even his son lessons for fear he would rival his own fame.

But every day we are compelled to witness these inequalities of gifts in members of one family. One brother becomes president of a railway system, while the other maybe is switchman in the yards. Metropolitan pulpits bid against each other for the services of one brother, while the other is barely tolerated in a country parish. It takes a good deal of grace to endure these contrasts without being soured by them. It was a happier spirit that led a certain orator to say that he would "rather be the father of a great man than be that man."

Entrance of Foreign Element Into Family Stirs Up Discord

We find other Israelites rebelling against Moses, but not one making just such complaints as the members of his own family did. Doubtless Moses owed much to them, especially to Miriam, who had saved his life in a critical hour (Ex. 2:7), and good man that he was, Moses may easily have neglected some courtesies to her in his delight in the return of his wife.

Verse 1—Up to this time the three members of this great family of leaders appear to have worked in harmony. But the entrance of a new and wholly foreign element stirred passions hitherto dormant. Moses's wife had (Ex. 18:1-6) only recently rejoined him after a considerable time of separation, and doubtless the prophet bestowed some attentions upon her which he had previously paid to his sister. It is happier far if such conflicting claims are not brought together unnecessarily under the same roof.

Verse 2—Of all rivalries, rivalry in divine service is the most odious. "He has many good points," said an acquaintance to the writer, "but he has one weakness. He can never praise the pulpit gifts of any other minister." But probably the brother of whom this was said had never suspected himself of harboring so low a passion as jealousy. It is not a source of astonishment when a singer is restless as we laud the voice of a rival, or a famous belle when we speak of the beauty of a new acquaintance, but in the service of God such exhibitions shock us, pain us and raise some doubts as to the indwelling of grace.

The wrong done Moses was not simply a personal injury. His own family was destroying his influence with the people he was commissioned to deliver. They were belittling the man it was important they should exalt. A visiting minister may do the resident pastor an irreparable injury, and a Sunday school teacher may easily destroy the spiritual authority of a superintendent. There is no one living who does not need to be on his guard against this insidious and ignoble tendency.

To Destroy Regard for Moses Meant to Destroy His Influence

Verse 3—Jealousy is the offspring of pride; meekness indicates its absence. They are contrasted emotions. One is a vice and one a virtue. Meekness is the spirit of the New Testament (Matt. 5:5). There are two things which will rouse a man's temper if anything will. One is an unjustifiable attack on his wife, and the other is the questioning of his religious sincerity. Not even his own mother, to say nothing of his sister, has any right to make his wife the subject of invidious remarks. Many a man has lost his life through such conduct. Undoubtedly Moses's wife Zipporah (Ex. 2:21) lacked the culture of the courts. She had grown up in the mountain regions of the great desert peninsula, while Miriam had had, in earlier years at least, the entree of the Egyptian palace. Probably Zipporah was conscious of this lack, and such consciousness would increase her diffidence and give Miriam new cause for sneers.

As to his prophetic office, we must remember this was the one subject upon which the great apostle was sensitive to the day of his death. To destroy the regard in which he was held was to destroy souls. He who alienates a church from its pastor or a Sunday school class from its teacher commits a very grievous sin.

Jehovah Gives Public Expression to Confidence in Moses

Verses 5-8—It was necessary that some public expression of God's confidence in Moses be given after such an attack had been made upon him from such a source. A long, toilsome, hazardous journey lay before Israel, and the authority of Moses would be tested to its utmost before his task was completed. Jehovah stamped his commission this day anew by public rebuke of his detractors and by a stroke which left Miriam an outcast from the camp (v. 14) as one whom God had publicly put to shame. We remember that during the war of the revolution it became imperative to disgrace a "cabal" of officers who had attacked Washington, otherwise his authority and our cause had been lost.

Verse 15—But in answer to the prayer of Moses the penalty was made as light as was consistent with dignity. Miriam, technically a leper for seven days, came back a chastened soul. Her sin was forgiven because her brother, whom she had injured, prayed for her restoration. Critical as was the hour, by grace it was turned to a victory instead of a defeat.

BY EDWARD ARTHUR WICHER

Week Beginning October 5, 1913

TOPIC—The wedding guest. Luke 14:7-10.

Jesus was invited to take his Sabbath meal in the house of a Pharisee. Whenever he entered a Pharisee's house something happened. All the elements of some startling chemical action were present. For the ways of Jesus were not the Pharisees' ways; neither were his thoughts their thoughts. He being what he was, and they being what they were, a conflict was inevitable. On this occasion, before the guests were seated at the table, Jesus scandalized them by healing a dropsical man on their holy day, and silenced them by proving from their own customs, which allowed the rescue of a son, or even an ox, on the Sabbath, that his principle of doing good on the Sabbath day was sanctioned by their law.

As the guests were taking their places at the table he added to his discourse and spake a parable in reference to their maneuvering to obtain the best places. It is a parable not in the sense of having the narrative form, nor in the significance of delivering a proverbial saying, but rather with the deeper idea that the advice contained in the discourse is to be understood figuratively.

The social climber is one of those pitiful types of humanity thrown up by every active period of society. His whole life is expended in an endeavor to get to a place higher up in the social scale; his supreme gratification is in looking down upon the people who have not yet attained his elevation; and his great god is recognition. To climb successfully in worldliness requires a calloused heart and a deadened soul. It would never do to prefer a brother in honor, because the world, too, might get into the way of preferring him. The climber is also occasionally under the necessity of committing small injuries against innocent people, because they unconsciously block his progress to an upper seat. Pride is always cruel and always dangerous.

It is especially dangerous when its claims to preeminence rest upon the basis of religious desert. For while the pride of the avowedly secular life is accustomed to vaunt itself openly, and assert itself brazenly, the pride of religion is forced to conceal itself under an assumption of generosity. Religious pride must at one moment both disclaim and assert its superiority. It must win recognition without appearing to aim at such a thing. It is driven to the exercise of small diplomacies and secret counterworkings.

Rabbinical literature contains several references to the Jews' custom of providing elaborate dinners on the Sabbath day. Every Sabbath dinner was a feast. It was a feast at which Jesus spoke his parable. But the greatest of all their feasts were those connected with their weddings. Here all due ceremonial was observed and proper precedence was given to rank. The pushing man, who is always trying to get as high up as possible, is certain to overreach himself sometime, and assume something that he cannot sustain. Doubtless there were occasions when the guests from among the Pharisees made pretensions which were disallowed, to their great chagrin (compare Prov. 25:6-7). Christ says to his disciples: "Ye shall not do so."

Humility was one of the most characteristic virtues of the ethics of Jesus. It was a virtue new with him. It was a virtue that was always incomprehensible to the heathen world, to whom it seemed to be mean-spiritedness. It was puzzling even to the philosophers, whose claims were not always modest. But it was the one, sole virtue that could restore the balance of the world and bring order into the moral universe. For pride is disorganizing in the last degree. It shifts the center of life from God to man—and to the individual man. Pride destroys brotherhood and breaks down society. Only humility permits men to kneel before the throne of God and learn what is his will. Humility restores harmony to the universe by restoring the true proportions of life.

There can be no love without humility; for if love be love, it is self-forgetfulness and self-surrender. Love can never contend for the chief seat in any situation of life. Love only asks to fulfill to the uttermost the duty that is laid upon it.

The world is filled with hands that want to be eyes, and feet that want to be hands. And the result is mortified eyes and hands and feet. The man who spends his days in the vain desire to do the work that has been given to another man to do, and in the consequent failure to do the work he is able to do, is causing unhappiness to himself and to all his associates. When the eyes and feet and hands rejoice in one another, and each performs his part in the total organism, then is the whole body free from pain. After all is said, the greatness of a man's influence in the world does not so much depend upon the conspicuousness of the place he occupies as it does upon the greatness of spirit wherewith he fulfills his duty in his place.

The way into the highest, according to Christ, is the way that first leads down into the lowest. The way to become a great comforter is first to have known a great sorrow. The way to become a great teacher is first to have passed through the painful discipline of personal temptation and questioning. The way to become a great rescuer of men is first to have felt the burden of the world's grief and sin. The way whereby Jesus became a great King was by suffering the humiliation of servitude and death.

Who are the great ones of the past who grip our consciences with power, who touch our hearts with the grace of an infinite tenderness, who inspire us with high and pure ideals of unselfish endurance for the benefit of others? Certainly not the men who tried to thrust themselves into the seats of the dominant. Nay, they are those who loved their brethren even as Christ also loved them; they are the men who, with large endowments of personal power, buried themselves unto every worldly emolument and now live enshrined in the holy place of the heart of a grateful humanity. The shortest way up is the way down. He that loseth his life shall find it.

COMMENTS IN BRIEF BY WILLIAM T. ELLIS

October 12, 1913

ON THE TABLETS OF MEMORY

TOPIC—Favorite verses. V. In the Epistles. I. Cor. 13:1-13.

There are some writers whose names are known to all well-read persons, but who are themselves seldom read. The literary masters are honored—and neglected. But a certain small collection of letters, intended by their writers for private circulation, have come to a place of greater power over the thinking of mankind than all the classics. These are the New Testament epistles, which have largely shaped the theology and the character of the Christian church. Thirteen, or possibly fourteen, of these are by that great scholar and philosopher and traveler and saint, the apostle Paul. Three are by the apostle John, who wrote also the fourth gospel and the book of the Revelation. Two are by Peter and one by James and one by Jude. There is uncertainty as to the authorship of the letter to the Hebrews. These twenty-one letters sweep the whole gamut of Christian living.

Three characteristics mark most of the epistles. They are tinged with the personality of the writers, as all good letters should be. Back of every one is a man whose individuality was known to all readers of the letters. Then they deal with present duties and conditions. Primarily, they were meant for particular groups of Christians, and so they abound in names, just as a letter writer today sends greetings to the folks. Most striking of all, however, is the manner in which these letters center about the person and purpose of Jesus Christ.

Abounding in familiar quotations, the New Testament epistles are known, in part, to every educated person. To choose favorite passages is easy; to limit the number is difficult. Here are a few which are better worth reading than comments upon them, even as the meal is better than a bill of fare.

For the wages of sin is death; but the free gift of God is eternal life in Christ Jesus our Lord.—Rom. 6:23.

For the mind of the flesh is death; but the mind of the Spirit is life and peace. . . . So then, brethren, we are debtors, not to the flesh, to live after the flesh; for if ye live after the flesh, ye must die; but if by the Spirit ye put to death the deeds of the body, ye shall live.—Rom. 8:6-13.

And we know that to them that love God all things work together for good, even to them that are called according to his purpose.—Rom. 8:28.

But if thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him to drink; for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire upon his head.—Rom. 12:20.

For I am persuaded, that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor things present, nor things to come, nor powers, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord.—Rom. 8:38.

Now we that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak, and not to please ourselves.—Rom. 15:1.

Let us not therefore judge one another any more; but judge ye this rather, that no man put a stumblingblock in his brother's way, or an occasion of falling.—Rom. 14:13.

And he hath said unto me, My grace is sufficient for thee: for my power is made perfect in weakness. Most gladly therefore will I rather glory in my weaknesses, that the power of Christ may rest upon me.—II. Cor. 12:9.

Let all bitterness, and wrath, and anger, and clamor, and railing, be put away from you, with all malice: and be ye kind one to another, tenderhearted, forgiving each other, even as God also in Christ forgave you.—Eph. 4:31-32.

For to me to live is Christ, and to die is gain.—Phil. 1:21.

Finally, brethren, whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honorable, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report; if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on these things.—Phil. 4:8.

If then ye were raised together with Christ, seek the things that are above, where Christ is, seated on the right hand of God. Set your mind on the things that are above, not on the things that are upon the earth.—Col. 3:1-2.

All chastening seemeth for the present to be not joyous but grievous; yet afterward it yieldeth peaceable fruit unto them that have been exercised thereby, even the fruit of righteousness.—Heb. 12:11.

Pure religion and undefiled before our God and Father is this, to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep oneself unspotted from the world.—James 1:27.

Blessed is the man that endureth temptation; for when he hath been approved, he shall receive the crown of life, which the Lord promised to them that love him.—James 1:12.

There is no fear in love: but perfect love casteth out fear, because fear hath punishment; and he that feareth is not made perfect in love.—I. John 4:18.

MISSIONARY WORK

Experiment Triumphantly Worked Out

There is the revelation of a very interesting secret in a little booklet just put forth by the Board of Foreign Missions at New York, entitled "The Testing of a Mission." The facts stated have, of course, been spread upon the records of the Foreign Board, where anybody interested could read them, but have been recognized through the church only by a very few of the best informed missionary experts. The secret thus made known is the fact that in 1903 the board deliberately decided upon a ten years' experiment in West Africa to find out by the demonstration of experience whether West Africa furnished for mission effort a field worth working on aggressive high pressure plans. The board frankly avowed its intention to stake everything there from 1903 to 1913, and even bound itself to withdraw and seek another field if the results were not commensurate with the effort.

The principles laid down by the board for this experiment were four. First, missionaries must as far as possible avoid becoming localized in the charge of specific native churches. They must instead organize the Christians and inquirers into groups and put them under charge of native helpers, so that each individual missionary might extend his supervision over a considerable number of groups. Second, all missionaries must itinerate, and must make it their aim every year to press out into new territory and encourage their native aids to join in this extension work also. Third, especial attention must be given to developing efficient boarding and day schools, including schools for industrial work. Fourth, the people must be encouraged from the first to pay the largest possible proportion of the expense of the work done among them.

At the end of the ten year period assigned, the board finds itself in no danger of being required to confess failure. The success is triumphant, and the expiration of the experimental period calls only for further progress upon the same lines. The native force assisting in the spread of the mission has in this decade increased from fifty-five to 257, the communicants from 1,852 to 4,044. This latter number would have been much larger if, in the intervening time, a more rigid standard for admitting converts to the communion had not been established. Thus there are now beyond the communicants 15,257 enrolled catechumens, whereas in 1904 the number was so small that no record was kept of them. Meantime, the pupils under missionary instruction have gained at an even more remarkable ratio, increasing from 963 to 9,564.

But most triumphant of all, perhaps, has been the vindication of the policy of placing the burden of expense on the natives themselves. The board pays the salaries of the missionaries, but all other expenses of the native churches are paid by the African membership, so that by this standard there may be said to be not a single dependent church in the whole Presbytery of Corisco, which includes the West African mission.

The book has many details of this great success, and though so unpretentious is really a document of conspicuous importance in the history of missionary administration.

New Buildings Atop Mount Lebanon

Dr. Mary Eddy of Syria, writing from Shabaneeyah, on the heights of Lebanon, reports that building is going on slowly but steadily for the necessary structures of her tuberculosis sanitarium among the Lebanon cedars. The open air dining room, inclosed in wire screens, is finished, as also two new bathhouses for men and women and a recreation pavilion for men. The foundations are in for the reception hospital and the separate shelter pavilions for the men and women patients. The new water system is also in operation and the fresh supply of running water in every building is considered the greatest boon of all.

Meanwhile, the very limited temporary building which Miss Eddy placed on the mountain when she first began sanitarium work is crowded with a total of forty-five patients and attendants. The expense of maintaining the hospital has been this year larger than calculated, because the war in European Turkey has put up the price of all foods and especially of flour. But Dr. Eddy is raising ten kinds of vegetables in the sanitarium garden and is fighting in every possible way to keep down the cost of living and make her funds serve as many sufferers as she can possibly reach.

The colony at Shabaneeyah has this summer had many keen reminders of the circumstances under which the first American missionaries reached this spot just fifty years ago. It was in 1863 that the Druses of Mount Lebanon broke out in a fearful massacre of the Christians of that region, and it was not until winter was well advanced that the slaughter was stopped by the arrival of French soldiers who had landed at the coast and toilsomely climbed the mountain sides to restore order. Immediately after the soldiers came the missionaries from Beirut, who went among the suffering Christians dispensing relief and help on every hand. The leader of this work was the late Dr. Henry Jessup, then at the beginning of his long and wonderful service as a friend and redeemer for the many races of Syrian people.

Veteran Missionary Passes Away

The death of Dr. Daniel C. Greene costs the American Board of Foreign Missions the leadership of the senior member of its mission force in Japan. Dr. Greene, who was a native of Boston, graduated from Dartmouth in 1864, and saw a year of service as federal trooper in the Civil war before he departed to Japan as a missionary. He had done work in Kobe, Yokohama and Tokyo. His mastery of the Japanese language made him exceedingly useful to all Christian workers in Japan as a translator of the Scriptures and other Christian literature.

Dr. Greene also became known as a frank writer in Japanese journals on questions of progress, and through this channel exercised a large influence on the thinking Japanese statesmen. Long before international criticism developed over the procedure of Japanese courts in Korea, Dr. Greene had fearlessly told Japan in its own journals that civilization would never respect its judicial processes until court rules were amended so as to be fairer to defendants at bar. When the Seoul conspiracy trial in its first stages awakened worldwide complaint Dr. Greene did not hesitate to point out to the Japanese public the justification of his warning. In spite of this exceptional candor, however, he was made only a few months ago the recipient of Japan's highest official compliment for civilians—the decoration of the third class in the Order of the Rising Sun. In no case has Japan ever before evinced such appreciation for the straightforwardness of a friendly critic.

President's Namesake at Point Barrow

Point Barrow, Alaska, is widely known as the northernmost point of the North American continent, and is probably the northernmost mission station in all the world. But it is not far enough away to be beyond the circle of American patriotism, as is evidenced by a recent report from the missionary, Rev. D. W. Cram, who says that the first Eskimo baby baptized in the Point Barrow church after the 4th of last March was promptly named Woodrow in honor of President Wilson. The child was born March 9 and was baptized on Easter morning, March 23, when his parents brought him a mile to church through a temperature of thirty degrees below zero. Mr. Cram thinks that his small parishioner may perhaps be the senior namesake of President Wilson, if only babies born within the term of the administration are taken into account.

More Native Filipino Workers

We have just returned from the ordination service of Rev. Juan Abakan at Lukban, Tayabas, our former station, writes Rev. Charles N. Magill, moderator of Manila Presbytery. Mr. Abakan is a bright, competent, consecreated young Christian. He has a diploma from the Ellinwood Bible School and has been a licentiate for two years. Rev. G. W. Wright, his former instructor in the seminary, and four other pastors took part in the exercises, which were inspiring, impressive and well attended. Mr. Abakan is the youngest pastor in the Philippines. He is the fourth Filipino pastor we have ordained in Manila Presbytery within the last six months. The first one, Rev. Simon Igloria, was called to Hawaii to work among the many Filipino immigrants there. The second, Rev. Alejandro Gubi, has a large circuit in Batangas province which was under the direction of Rev. Mr. Campbell until the latter was obliged to return to America, much to the regret of the mission. The third one ordained is Rev. Guillermo Abella, pastor of the San Pablo-Tison group of churches. San Pablo, which was so hard to open to the gospel some years ago, now has a large, enthusiastic and especially busy church and has recently built a chapel, beautifully decorated and lighted with electric lights. The ordination and the dedication of the chapel in July were the most truly impressive services that we have attended in the Philippines.

When we came to the Philippines eight years ago our church here had only two ordained Filipino pastors and now it has fifteen who are preaching the word with great power in different parts of the islands. The Filipinos are naturally good talkers, and they are able after training in the seminary and the school of experience to preach the gospel with wonderful power.

Biggest Meeting of Koreans in America

Rev. J. H. Laughlin, head of the Foreign Board's mission work for Orientals in California, went out from San Francisco with the Korean evangelist, Mr. Min, and held a series of encouraging moonlight meetings among the Koreans who were picking fruit in the San Joaquin valley near Fresno. The average attendance at these meetings was seventy, but one night there were fully 150 present, which greatly delighted the Koreans, even apart from any religious consideration, for they appreciated the fellowship with men of their own nationality, and told Mr. Laughlin that this was undoubtedly the largest gathering of Koreans that had ever come together in any part of the United States for any purpose.

Missionary Brevities

—A church has been organized at Taptiang, Siam, and a temporary building of bamboo and nipa erected. A structure of brick is planned for the future, but the cost is too great just at present for the congregation to support. The hospital chapel which has been in use for the church services is now too small to accommodate the worshipers.

—A number of missionaries have unusual evangelistic chances in teaching English to educated Chinese of standing, whose ambition to learn a foreign language is of course a product of the modern progressive movement in China. For example, Rev. Otto Braskamp at Tengchow has been teacher for three prominent Chinese professors of the city, and their text book has been the Bible. Though none of the men has yet professed conversion, all have begun attending church service regularly since Mr. Braskamp interested them in this way.

Board Notes and Announcements

—The Friday morning meeting of the Board of the Northwest, Chicago, was led by Mrs. Powell, recording secretary, whose theme, from "The Christian's Secret of a Happy Life" led the new president, Mrs. A. L. Berry, to speak of the biography of the author of that book, Hannah Whitehall Smith, whose words "had more to do with the molding of my own life," she said, "than those of any other writer." Letters from Miss Eick of Elat and Miss Christie of Metet were read by the Africa secretary, Mrs. Egan. Mrs. Cole, secretary for Siam and Laos, spoke of the great ingathering of believers there, 500 having been added to the church in Chieng Mai station alone. Mrs. Shumway read a letter from Mrs. D. A. Murray of Japan, missionary of Iowa young people's societies, and told of the sailing of Miss Lila Garvin, missionary of Whitewater Presbyterial Society.

The Open Hearth

The Sam Daly Reformatory

As secretary of home missions of the Presbyterian Church in the United States, allow me to corroborate the account which recently appeared in The Continent as to Sam Daly's great work in undertaking single handed a reformatory for colored youth. In my public addresses I have not hesitated to state that in my opinion Sam Daly ranked with Booker Washington as a benefactor of his race, albeit unknown to fame. In some respects he deserves even more credit, for he carried on his noble work practically without human aid. During his last illness I visited him in the hospital regularly and had every assistance given him which could be obtained for love or money, but all in vain. He died broken hearted over his failure to get his work before the General Assembly.

The question has been asked in many quarters: Shall this magnificent work, undertaken and operated by a negro unaided, be allowed to end with his death? "God buries his workers but carries on his work." Twenty years ago Samuel Lapsley, a white man and missionary to Kongo, Africa, died just after starting our mission for negroes in the dark continent. It was freely predicted that this would eventuate in its collapse. On the contrary, God in his wise providence used Lapsley's death to arouse the church, and the outcome is our most successful foreign mission work.

May not God use the death of Daly to arouse Christians everywhere in behalf of the negroes of our own country?

The widow of Sam Daly has announced her willingness to continue his work if she can get any encouragement and help. The home mission committee has agreed to furnish a preacher and teacher for these young colored men in the effort to rescue them from the ranks of the criminal class. There remains, however, a mortgage of $1,800 on the property, which constitutes the chief obstacle to its success. If philanthropists and friends of the colored people, North and South, would but unite in freeing this institution from its indebtedness, this splendid work would go on as a memorial to the noble colored man who inaugurated it. If God touches the heart of any generous friends and moves them to contribute to this purpose, I will gladly receive such aid and assist in freeing the institution from the burden of debt. S. L. MORRIS.

Negro Youth in the South

We are constantly brought face to face with the fact that colored people in certain sections are more criminal than the whites. To this we agree to a certain extent.

We hear a great deal of "new methods" in the country school—and many are being put into practice, but when sifted to the core this applies to the white and not to the black boy. In this section we see on almost every side new schoolhouses being erected for white youth and longer terms provided, but the term for the negro remains almost the same. We see no new schoolhouses being erected for the negro youth. The house that once stood on the hillside for the white boy has long since given place to a more commodious structure, while the same "shack" which was built for the negro ten years ago shows no signs of being displaced for a better one. Then should we wonder that the negro youth is more criminal than the white youth in the same section? The average school term for the negro youth is five months, while that of the white youth is not less than seven and most of the white schools go longer. The colored people for the most part no longer look to the public school system for primary training of their children, but to the schools run by the church.

Another factor is the meager pay of the negro teacher. He can make more doing anything else. It has commonly become known that the county must depend upon the poorest teaching material on account of the salary, for men and women who have prepared themselves will not hunt for the country schools. This year we are at a loss what to do for men and women to teach, because of the facts above named. In this section we have a great multitude of negro boys and girls who are growing up with but three and four months' schooling out of a year, and this without definite system.

When a white teacher is to take charge of a school his record is searched from boyhood in order to secure a man whose intellectual qualifications are high and whose morals are pure and good, but this is not insisted on when a teacher is to be secured to teach the negro boy and girl. Is it a puzzling problem to the unbiased mind that the negro boy and girl will be weighed in the balances and be found wanting?

It has been said recently that every schoolhouse erected for the negro in this section and carried on in a systematic way, where the Bible is one of the chief books, has decreased the police force, helped to empty the jails and given the judges less trouble.

Paper of The Menace's Type Needed

The Continent thinks The Menace is not helping Protestants any, but as the circulation of the latter is very large it keeps the public tolerably well informed concerning matters of which people in general would remain entirely ignorant, and which Catholics themselves do not wish to have made public.

Generally, it is only by devious and roundabout ways that the reading public learns the actual sentiments Romanists cherish toward our government and flag; as when the patriotic Father Phelan in a burst of religious fervor expressed the inmost feelings of his constituency in his well known "To —— with the government! To —— with the flag!"

Occasionally, in some religious publication, we learn of the continuous violation of federal law by Catholic teachers, and of the forcing of papist chaplains into every possible position in our army and navy, and even secular prints in their eagerness to glorify American-Romanist princes(?) showed up the disgusting sycophancy of a former head of this government.

On the whole, it seems to me that while the methods and manner of The Menace lack something of polish, some paper of that kind is necessary in a nation which, with the exception of distinctly denominational journals, the whole press shivers at the thought of offending either rum or Romanism. W. J. ADAMS.

The Inspirational in Men's Work

The church must not be misled by the cry for the practical. "What can men do?" is not half as important as "What men will do." Before any action is wrought, a sufficient impulse must move. It is therefore unwise to prepare any program that ignores the inspirational. Men are wrestling daily with the practical and the technical. Their fund of inspiration, even in their business, is often at low ebb.

A church program that is all intellectual or practical will be a dead weight. Likewise a presbyterial docket that is all business. If our school children are halted in their studies for rest exercises, for relaxation, why not stop our eccelesiastical schooling long enough to breathe deeply of the atmosphere of devotion? After all, the world moves more through the emotions than through anything else. Give the men every inspirational uplift you can; and that does not mean merely the uplift of prayer, but that of personality and vision and possibility as well.

Who has not felt the thrill of great gatherings of young people, of church workers, of men? A thousand men recently paraded the streets of Wilmington, each with a white umbrella with these words on it: "Do it for Wilmington." Who could but be impressed with a scene like that? Vision is necessary, and vision comes through the truth being known and apprehended. The esprit de corps of organization must ever be a factor in stirring men to action. Objective is also necessary—not only the thing worth while, but the thing worth doing now. The reachable is the thing for the practical man. Spirituality? Yes, the touch upon the Infinite is the moving force in the world. Who can resist it? Can all these be combined in one? Why not? Will not a body of men, Spirit-led, in earnest discussion of the strenuous problems before the church today, produce these very elements of inspirational uplift?

A conference for men only and for all men in each presbytery seems to be the need of the situation as it presents itself today. Many presbyteries are planning their work accordingly. What if no direct practical results do follow? The inspirational factor has been there.

To have the "go" for which the world cries today men must first have the life. And to have the life men must have every inspirational help they can get. Let pastors and presbyteries be alert to this fact in all their programs for the winter's work. F. B. E.

"The Servant in the House"

One who signs himself "Just a Mere American Man" takes up the housemaid question in a recent issue. Why housemaids are hard to secure is to be read, in part, between the lines of his letter.

It has been my good fortune to see life from several angles, including the position of those who work for their living. When I see a man very positive in the opinion that some girls are not worth $6 a week, and hear him deploring the "lack of moderate-priced help," I know that in most cases he is an employer who will haggle for the lowest possible terms.

I am aware that many who account themselves worthy people are accustomed to speak with contempt when anything is put upon the "broad ground of humanity and social service." But there are some of us who have a little respect for Sunday. Why should the working girl's desire for a Sabbath rest be written down as "false pride and a fatal desire for independence"? Is it a crime to wish for freedom from labor on Sundays? Is it arrogance, after a day of hard work, to desire a few moments of time for one's self? I have seen housemaids forced to slave night and day, with never a Sunday their own.

Meantime, those who have learned to live together in Christian fellowship, taking thought for the comfort and happiness of their servants, will not be very hard put for friendly assistance in times of real need. An employer who has any part or lot with Jesus in the kingdom of God will himself be one of the humblest of servants. In such a home the housemaid will have her Sabbath and her hours of rest. She will be honored and respected as one who helps to maintain the family comfort and welfare. In such homes it is not difficult to retain servants. DANIEL S. MCCORKLE.

American Air Destroys Servility

"Just a Mere American Man" believes, apparently sincerely, that he can solve the great problems of the millions of women workers in our country by the simple device of turning them all into household servants. He thinks it is deplorable that with plenty of girls working at other pursuits for $6 or less per week, it is hard to secure adequate domestic help. The writer assures us that it is a positive reflection on a woman that she should prefer the "independence" of a position where she may work with others of her kind in a position with regular hours, with Sundays and holidays at her own disposal, and where her status is not that of servant, rather than to be a lonely pariah in somebody's kitchen where she is subject to the arbitrary whims of her mistress and all the thousand humiliations that the household servant has to put up with.

Under the best circumstances household service is drudgery with the stigma of being somebody's servant attached. That is something that perhaps cannot be helped, but why should a woman be blamed if she prefers some other kind of work, even though the pay is not so good? The present writer believes that he is fair as anybody can be in his circumstances—he confesses to being a Presbyterian minister in good standing—but when he employs a girl he feels that he must make it plain to her that she shall not eat with the family, but alone in the kitchen. He also confesses that he admires the spunk of any self-respecting girl who refuses to enter his employment on those humiliating terms. "American Man" should migrate to England or to some other foreign land where they manage to keep servants as servants. The free air of these benighted United States, with its implications of democracy at every turn, does knock the servility out of our girls, even in a few months, and it looks as though "American Man" would have to make the most of it. JAMES J. COOK.

Ways of Working

The Continent recently had occasion to refer to the enterprise of the Protestant churches of Williamsport, Pa., which joined together to buy a page of space in the Saturday evening edition of the Williamsport Sun to advertise their services. Impressions of the value of publicity for churches have advanced so in Williamsport that First church is now buying a page of the Sun on Saturday all by itself. The reader surmises that this is probably the first time in this country when a single congregation has used a whole page of daily newspaper space to appeal to the public. "Copy" for the advertisement has been prepared by some one who believes in what advertising men call "general publicity." The advertisements make no specific offer of any one service or advantage, but appeal to the general interest of the public in the whole institution. The page contains pictures of the interior of the church, a portrait of the pastor, Rev. William Charles Hogg, a town map showing the location of the "dear old First," a complete roster of the officers of the congregation and all its clubs, and a general invitation to citizens and visitors to walk into the church building at any time. It is promised that a secretary will be in continual attendance at the church office, and telephone privileges are offered free to all callers.

Elders Educate Church Members

Division of the eldership into four committees of three each to have oversight of the education of the congregation in regard to finances resulted in a 200 per cent increase in benevolences in one Middle Western town in one year. The money to be raised by the church was grouped under four heads: Local church, national work, foreign work, ministerial relief. All of the boards of the church except the Foreign Board and the Board of Ministerial Relief and Sustentation were covered by the second committee.

Each group of elders did what it could by announcements, talks, use of blackboards, charts and papers to tell the congregation about the use of money in connection with the special part of the work to which it had been assigned. This special attention incited the people to give more liberally.

Advertises for Lost Soul

Rev. J. W. Hart, pastor of First church, Junction City, Kan., recently used a want ad in the local paper under the lost and found column as follows:

"LOST—Somewhere and at some time, a soul. At the Presbyterian open air service in front of the church tomorrow evening at 8 you can learn where and how to find it."

The want ad brought results, for the meeting was well attended by people of all denominations.

Suggestive Sermon Subjects

The pastor of Paoli (Pa.) church, John Graham, D. D., recently delivered brief Sabbath evening addresses upon the general title "Great Threes"—short sermons on doctrine.

1. The Three Greatest Beings. (a) God, creator. (b) Man, God's great masterpiece. (c) Satan, the great foe of God and man.

2. The Three Greatest Facts About God. (a) Almightiness. (b) Unchangeableness. (c) Eternity.

3. The Three Greatest Facts About Satan. (a) He is a murderer in mission. (b) He is a liar in method. (c) He is implacable in character.

4. The Three Greatest Facts About Man. (a) Immortal. (b) Salvable. (c) Usable.

5. Man's Three Great Parts. (a) Mind to grasp God. (b) Soul to worship God. (c) Body to serve God.

6. Man's Three Great Experiences. (a) Life. (b) Death. (c) Judgment.

7. Man's Threefold Condition of Character. (a) Sinful. (b) Forgiven. (c) Saved.

8. Man's Three Great Privileges. (a) Praise of God. (b) Prayer to God. (c) Proclamation of God.

9. Man's Three Great Lights. (a) The Holy Spirit. (b) The word of God. (c) Conscience.

10. Man's Three Great Powers. (a) Personality. (b) Ability. (c) Character.

11. Man's Three Great Attainments. (a) "Well done." (b) "Rest." (c) "Be satisfied."

How You Can Make a Store

made from the cover of the box. Cut a door and two show windows in the box cover. Imitate panes of glass by pasting thin strips of tissue paper across the windows. Arrange a little display of some of your prettiest goods on a piece of cardboard pasted like a shelf to the inside of the window so that the passers-by may see them when the store is closed. The cover of a pound candy box is a good shelf. Fasten the cover to the box at one side by hinges or strips of leather.

Your storekeeper is now ready for business and his clerks stand waiting to serve the customers. It will keep you busy helping him, for the small girl doll will want candy, and the mother dolls the pretty laces and ribbons and tempting vegetables. Weighing out sugar and measuring cloth will keep you busy for many a day. Now and then restock the shelves and once in a while put an extra clerk behind the counter and make some new customers.

Holds Church in Dance Hall

Dr. Warren H. Wilson of the country church department of the Home Board recently concluded a most helpful series of lectures and institutes in Box Butte Presbytery, almost a rural field. At one place, Pleasant Valley, the service in connection with Dr. Wilson's visit was peculiarly interesting. The church organization is only a few months old and from the beginning has faced the double problem of how to obtain a house of worship and what should be done about a newly built dance hall which had been erected just prior to the series of meetings which eventuated in the organization of the church. A few days before Dr. Wilson's arrival those who were interested in the dance hall gave or sold their stock to the church, and the first religious service held in the new dance hall-church was the lecture given by Dr. Wilson. China Campaign for Indiana

The attention which is being devoted to the finances of churches this fall through the united missionary campaign and the effort to obtain an every-member canvass of all churches in the country has not entirely obscured the special campaign for China. Dr. C. E. Bradt of the Foreign Board, in charge of the central district, will cooperate with the churches of Indiana in an effort to raise the apportionment of that state during November. During December Dr. Bradt will join forces with J. M. Patterson of the southern district in a campaign in Oklahoma which is to center in Oklahoma City.

Expect Many at Anti-Saloon League Meeting

Officers of the Anti-Saloon League expect 20,000 delegates at the jubilee convention of the organization at Columbus, Ohio, Nov. 10-13. Among those who have agreed to address the convention are: Joshua Levering, former prohibition presidential candidate; Senators Gronna of North Dakota, Kenyon of Iowa and Sheppard of Texas; ex-Governor J. Frank Hanly of Indiana, Governor George H. Hodges and ex-Governor E. W. Hoch of Kansas, Governor Ben W. Hooper of Tennessee, Rev. Daniel A. Poling of Ohio and John B. Lennon of Illinois.

Synods to Hear of Brotherhood Work

The special opportunities for work by the men of the churches will be presented by representatives of the National Council of the Brotherhood at various synodical meetings this fall. Associate Secretaries J. T. Henderson and Francis M. Fox and Professor John M. Coulter and Dr. William C. Covert, members of the Assembly's committee on brotherhood, will be among the speakers at different meetings.

Where the Shoe Pinches

It is not hardship encountered in active service that causes distress. Men and women in all walks of life are willing to endure hardships when they themselves are strong and resourceful. It is when the days of efficient service are over and when disability and old age come with their inevitable burdens, and when the resources of life have been largely depleted, that privation and suffering become hard to bear.

The gospel minister ought to be willing to endure hardness as a good soldier of Jesus Christ. He usually is willing and eager to spend and be spent. The shoe pinches when he faces with fear an old age, unprovided for, with its weight of care. "The Sandals of the Gospel of Peace" ought not to pinch the feet of the gospel minister.

You can help to relieve the distress by removing its cause.

IN THE FIELD OF CHRISTIAN EFFORT

SEMINARY STUDENTS BUSY IN MONTANA

Vacations Result in Several New Church Organizations in Pioneer Fields—Work Many Miles from Railway Line.

The wisdom of employing seminary students to work during the vacation period in western mission stations and vacant churches was amply proved the past summer in Great Falls Presbytery, where six theological students were engaged from May 1 until Sept. 1. They worked under the advice of the presbyterial home mission committee, the pastor-evangelist and the field secretary.

E. L. Brown of McCormick Seminary was located at Joplin, both this summer and last, and in connection with Joplin served a wide territory. The people in the outlying districts assembled in school buildings and in their homes for worship and religious instruction. Following Mr. Brown's first summer on this field, and largely as a result of his efforts, a church organization was consummated. During the vacation recently closed a church edifice was erected which will be ready for dedication soon.

J. E. Jones of McCormick Seminary has also worked in Montana two summers. He was located at Glengary and a church was organized soon after his arrival last year. A church building which has been under way is rapidly nearing completion.

Thomas H. Gilmore of Auburn Seminary has been in charge of the field composed of Carter and Pleasant Valley. He accomplished the preliminary work leading to a church organization in Pleasant Valley Sept. 7.

M. M. Van Patten of McCormick Seminary served Whitlash and vicinity. This field is forty-five miles from the nearest railway station. The citizens of Whitlash have petitioned for a church organization.

C. E. Greenway of McCormick Seminary was sent to Pine Grove, fifty miles from the nearest railway station.

Charles W. McClelland of McCormick Seminary devoted his vacation time to Highwood and vicinity. He began his work with few to pledge either moral or financial support, but he gained the people's confidence. A petition for organization was circulated and freely signed.

Where Is Mr. Ebeling?—The present address of Rev. Alfred W. Ebeling, a member of Boise Presbytery, is desired by the stated clerk, Rev. Bruce J. Giffen, Parma, Idaho.

CHURCHES IMPROVE FACILITIES

Repair Burned Structure—Repairs and improvements to cost $5,000 have been made on Park River, N. D., church, which was damaged by fire last February.

Church Will Cost $16,000—The new church at Central City, Neb., will cost $16,000. The building will be of pressed brick and it is expected that it will be completed within six months.

Use New Knoxville Church—The Sunday school rooms of the new Fourth church, Knoxville, Tenn., were occupied for the first time Sept. 14. Special exercises were held with an address by the pastor, Dr. J. P. Calhoun.

Prepare for New Pastor—Improvements costing $600 have been made to the parsonage at Lodi, Wis., in preparation of the coming of the new pastor, Rev. Frank Zimmerman. The women of the church were responsible for the addition to the conveniences of the manse.

Various Improvements—A new pipe organ was installed in the church at Woodhull, Ill., during the summer—Improvements costing about $1,000 were made during the summer at North church, Binghamton, N. Y. Services were held in the chapel during the time of redecoration.

To Unite Spokane Welshmen—A church to seat 300 will soon be built at Spokane, Wash., by a congregation which is now served by Rev. Joshua Daniels of the Welsh church, Seattle. Articles of incorporation have been filed, so as to include Welshmen of all denominations in this church.

Add Dining Room and Pipe Organ—Improvements to cost nearly $3,000 have been commenced by DePere, Wis., church. The basement is to be enlarged and furnished as a dining room and kitchen. An addition will be built back of the pulpit to accommodate a new pipe organ.

May Build Manse—Members of First church, Bloomington, Ill., are considering the question of erecting a manse. A committee has been appointed to examine into the situation. It is suggested by some members that a stone building be erected to follow the general lines of the church structure.

Will Improve Milwaukee Church—Plans for improvements to cost $15,000 have been adopted by Westminster church, Milwaukee, Wis. Work will be started as soon as half the amount is subscribed. It was planned at one time to erect a new church, but this was found impracticable. The improvements will add 2,400 square feet of space to the present church in addition to a library, gymnasium and fifteen Sunday school rooms.

Put Useless Space to Work—About $20,000 has been spent in the last two months on Jefferson Park church, Chicago. An auditorium several times too large for the congregation has been divided into rooms for the Sunday school and various other organizations. A gymnasium was also installed.

WHAT THE Y. M. C. A. IS DOING

Helps Stricken Associations—John D. Rockefeller, Jr., has offered $42,000 to the associations of Dayton, Hamilton and Marietta, Ohio, to repair the buildings damaged in those cities by the spring flood, on condition that $43,000 be raised to meet the current expense emergency. The committee already has raised a large proportion of its funds.

New Iowa Building—The property of the Baptist church has been purchased by the Marshalltown, Iowa, association, where it is hoped to erect a $90,000 building. It was in this church that Fred B. Smith made his decision to enter religious work if opportunity presented itself.—The association at Alton, Ill., during the past summer enlisted 150 boys in a "swat the fly" campaign.—Pillow fights, which have long been popular with association members of this country, are said to have taken the fancy of Filipinos to a large extent.

Germany Has Most Associations—According to statistics presented at Edinburgh at the conference the past summer of 600 Y. M. C. A. workers of thirty-two nations it was shown that there are in Germany 2,419 associations, and in the United States and Canada 2,192. Germany thus leads all the nations of the word in the number of its associations. It has, however, a total membership of only 201,000, as against 586,000 in this country. The buildings of Germany number 172, with a value of $3,000,000; while in the United States and Canada there are 756 buildings, with a value of $60,500,000. Great Britain and Ireland have 1,027 associations and 212 buildings, which are valued at $6,730,000. The report shows a total of 8,584 associations in America, Africa, Asia, Australia and Europe, against 8,522 the year before. The total membership has increased nearly 200,000.

WHAT MEN ARE DOING

Laymen Preach the Gospel—A Sunday meeting was recently held at Milo, Iowa, church by a gospel team of laymen from Indianola.

Men Meet in the Park—The president of Waterloo, Iowa, brotherhood, W. W. McFarlane, who is also president of the local park board, made arrangements for a recent meeting of the men at Cedar River Park.

Men to Manage Lecture Course—The Ralph Connor brotherhood of Grace church, Minneapolis, will direct a series of lyceum entertainments this winter to afford amusement for young people of the neighborhood.

Will Entertain Their Fathers—As a result of the men's work started in First church, Joliet, Ill., the boys of the congregation have become interested largely in church activities and are planning to give a dinner to their "Dads" early this fall.

Tell Where Church Is—The men's league of Wilmette church, near Chicago, obtained permission of the interurban railway company and tacked upon poles at the stations near that suburb invitations to attend the Presbyterian church, giving the location carefully.

SOME THINGS YOUNG WOMEN ARE DOING

Furnish Nurses by the Day—The Williamsport, Pa., Y. W. C. A., has arranged to supply trained nurses for emergency and short term work. It is thus possible to procure a nurse for a single visit rather than on the customary weekly basis.

Novel Posters Attract—Posters illustrating the courses of the Y. W. C. A. in its various departments were made for a poster contest under the auspices of the Riverside, Cal., association. The posters were exhibited in a store window and attracted considerable attention.

Will Conduct a Business Course—Such topics as business assets of a self-supporting woman, simple business transactions, lure and danger of the installment plan and how to invest $100 to $500, are subjects which will be discussed in a course for the young women of Topeka, Kan., Y. W. C. A.

HUNDRED-YEAR RECORDS LOST

One of the most beautiful and elaborate of souvenir booklets which it has been The Continent's privilege to see has been put forth to commemorate the centennial of First church, Troy, Ohio. It was the misfortune of this congregation to lose most of its records of its hundred years of history at the very eve of its centennial date, for when Troy, in common with all other towns of the Miami valley, went under the waters of the flooded river last March, these church documents were soaked by waters which entered the vaults of the First National bank. When house-cleaning followed the flood, they were thrown out and destroyed, along with a mass of other soggy paper, by persons who didn't suspect their value. Nevertheless, Miss Mary J. Orbison, granddaughter of one of the founders of the church, was able to gather together enough facts to make a most readable story of one hundred years of Christian service and progress. The souvenir contains likewise a centennial poem of exceptional merit from Frances Moore Geiger.

NO OFFENSE IN LODGE MEMBERSHIP

The question whether a United Presbyterian minister can be permitted to belong to a Masonic lodge was an issue recently before the New York Synod of the U. P. church meeting at Ocean Grove, New Jersey. Dr. John H. Hervey, formerly pastor of the Washington Heights U. P. church, now pastor for the same denomination in East Brooklyn, was arraigned in the synod on charges preferred by his former parishioners that he belongs to the Masonic order. The judicial committee of synod reported on the case, blankly refusing to accept this as an accusation derogatory to a minister's standing.

Moderator George H. McClelland of New York Presbytery insisted that the rule of the denomination adopted eighty years ago, forbidding a minister to join a secret order, had become a dead letter. He was publicly accused of being a Mason himself, and without admitting it, replied by challenging any objector to put him on trial for that charge.

PUSHING THE CAMPBELL FEDERAL PLAN

The Presbytery of Asheville, connected with General Assembly U. S., has taken up with very hearty concurrence the idea presented at Atlanta last spring by Dr. R. F. Campbell, pastor of Asheville First church—the proposition for a union of Presbyterian denominations in this country under a federal assembly of two houses, in one of which representation shall be equal among existing denominations, and in the other of which representation shall vary according to the respective totals of members. Asheville Presbytery overtures its General Assembly next year to appoint a committee to consider this plan and to invite all the other Presbyterian bodies of the United States to name corresponding committees for general consultation. If the invitation is accepted by the other bodies, the idea will be to formulate this federal plan in a statute which could be adopted simultaneously by all the denominations interested.

FEDERAL SECRETARY ON PACIFIC COAST

With the first week in October Dr. Charles S. Macfarland, the secretary of the Federal Council of Churches, begins in Spokane a series of public meetings in behalf of the Federal Council, which will be extended through all the important cities of the Pacific coast. The tour, after taking every coast city in succession, will end in Los Angeles. At San Francisco Dr. Macfarland will confer with the Federation of Churches in that city relative to the organization of a committee of 100 which will conduct religious work there during the Panama exposition in 1915. Bishop Edwin H. Hughes of the Methodist Episcopal Church is chairman of the special committee promoting this important evangelistic plan.

Princeton Graduates Long Lived

The necrological report of Princeton Seminary for the year ending March 31, 1913, contains obituary notices of fifty-two former students. Five of these should have been included in earlier reports, but the fact of their death did not reach the secretary in time. Of the fifty-two, the oldest as alumnus was Dr. James Park, '46; the oldest in years was Dr. David Agnew Wilson, '51, who came within five days of completing his ninety-first year. One other passed his ninetieth year, sixteen others their eightieth, fourteen others their seventieth, and ten their sixtieth. The youngest died at the age of twenty-eight. The average age of the fifty-two was seventy years one month and seven days. This is the highest, with one exception, ever recorded in these reports, that is, since 1875. The average at which they made a public confession of their faith was sixteen years and four months.

Declares Second Mormon Book a Hoax

Evidence which has just been placed before the Illinois State Historical Society by W. D. Fugate, 1926 Obear avenue, St. Louis, and his brother, Dr. John T. Fugate of Urbana, Ill., to prove that the original copper plates from which the Second Book of Mormon was written were "planted" in an Indian mound near Kinderhook, Pike county, Ill., in a plot to expose the Mormon leader, Joseph Smith. The "planting," says a newspaper report, was done by the father of the brothers in the forties. W. D. Fugate, who is 70 years old, says his father, with the aid of two friends, prepared the plates and arranged to have them discovered by a follower of Smith's. When the plates were taken to the Mormon leader he at once hailed them as divinely inspired, and published his book from what he claimed he deciphered from the hieroglyphics.

The Way One Church Helps Sustentation

A year ago the pastor, Rev. P. A. Macdonald, and elders of the First church, Saratoga Springs, N. Y., invited Dr. William J. Johnson, eastern field representative of the Board of Relief and Sustentation, to present the cause of sustentation on Sunday morning, Sept. 14. The pastor had prepared for his coming by distribution of literature, personal work and public announcements. As a result the people were sympathetic and eager to know more of the great movement in behalf of the ministry. When the offering was taken, the people placed over $2,800 on the plates, three-fourths being paid in cash within three days. The Sunday school had already taken action by voting an annual pledge for five years. Theirs is the honor of being the first Sunday school to make a five-year pledge to the endowment fund.

Mr. Logan Leaves Sedalia Presbytery

The Continent has been requested by Rev. J. W. Mitchell, stated clerk of Sedalia Presbytery, to announce that the name of Rev. W. T. Logan has been erased from the roll of presbytery because of the fact that he left the bounds of presbytery and joined a presbytery of the Cumberland Church without a letter of dismissal.

Should Rich Churches Pay a Bonus for Ministers?

Speaking in a half-humorous, half-serious vein, Dr. A. C. Zenos of McCormick Seminary suggested at a recent meeting of the Presbytery of Chicago that large congregations which persuade pastors to leave smaller churches should recompense the smaller congregations for the loss sustained. Dr. Zenos is an attendant at Fullerton Avenue church, Chicago, and as such was speaking in reference to the departure of the pastor, Dr. Hugh T. Kerr, who has accepted a call to Shadyside church, Pittsburg. He suggested that in some cases $20,000 or $30,000 might not be too much for churches to pay congregations from whom they had taken a pastor.

DIDN'T KNOW

That Coffee Was Causing Her Trouble

So common is the use of coffee as a beverage, many do not know that it is the cause of many obscure ails which are often attributed to other things.

The easiest way to find out for oneself is to quit the coffee for a while, at least, and note results. A Virginia lady found out in this way, and also learned of a new beverage that is wholesome as well as pleasant to drink. She writes:

"I am 40 years old and all my life, up to a year and a half ago, I had been a coffee drinker.

"Dyspepsia, severe headaches and heart weakness made me feel sometimes as though I was about to die. After drinking a cup or two of hot coffee my heart would go like a clock without a pendulum. At other times it would almost stop and I was so nervous I did not like to be alone.

"If I took a walk for exercise, as soon as I was out of sight of the house I'd feel as if I was sinking and this would frighten me terribly. My limbs would utterly refuse to support me, and the pity of it all was, I did not know that coffee was causing the trouble.

"Reading in the papers that many persons were relieved of such ailments by leaving off coffee and drinking Postum, I got my husband to bring home a package. We made it according to directions and I liked the first cup. Its rich, snappy flavor was delicious.

"I have been using Postum about eighteen months and to my great joy, digestion is good, my nerves and heart are all right, in fact, I am a well woman once more, thanks to Postum."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Write for copy of the little book, "The Road to Wellville."

Postum comes in two forms:

Regular Postum—must be well boiled.

Instant Postum is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water and, with the addition of cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. Grocers sell both kinds.

"There's a reason" for Postum.

SCHOOL AND COLLEGE

The inauguration of Dr. William H. Hudson as president of Blackburn College took place Sept. 24 at Carlinville, Ill.

Blair Academy, under the direction of Newton Presbytery, opened the new year with 200 students, the largest enrollment in its history.

The laboratory of Wheaton College during the summer was enlarged. The library has been indexed and preparations made for additional volumes.

Enrollment on the opening morning at Hastings College was greater than was the entire number of students in all departments last year. The piano department has doubled in numbers and in the college courses there has been an increase of 25 per cent.

Dr. Stanley White of the Foreign Board delivered the principal address at the recent laying of the corner stone of Knox hall at Bloomfield Seminary. The building is a memorial to Dr. Charles E. Knox, first president of the institution. The stone was laid by Dr. David R. Fraser, president of the board of directors.

Thornwell Home and School for orphans opened with every teacher and 300 pupils in place. Florida cottage was opened and a family of twenty boys with matron installed. As yet only eight of the sixteen rooms have been provided for. The Thomas M. Jones science hall has been completed. September has begun without indebtedness, but with nothing in the treasury.

Western Theological Seminary, Pittsburg, opened Sept. 16. Thirty-six new students presented themselves for matriculation, the largest number in many years. These additions will make the total enrollment of the seminary larger than it has been during the past two years. The opening address was delivered in the chapel by Rev. James H. Snowden, D. D., professor of systematic theology.

Park College, Parksville, Mo., opened with an enrollment of 409, one of the largest in the history of the school. Additional dormitory facilities had to be improvised. Enrollment in the college department is the largest ever known. There are about forty student volunteers for foreign missions in school, seven of these in the class of 1914. Three students who had not been previously volunteers for the foreign field offered to go to Koreä after hearing the report of Rev. G. S. McCune of Syen Chun, a Park graduate.

The inauguration of Harry Morehouse Gage as president of Huron College, Huron, S. D., took place Sept. 30. The charge was given by Dr. C. H. French, the retiring president, and addresses of welcome were delivered by members of alumni, faculty, trustees, and others. Among those taking part in the program were Dr. Charles K. Hoyt, Dr. John T. Williamson, President John A. Marquis of Coe College, President William G. Seaman of Dakota Wesleyan University and President R. L. Slagle of South Dakota State College.

Drove 1,400 Miles in Sand Hills

Rev. D. W. Montgomery of Alliance, Neb., has recently returned from a horse and buggy trip of 1,400 miles among the "marginal" people on the fringes of the states of Nebraska, South Dakota, Wyoming and Colorado. He has been absent since June 6 on work in behalf of the Sunday School Board, organizing and reviving Sunday schools. Mr. Montgomery, who is a frequent writer for The Continent, carried a tepee, bedding and cooking utensils with him and has had many interesting experiences in mingling with the people who live in isolated communities and who have been more or less neglected and practically outside church influence.

Rev. J. P. Hutchinson of Colorado Springs, Colo., secretary of the Lord's Day Alliance of the Middle West, on a recent tour of three weeks in Kansas obtained petitions for the Sunday closing of postoffices in nine towns.

Scouts Will Contribute to National Work

On suggestion of some of the Scouts themselves arrangements have been made for the support of the national headquarters in New York of the Boy Scouts by an annual payment of 25 cents each by the Scouts over the country.

Will Print Federation Directory—The national office of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America desires to publish a descriptive directory of all the local federations of churches in the country. In order to insure completeness, readers of this notice, and especially the secretaries of local ministerial associations, are requested to send immediately information regarding such federations to Rev. Charles S. Macfarland, secretary of the Federal Council, 215 4th avenue, New York City.

EASIER TO PREACH THAN EVER BEFORE

Evangelistic Workers in Open-Air and Tent Meetings in New York City Declare They Are Heard Gladly.

Reports of the summer's work of the New York evangelistic committee recently given at the big mass meeting in Carnegie Hall showed that not only was the attendance larger than before but the preaching had been easier on account of a changing attitude of hearers. During the season the committee has had to do with meetings in 149 different locations within the limits of Manhattan and the Bronx. At twelve of these points it has maintained tents. In more it has held services in the streets and squares and parks, and in a still larger number of locations it has cooperated with pastors and congregations in meetings held on church steps or church lawns.

A careful account has been kept of attendance at all of these points and the total number of those who have listened to the gospel thus proclaimed outside churches is 646,214. This is one-third more than the total in 1912 and practically twice as many as the combined audiences of 1911. The work is of such a nature that the committee doesn't try to keep a record of converts, but it does keep a record of inquirers. Of these people during the past summer the workers have gathered 9,000 names and the coming winter's effort will be to get as many as possible of these into weekly Bible classes and into regular church attendance.

Those who have openly avowed themselves converts are not few. Dr. Arthur Smith, the chairman, offered his hearers at Carnegie Hall dramatic evidence of one real conversion when he exhibited a murderous dirk nearly half a foot long, which had been surrendered to him by an Italian who said simply, "Since I belong now to Jesus Christ, I won't need this any more." And perhaps more impressive than all else as to the actual immediate effect of the gospel on New York was the testimony of one worker after another—some of them with experience through all the nine seasons that this enterprise has been prosecuted in Manhattan—that this year it was easier to preach Christ in the streets than ever before, and that the people responded better.

Dr. G. A. Carstensen told how in Wall street his meetings had resulted in gathering together thirty men who have promised to attend a weekly Bible class during the winter—bank presidents and messenger boys. Rev. F. E. Smiley said that the midnight call of his cornetist in Printing House Square never failed to draw a big crowd of men from adjacent newspaper offices. Professor Benjamin F. Butts, who has for several years conducted the meetings in Union and Madison Squares, says the crowds have been bigger and the attention better than ever. In the former location 25,000 and in the latter 26,000 heard the preaching during the summer. Mrs. Butts reported that in three months she had held 2,300 meetings for children in 129 centers—a record of industry that no one else came anywhere near rivaling.

Dr. Vincent Pisek of Bohemian Presbyterian church owned his undoubted debt to the Bohemian meetings in his neighborhood for twenty new members, and Dr. F. Y. Pierce said that when he preached in front of his church on Second avenue crowds gathered in the broad street of such proportions that three policemen were necessary to keep the street car tracks open. Dr. Pierce also had the privilege of preaching on the United States battleships when they were in New York harbor, and brought the surprising news that on each of these vessels seventy-five to 200 men had stood up to pledge themselves to live the Christian way.

Among other pungent incidents of the evening was the testimony of ex-Congressman William S. Bennet, who had been the preacher on two occasions in one of the evangelistic committee's tents. He said that when attending a service in the Mormon tabernacle in Salt Lake City he learned that it was the custom there for the presiding officer to call upon some layman or laywoman in the congregation without previous notice to preach the sermon, and he then and there determined that a Presbyterian elder ought not to let any Mormon beat him in readiness to preach.

If there were no other evidence that this evangelistic movement is taking hold of New York City, the magnificent evangelistic choir which sang at the rally under the direction of Professor Butts would of itself be an impressive demonstration.

LONG FOUGHT BATTLE IS RENEWED

San Francisco's Barbary Coast Attacked by Newspaper—Oakland Also Catches Impetus of Anti-Vice Fight and Police Are Ordered to Act.

SAN FRANCISCO—The long drawn battle on the part of the ministers, churches and women's organizations to destroy the Barbary Coast and obliterate the segregated vice district took new impetus last week when W. R. Hearst's Examiner was brought into the conflict and aligned on the side of a clean city. It is said that the recent addition of Charles F. Aked, D. D., to the editorial staff of that paper has had considerable to do with this change. For two Sundays the pulpits have been unitedly clamoring for the overthrow of both red-light district and municipal clinic. The agitation has led the mayor to recognize it as a condition of common public opinion. Oakland has likewise caught the spirit of the change of opinion and her commissioner of public safety has authorized the chief of police to close the red-light district in nine days.

Resigns from Old Church—Rev. William Nat. Friend, for four years pastor of Howard church, has resigned and will remove to Oakland as soon as a new pastor is chosen. This is one of the oldest churches of the city, having celebrated its sixty-third anniversary Sept. 15. Under its retiring pastor it has furnished leadership in the city for the social service program, Mr. Friend having been fraternal delegate to the labor councils for both the denomination and the church federation and representative of the bureau for the synod.

ILLINOIS CHURCHES ARE ACTIVE

ILLINOIS—Niota church is remodeling its building at an expense of $5,000. It will be a modern country church plant.—As a token of appreciation First church, Macomb, has added to the salary of the pastor, Dr. W. T. Rodgers. One of the daughters of this church, Miss Edna Hill, has entered Hartford School of Pedagogy.—A small cyclone recently developed in the region of the church at Hamlet, Ill., and but for the protecting trees would have probably entirely demolished the building. The roof and walls suffered damage.—Sunday school work in Peoria, Ill., was recently stimulated by a meeting of the Sunday School Workers' Association in First church. Hugh Cork, state Sunday school secretary, delivered an address.

HOLD TENT SERVICES IN CITY SQUARE

WASHINGTON—Services at the Church of the Covenant have been maintained through the summer by Dr. Wood's assistant, Rev. B. Braskamp. Some of the services have been in the tent erected in one of the squares. This tent was demolished by a storm which did much damage to the city, but a new one was obtained and the work continued.—Rev. T. E. Davis of Westminster Memorial church has returned and resumed his work, though he had been suffering considerably from an obscure ailment which at one time he feared would make it necessary to take an extended rest.

DR. CHAPMAN DEPARTS FOR SCOTLAND

Evening Before Sailing Is Spent at John Wyburn's "Birthday Party"—Union Seminary Announces Presbyterian Lectures for the Year.

NEW YORK—Dr. and Mrs. J. Wilbur Chapman sailed for Liverpool Sept. 23. Dr. Chapman goes abroad for the winter of evangelistic work in Scotland. His singing colleague, Charles M. Alexander, who has spent the summer in England, will join him immediately on his landing. Dr. and Mrs. Chapman drove to their steamer direct from the beautiful new mission building on Water street beneath Brooklyn bridge, where John H. Wyburn is carrying on the work that Jerry McAuley began and Samuel Hadley long continued in the tumbledown structure formerly standing on the same site. The meeting of the evening, which Dr. Chapman addressed, was a jubilee for the mission—the twenty-fifth spiritual birthday of Superintendent Wyburn. The room was crowded with the superintendent's friends. At each recurring anniversary of his own conversion, Mr. Wyburn has put forth a very special effort to persuade others to join him in the Christian life, and so it happens that his birthday is also the birthday of an unusual number of the mission's converts.

Seminary Lecturers Named—When the General Assembly's committee on Union Seminary reported last spring at Atlanta, it was stated that the seminary proposed, regardless of any recognition from Assembly, to introduce special lecturers on Presbyterian doctrine and polity for students preparing for the Presbyterian ministry. At the opening of the seminary on Thursday of last week, it was announced that Dr. J. Ritchie Smith of Market Square church, Harrisburg, Pa., will lecture two hours a week throughout the first half of the year on Presbyterian doctrine and principles. During the second semester another Presbyterian pastor, not yet chosen, will lecture one hour a week on Presbyterian polity. Union's mission lecturer for the coming autumn is also a well known Presbyterian, Dr. James B. Rodgers.

Union Has Largest Class—The class of sixty applying for admission to Union Seminary this fall is the largest entering class ever received by the institution. It was not excelled even in the period twenty years ago when seminaries all over the country had an extraordinary influx of ministerial candidates. The total registration will exceed 275. The opening address at Union was delivered by Professor W. A. Brown. The rumor had got abroad that he expected to discuss the relations of the seminary to the Presbyterian General Assembly, but there was not the remotest allusion to that subject.

Dan Crawford Will Speak—Dan Crawford, the famous African missionary, has been engaged as one of the speakers at the National Bible Institute's conference, Oct. 6 and 7, in Marble Collegiate church, 29th street and 5th avenue. Meetings are open to the public.

Teams Plan Mission Talks—Thirty or forty speakers representing both home and foreign mission interests met in the Methodist building Sept. 15 to consider what they should talk about when they go out to speak on this fall's united missionary campaign. Speakers talking for home missions and foreign missions will in this campaign, for the first time, travel from city to city in the same "teams."

Confer on Union Seminary—General Assembly's committee appointed last May in Atlanta to investigate the relations of Union Seminary to the Presbyterian Church met Friday in the Waldorf Hotel, but no information was given out as to its deliberations. Dr. Mark A. Matthews of Seattle, the chairman, presided. All the members of the committee were present with the exception of Dr. Work of New York and Dr. Raymond of Buffalo.

General Metropolitan News—Rev. Charles N. Van Houten, formerly pastor of the South Dutch Reformed church, Bergensfield, N. J., which was taken over last year into the Presbyterian fold, has begun work as assistant to Dr. John R. Mackay at North church.—Mrs. Russell Sage has just given $30,000 to the Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute at Troy to establish a fellowship in memory of Russell Sage second, who graduated in the class of 1859.—First church, Brooklyn, Rev. L. Mason Clarke pastor, has organized a Bible class for young women under the leadership of Dr. Edmund K. Alden of Packer Collegiate Institute.—The corner stone of the new church at Woodlawn was laid last Sunday afternoon. Addresses were made by Doctors Wilton Merle-Smith, John R. Mackay and Jesse F. Forbes.

Farewell to New China Workers—In the assembly room of the Foreign Board on Sept. 23 the farewell to two young women—Miss Harriett M. Allyn, Ph. D., and Miss Martha Hackett, M. D., —who are about to start for South China, was of more than usual interest. Dr. Hackett is the daughter of E. A. K. Hackett of Fort Wayne, Ind., and will serve in Canton, China, in the medical college which bears her father's name and whose buildings were mostly given by him. Mr. Hackett, who was himself present at this meeting, has been editor of The Fort Wayne Sentinel for twenty-two years.

HAS FOUR PASTORS IN A CENTURY

Philadelphia Church Has Peculiar Distinction—Plans on Foot to Bring Laymen Into More Active Service.

PHILADELPHIA—This is centennial year of the founding of the First Church of Kensington. It was organized with nine members in a suburb of the city known as Fishtown. Rev. Thomas Skinner, later very distinguished in the church, was called as the first pastor, but declined. Rev. George Chandler was then secured and remained until his death, forty-five years later. The church grew under his ministry from nine members to 900 and was known as "Chandler's Church." A stately edifice with a lofty spire and capable of seating 1,000 was erected on Girard avenue and is still used. Rev. William T. Eva after seven years led out from the largely increased membership 182 members to form Bethesda church half a mile distant. The next pastor, Rev. J. Hervey Beale, also remained until his death, forty-one years. Rev. Albert Barnes Henry has been pastor since 1910—only the fourth in a century.

Chautauqua Season Over—The Pennsylvania chautauqua organized in nearly 100 towns in territory adjacent to Philadelphia and holding its lectures and entertainments in a huge tent for seven successive days, recently closed a most successful season. Rev. George H. Turner, pastor of Oxford church, was platform superintendent and among the popular lecturers were W. J. Bryan and Dr. W. T. Ellis of The Continent.

Former Missionary to Speak—Miss Dora M. Fish, treasurer of the Woman's Board of Home Missions, and formerly a missionary among the Mexicans of the United States, will speak at the woman's missionary meeting of the presbyteries of Philadelphia, Philadelphia North and Chester in the Witherspoon building, Oct. 8 at 11 a. m.

Would Interest Laymen—Philadelphia North Presbytery has in view a series of important meetings in the churches more thoroughly to interest laymen in religious work. It will be affiliated with the elders' association and be directed by laymen. Among those who have volunteered as speakers are Dr. Cheesmen A. Herrick, P. R. Perkins, William Sidebottom, W. M. Gordon, John C. McKinney and E. A. Zeller, Jr.

Persian Work Growing—Eleven Persians, seven men and four women, were recently received into Gaston church, making the number about fifty who have renounced Mohammedanism. They have a congregation of their own which worships in the lecture room of Gaston church and are ministered to by a native pastor, Rev. David Benjamin.

Permit Catholics to Parade—The parade of the Holy Name society of the Roman Catholic church on Sunday, which was strongly opposed by Protestant ministers and churches and other agencies, partly on account of the music of the many bands interfering with church services, was permitted by the mayor under the condition that no music be played within a square of any church.

Exercises Attract Many—The laying of the corner stone of the new Sunday school and parish building of Disston Memorial church at Tacony drew a larger audience through the announcement that Mayor Blankenburg was expected to speak. Among the other speakers were Dr. R. H. Morris of Central-North Broad Street church and Rev. W. L. Schmalhorst of Bridesburg.

Mystery of Marble Slab Solved—It has been discovered that the "Fourteenth Presbyterian church," referred to in last week's notes as an unknown organization, was a name assumed by Second African Presbyterian church and placed upon the slab recently discovered. The church was disbanded about fifty years ago. W. P. WHITE.

DETROIT TO IMPROVE MORALS

DETROIT—All good citizens are encouraged to know that a clear note of interest in the moral uplift of the city has gone out from official sources. In dealing with organized vice the police commissioner has decided to make a clean sweep of the whole business, adopting the policy of elimination to take the place of segregation. Keepers of vile resorts have been notified to close up in ten days. In dealing with this delicate and difficult situation the commissioner has displayed a fine sense of fairness and consideration for the nearly 500 inmates of these places and has given them time to adjust themselves to a condition of virtuous living. The Board of Commerce and other civic societies will cooperate by assisting them to find places for honest employment.

Picture Films Carefully Censored—The Detroit theaters also are marked for a thorough housecleaning. The censorship of all show houses has been made so strict that some managers have become heavy losers, one declaring that the recent order against the Thaw films is costing him $500 a day. All productions are now to be brought to police headquarters and given in the presence of approved censors and cannot be given on the stage until they have the official approval. In this work of reform the police department has the cooperation of the local press.

has just begun

a series of articles which will appear in The Continent exclusively during 1913-14. The first of these, a discussion of the significance of Protestant Churches' ministerial salary standards, was published recently and has aroused a great deal of interest. This article will be reprinted by the ministerial relief boards of two denominations.

My Glimpse of Edgar A. Poe describes her experience when, a school girl of 14 years, Marion Harland saw the poet in her own home. The memory of this one look at Poe has persisted through a long life.

"And Simon Peter Stood and Warmed Himself"

Here Marion Harland gives her own interesting views of the actions of Peter and other church fathers.

Sunday School Association Plans to Increase Attendance—Pastors Ready to Help Make City More Clean.

PITTSBURG—The twenty-fourth convention of the Allegheny County Sabbath School Association was held in First church Sept. 22-24 with the largest attendance in its history, 3,800 people being at the last three sessions. Officers were elected and work for the coming year mapped out. W. G. Landes, secretary of the state association, announced that an effort would be made to add 45,000 new members the coming year and bring the enrollment to 2,000,000. There are now 200,000 enrolled in the 795 schools of Allegheny county. A training school for Sabbath school workers, meeting every Thursday evening and lasting twenty weeks, has been aranged to be held in the Smithfield Street M. E. church.

Work for Clean Government—A Christian citizenship convention was held in Carnegie Music Hall by North Side pastors Tuesday, Sept. 23. The purpose was to arouse the ministers and bring them together, in their efforts to fight vice and unite Christian people in their efforts to secure clean government. Addresses were made by a number of the local pastors.

Y. M. C. A. Wants More Members—The Y. M. C. A. of Pittsburg began a movement Sept. 30 to add 3,800 members to the present enrollment of 8,000 during the week ending Oct. 6. Captains of teams have been appointed in ten sections of the city and their slogan is "Six Hundred New Members a Day."

Dr. Wycoff Resigns—Cornelius W. Wycoff, D. D., has announced his resignation as pastor of Bethel church and retirement after a ministry of forty-eight years. The resignation is to take effect the last Sunday of October, when he will have completed forty years as pastor of Bethel. His first pastorate of eight years was at Bacon Ridge and East Springfield, Steubenville Presbytery. He offered his resignation over two years ago, but the congregation refused to accept it and provided him an assistant.

FELLOWSHIP SHOWN IN NEW WAY

Episcopal Pastor to Take Part at Installation Service in Seventh Church—Dr. Vance of Lane Seminary Preaches at Church Dedication.

CINCINNATI—A Protestant Episcopal rector—Rev. Samuel Tyler of Walnut Hills Church of the Advent—will take part in the installation Oct. 25 of Rev. Jesse Halsey, pastor-elect of Seventh church. The Seventh has been pastorless for over a year—ever since Thomas Knox went to Lima. The charge to congregation will be delivered by Dr. Selby F. Vance of Lane Seminary. Others to participate in the services are Dr. Robert Watson of the Church of the Covenant and Rev. Paul Dwight Moody.

Blue Ash Church Dedicated—The new Blue Ash church was dedicated Aug. 21, when Dr. Selby Frame Vance of Lane presided. Rev. Harry McMinn is in charge of Blue Ash-Madeira churches.

Other Church News—Old Lane opened Sept. 25 and at the Lane Club reunion Rev. Dr. John N. Ervin, '79, talked on "The Man Behind the Minister."—Mason and Bethany churches have united in a call to Rev. Charles E. Lowrie of Delmar, Iowa.—Venice has called Rev. J. H. Rodgers of Kent, Ohio.—The Church of the Covenant may add a third member to its clerical staff, Rev. Harry A. Whaley of Lawrence, Kan., who was assistant of Rev. Francis Martin in Chicago.—After an all summer's absence, Dr. Robert Watson has returned to his charge, the Church of the Covenant, greatly improved in health.

REN MULFORD, JR.

TWO PASTORS SUFFER LOSS OF HELPERS

Baltimore Ministers Are Bereaved—Hard Work in New Field Overcomes Health of Mr. Downs—Churches to Study Newcomers.

BALTIMORE—Sadness has come to some while others have been spared. James E. Moffat, D. D., for more than thirty years pastor of Cumberland First church, has been called on to give up the wife who has been his companion and helper for many years.—Rev. Henry Miller of Light Street church, Baltimore, one of the younger men, full of confidence and hope and in the midst of a fine work in the old church he serves, has also been called on to pass through deep waters. His wife died unexpectedly this summer, leaving a family.

Leaves Work for Health—Rev. F. S. Downs of Calvary church, a new church of which he is the first pastor, has been working so hard that he suffered a nervous breakdown this summer and has had to give up all work for some weeks in hopes of restoration.

Study Immigration—An appeal is being made to the Protestant churches of Baltimore to set aside the week of Nov. 16-23 for a study of immigrant conditions, especially from the religious standpoint.

DR. McAFEE TO ADDRESS LUNCHEON

Men of Chicago Start Noon Meeting—Bohemian Work Attracting Interest—Immigrants of City Have Special Supervision.

CHICAGO—A series of luncheons for all Presbyterian men of downtown Chicago will be started Oct. 14 to continue during the winter, each Tuesday noon. Dr. Cleland B. McAfee of McCormick Seminary will occupy the last twenty minutes with a brief study of some theme of Christian service for men. The meetings are under the direction of the Chicago Brotherhood. The meetings will be held in a private room on the eighth floor of the Carson Pirie Scott and Company building and an invitation has been extended informally to all Presbyterian men in the vicinity who care to embrace this opportunity for fellowship. Lunch will be served for 35 cents at 12:10 o'clock and the class will close promptly at 12:55.

Will Teach Shoe Cobbling—Shoe cobbling is to be taught this fall to the young men at Bohemian Settlement house on the North side. This new building was occupied last summer and the work is increasing rapidly. In addition to cobbling classes, work in manual training is soon to be introduced. At the request of attendants at the services now conducted in Bohemian a service in English on Sunday mornings is to be started soon.

Will Study Immigrant Conditions—To supervise the placing of new missions and to conduct investigations into the shifting character of the immigrant population of Chicago, the Church Extension Board has obtained Rev. W. Clyde Smith, who came from St. Louis Oct. 1. He is a graduate of McCormick Seminary and has had charge of Boyle Center, a social settlement maintained by St. Louis Presbytery. He also had charge of the summer vacation Bible schools in St. Louis the past year.

Will Occupy Improved Church—First church next Sunday will return to regular services in the church auditorium. During repairs the Sunday school rooms alone have been in use. The organ of the old First church and several memorial windows have been transferred to the building now known as First church.

Endeavor Society Revitalized—During the summer the C. E. society of Third church trebled its membership and is one of the livest organizations in the church. Third church has recently added to the music of its services.

Various Meetings—Sir William M. Ramsay, the noted archeologist, is giving a series of talks in Central Y. M. C. A. this week.—The annual school of methods in Sunday school work was held in New First Congregational church this week under the direction of well known Sunday school leaders.—Rev. E. R. Worrell was one of the speakers at the services commemorating the birthday of Frances E. Willard last Monday at Willard Hall.

Methodists Add to Endowment — Gifts totaling $800,000 were announced at the opening of Northwestern University. Of this sum, $250,000 given by Norman W. Harris will be used to construct and maintain a building for political science. The remainder of the gifts will go to endowment.

Brief Bits of Chicago News—Rev. George S. McCune of Korea spoke at the Training School last Saturday. Mrs. McCune is a sister of the president of the school, Howard B. McAfee.—Rev. W. E. Parker, Jr., associate secretary of the Church Extension Board, will be one of the speakers Oct. 12 at the anniversary celebration of Endeavor church.—Rev. E. M. Haymaker, who spent the best part of his life in Guatemala mission work, spoke in Buena Memorial church last week. He returns soon for several months' service.—A class of 375, representing 140 churches, forms the evening department of Moody Institute.—A new pipe organ was installed in Kenwood Evangelical church during the summer and the auditorium redecorated. Plans are under way for an addition to the church and parish house. — J. Wilbur Messer and Mrs. Messer start on their trip around the world from New York Oct. 21.—Endeavor Sunday school on Rally Day attracted nearly three times its regular attendance and enlisted the interest of so many parents that an adult Bible class was formed.

Presbyteries Urge Canvass of Churches

Discuss Wages of Ministers—Suggestion was made at the meeting of Morris and Orange Presbytery that the salary of rural pastors should not be smaller than $1,000. The synodical committee on home missions was requested to fix a minimum salary. Rev. D. A. Craig speaking on Sunday observance deplored the attractive power of amusement parks and baseball games.

"Stewardship" Is Keynote—The keynote of a most interesting meeting of Cedar Rapids Presbytery was struck by the retiring moderator, Rev. W. Z. Allen, when he announced "Stewardship" as the subject of his sermon. Presbytery adopted the plan for an every-member canvass in March and organized a live committee to prosecute it with Rev. Harry Kremers as chairman. Conferences on the brotherhood and on religious education were held. Overture on union with the Reformed Church was affirmed.

Churches Gain Members—Maumee Presbytery in First church, Bowling Green, Ohio, chose Rev. Jacob C. Mergler of Weston moderator. Arrangements were made for the installation of Rev. D. George Davidson at Maumee. Rev. D. H. Johnston, chairman of presbyterial evangelical committee, reported the past year as having had the greatest increase in membership (except the year of the Sunday campaign) in the history of presbytery, there being an increase of 492 to the church membership.

Discuss Marriage and Divorce—Boise Presbytery met in Payette church. The plan of union with the Reformed Church was approved. Rev. M. A. Camp, who has not been in the active ministry for three years, made request to demit the ministry. His request was granted. Presbytery indorsed the every-member canvass program and ordered churches make active preparations for such a canvass. One morning was devoted to an "inspirational program" with a discussion of the duties of the pastor. "The Duty of the Minister to Marriage and Divorce" was also discussed. Rev. William Moll Case of Caldwell was elected moderator.

Many Elders Attend Meeting—New Albany Presbytery met with Elizabeth congregation. There was an unusually good showing by the elders. Many churches responded to the roll call by an elder, and the quality of the report was far above par—terse, succinct and comprehensive. The opening sermon was by Rev. William A. Millis. The presbytery voted unanimously for union with the Reformed Church, adopted the every-member canvass suggestions of Assembly, and appointed the foreign missions committee as sponsor for the working of the system. Rev. Thomas R. White, student pastor of Indiana University at Bloomington, spoke on the double budget plan and every-member canvass for benevolences.

Emphasize Evangelistic Note—Highland Presbytery met in First church, Effingham, occupying the new edifice which was dedicated in June. The evangelistic note was strongly sounded and recommendations concerning systematic and aggressive work in presbytery were adopted. Rev. Walter M. Irwin, synodical superintendent, explained and emphasized the united missionary campaign. The executive commission is at work carrying out the plans of the every-member campaign. Rev. Howell P. Lair, recently ordained and under commission of the Foreign Board as missionary to Hunan to be supported by Horton church, gave an address on Syria. Dr. W. I. Alexander of Atchison was elected moderator.

Learn New Bible Study Method—Lackawanna Presbytery at Shickshinny, Pa., heard the illustrated address of Rev. George R. Brauer, assistant secretary and treasurer of the College Board, on "Presbyterian Colleges and Their Work." At the popular meeting on Tuesday evening Dr. P. H. Brooks, stated clerk, taught the Sunday school lesson for the following Sunday according to the new method used by Miss Grace Saxe, the Bible teacher with the Rev. William A. Sunday party. A new church was organized and called Scranton Magyar associate church. It is associated with Scranton Green Ridge church. A petition from a number of citizens in the village of Ariel asking for the organization of a church was considered and a special committee was appointed to visit the field. Presbytery voted in favor of the proposed union with the Reformed Church.

Preach on Street Corner—Fort Wayne Presbytery at Garrett, Ind., held a conference in which the duties and opportunities of the diaconate were discussed. Rev. W. E. Hunter of Columbia City presided. Rev. E. L. Buchanan, pastor of Garrett church, had prepared for a street meeting, so at 7 p. m. members of presbytery met at a principal street corner and sang and T. B. Terhune, D. D., preached. At 8 p. m. Rev. D. C. Truesdale of La Grange was chosen moderator. Presbytery received under its care John Kabisch of Third church, Fort Wayne, who intends to study for the ministry. The new church recently organized at Winona Lake was enrolled. Presbytery never was in better shape and excepting for this new church the pulpits are filled. Tuesday noon presbytery went to the railway shops, where the gospel was sung, many of the shop men taking part, and an earnest gospel message was given by Rev. E. A. Van Nuys of Goshen. Richard C. Hughes, D. D., of the Board of Education gave a strong appeal for the students in our state universities and showed what is being done for them. In the evening Rev. Charles Killie of Peking, China, delivered a stereopticon lecture. Special preparations were made to arouse interest in the special appeal for China and also for the every-member campaign.

May Unite Two Churches—Butler Presbytery met in Middlesex church and was opened with strong addresses by Moderator Rev. C. L. Bradshaw and Rev. C. N. Moore. Walter L. Moser, a young elder of East Butler church, was received as a candidate. An effort is in progress seeking to federate or consolidate the U. P. and the Presbyterian churches of Evans City. A strong program on Christian education is promised for the December meeting at Grove City, Pa.

Hear Many Addresses—Waterloo Presbytery met in Westminster church, Waterloo. W. B. Sandford, D. D., of Waterloo was elected moderator. A feature of the program was a conversation on the state of religion in the churches. S. R. Ferguson, D. D., of Cedar Rapids, Rev. O. B. Pershing of Ackley, D. W. Fahs, D. D., of Cedar Falls and H. W. Reherd, D. D., made addresses. A committee of five with Rev. L. P. Krome of Grundy Center as chairman was appointed to press the every-member campaign. In the evening addresses were made by John A. Marquis, D. D., president of Coe College, and E. E. Reed, D. D., president of Lenox College.

Favor Country Life Department—One of the most spiritually helpful and inspiring meetings in the history of St. Joseph Presbytery was held at Akron church. An institute was held preceding the meeting at which Dr. Warren H. Wilson and Rev. Matthew B. McNutt of the department of church and country life gave addresses. Presbytery put itself on record as strongly in favor of the continuation of this department of home mission work. Presbytery favored union with the Reformed Church and overtured synod to take the necessary steps to make synod a delegated body. Statistics show a general advance for the year both in additions to churches and in benevolences. A strong evangelistic spirit pervades presbytery.

Adopt Budget Plan for Presbytery—Flint Presbytery in First church, Port Huron, Mich., elected Rev. O. N. Belden of Marlette moderator. Addresses were give by President Thomas C. Blaisdell of Alma College, "A Cooperant Church and College"; by Rev. Alfred Ray Atwood, "What the Sabbath School Stands For"; by Rev. H. D. Borley, "The Function and Power of the Sabbath School"; L. G. Seeley, "Financing the Church"; Rev. W. H. Fulton, "The Church and Social Life"; Rev. E. E. Lashley, "The Pew in Action"; and "The Budget Plan of Finance," by Rev. E. H. Bradfield in connection with his report as chairman of the committee of home missions and vacancy and supply. The budget plan for contributions to benevolences was adopted, the minimum amount for home missions being stated. Herbert Hall of Point Hope was received as a candidate from Croswell church.

Asks Report on Home Board—Erie Presbytery met at Girard, Pa. At the opening services Dr. George Bailey of Central church, Erie, made an address on "What Is Presbyterianism?" The matter of church federation will be given special prominence at the spring meeting. Trustees were instructed to convey the property of the defunct Greenfield church to the General Baptist Association for some time worshiping in the church, no Presbyterian families residing in the community. An overture to Assembly was presented by Rev. F. M. Hall and adopted asking that a representative committee of seven members be appointed to consider the reform work of the Home Board and report to the following Assembly with recommendations, completing the report and publishing it in the church papers a month before Assembly meets. At the popular meeting Tuesday evening Dr. James E. Clarke made an address.

Meet Wolf on Way to Church—Chippewa Presbytery met in a strictly country church. The main object was to encourage the Anah Emmanuel church, which is located six miles from a railway station. In the afternoon a member of the home mission committee and the presbyterial superintendent walked two miles across the country and held a committee meeting on the front porch of a farm house, and knew for sure that they were on home mission ground. The church stands on a two acre clearing and is well equipped with social room and kitchen and horse sheds. The evening meeting was well attended. An address was delivered by the moderator, Rev. H. R. Knowles of Superior. On the drive home one of the rigs ran over a skunk. The next morning when about two miles from the church a wolf was seen in the road only a short distance ahead. The church people turned out well and in over ten years there have never been so many laymen at the business sessions of presbytery. The meeting closed with several helpful ten minute addresses.

Financial Situation

General Business Shows Healthy Growth—Bond Market Not Sensational but Steadily Rising—Fire Loss Over Country Is Large.

Reports of general business indicate that trade has responded to the short cold snap which recently visited the Central West. Merchants in no part of the country are complaining of lack of buyers. The passage of the tariff bill has permitted executives of many corporations to plan on future work and they are relieved of uncertainty concerning import taxes. The net income of the railways of the country for July showed a decrease over a year ago, but the report for the first eight months of the calendar year exhibits an increase of 5.3 per cent over last year. The bond market indicates strength. A list of twenty standard industrial and railway stocks shows an average rise of four points since June.

By the establishment of fire prevention days in various states effort is being made to bring to the attention of the public the need of preventing fires. Reports show that during August there was destroyed $21,180,700 worth of property by fire, a very large increase over losses in the corresponding month during the last two years. The total loss for eight months is over $160,000,000. This does not include the lives lost nor the potential producing power thus destroyed.

Brief Bits of Business News

—It has been shown to insurance companies by Professor W. L. Wilcox of Cornell University that unmarried men and women die much more rapidly than do their companions of the same age who are married. The table he has compiled follows. The figures show the per cent of increase in the death rate of the unmarried over married men and women:

Ages	Men	Women
Twenty to twenty-nine	57	18*
Thirty to thirty-nine	119	27
Forty to forty-nine	105	22
Fifty to fifty-nine	69	37
Sixty to sixty-nine	60	32
Seventy to seventy-nine	39	34

* Decrease of death rate of unmarried.

—The American Locomotive Company has announced that it will discontinue the manufacture of automobiles. It has been manufacturing a passenger car, selling for $6,000, and a large line of auto trucks, which have been distributed through fifty or sixty agencies all over the country. The business has been done at a loss, however, due, the management says, to the location of the factory, and according to merchandising experts, in large part to the fact that the company's field is the making of locomotives and not automobiles. In fact, part of the time a locomotive man was managing sales for the automobile department of the concern.

A Reader's Pointed Question

"Shall I sell my 6 per cent farm mortgage in North Dakota and invest in high grade railway stocks? A neighbor says stocks are low now and thinks I can make more money by changing."

If you are thoroughly convinced that your mortgage is all right, which you probably are if you placed it through the right sort of mortgage man, it would be highly inexpedient for you to turn your mortgage into railway stock. Possessors of ready cash may be able to avail themselves of the present low prices for stocks to advantage, but there is a speculative aspect to such an investment that puts it in a different class from the farm mortgage.

NEW NEWARK CHURCH IS COMPLETE

Dedication Carries Out Fourfold Idea of Christian Worship—Gymnasium and Social Rooms Are Included.

NEW JERSEY—For the dedication services of the beautiful new auditorium of Forest Hill church of Newark, the pastor, Rev. Frederick W. Lewis, developed the interesting idea of a fourfold dedication. This required that two Sabbaths should be set aside as "dedication days"—Sept. 21 and 28. On the first day Dr. John T. Faris of the Board of Publication offered the dedicatory prayer, and Dr. W. F. Whitaker of Elizabeth preached a sermon. In the evening it was dedicated to Christian education by Dr. Robert Thompson, head of the Philadelphia high school. On the next Sabbath the morning service set apart the house to the advancement of Christian missions, Secretary J. Campbell White of the Laymen's Missionary Movement speaking. In the evening Dr. John McDowell, pastor of Park church, preached a sermon of dedication to Christian service.

The intervening week was taken up with a variety of meetings reflecting the joy of the Forest Hill people in their new church home. The completion of this building is the fruition of a hope cherished in the hearts of this people ever since the completion of their chapel building, which was erected nearly twenty years ago on the rear of the commanding corner lot now occupied by this churchly new structure. The expenditure of $67,000 in these building operations includes extensive rearrangements fitting the chapel building more perfectly to the Sunday school uses to which it will hereafter be exclusively devoted.

Newark Church Just Completed

The complete church plant stands at the center of one of Newark's most desirable modern residence districts. The admirable adaptations of the new building throughout evidence the skill, care and understanding of the architect, J. Cleveland Cady, a well known elder in Brick church, New York city, whose lifetime study has been the development of a type of church architecture expressive of the reverent orderliness of Presbyterian worship and also harmonizing with the practical necessities of the social mission which a modern Christian congregation must fulfill in a large city.

The auditorium impresses the visitor as admirably blending the solemnizing invitation to worship and the cheerful bidding to be at home. Dr. Davis W. Lusk, who knows the Newark churches well, says it is the most beautiful sanctuary in the city. The woodwork is of oak, and the walls of soft shades of olive. The Gothic exterior is of granite. The basement includes a gymnasium, with locker rooms; a social room and a boys' club room, all with separate entrance from the street.

Refuse to Accept Resignation—The resignation of Dr. John Macnaughtan, pastor at Chatham, was not accepted by the church. Final action was postponed until January.

Celebrate Anniversary — The fortieth anniversary of Westminster church Sunday school, Paterson, N. J., was celebrated Sept. 21. The service was in charge of the pastor, Rev. David W. Hutchison, and the superintendent, Andrew Pruden. —The twenty-second annual celebration of old folks' day in the Presbyterian church at Vineland was very largely attended and the services were conducted by the pastor emeritus, Dr. D. H. King, founder of the day. Bouquets were presented to all over 80 years of age. Mrs. A. G. Cass, aged 89, has been present at every celebration.

BRIEF BITS OF STATE NEWS

Minnesota—Sunday school institutes are being held by Dr. Gerritt Verkuyl and local pastors and presbyterial officers at Osakis, Panyesville, Sedan, Round Prairie and Randall.

California—A Japanese church was recently organized at Salinas with twenty-five members. H. Baba, who was recently licensed to preach by San Jose Presbytery, will be the supply.

Pennsylvania — At a recent service in Bryn Mawr church for Mr. and Mrs. Howard F. Martin, victims of the accident on the New Haven railroad, there were present a group of weeping children from the Presbyterian Orphanage, of which Mrs. Martin had been such a loving benefactor. The sermon was preached by Rev. Andrew Mutch, the Bryn Mawr pastor. —The historic church of North East, Pa., where Rev. T. D. Whittles is pastor, had the honor a few weeks ago of having one of its daughters, Miss Anna J. Reed, leave home as a foreign missionary to be stationed near Peking, China. Miss Reed is a daughter of one of the elders.

New York—The installation of Rev. L. F. Mayle as pastor of West End church, Albany, N. Y., was held Sept. 22. Among those taking part were Rev. C. G. Sewall, Rev. E. W. Miller, Rev. J. Wallace Young and Rev. W. H. Stubblebine.

Oregon—Lakeview is making splendid progress under the leadership of Rev. George A. Crawford, a graduate of McCormick Seminary. There is strong activity among the young people. Plans for a new church to cost $3,000 have been accepted by the trustees.

Iowa — The fiftieth anniversary of Jesup church was celebrated recently by special services which were largely attended. Reminiscences of early days supplied by four of the older members of the church, who were admitted as members in 1863 when the church was organized, occupied one of the services. Rev. H. C. Irvine, pastor, appealed to the present members to follow the example of the pioneers in the steadfastness of their religion. The first church building, erected in 1865, was burned in 1895. Another church was burned in 1909 and the present edifice was erected the following year.

NEWS OF EVANGELISTIC EFFORT

Baptists and Presbyterians Unite—A union revival of Enon, Ill., Baptist and Perryton, Ill., Presbyterian churches has just closed with a number of conversions, more than half of whom will come to the Presbyterian church. Both are country churches. Rev. N. O. Patterson was the evangelist.

Presbyters Pledge Definite Work—Great enthusiasm and consecration for evangelistic work was manifest at the meeting of the Rock River Presbytery, and a large number of ministers and elders voluntarily enrolled themselves in a personal workers' league with this pledge: "God helping me, I will join with my brethren in Rock River Presbytery in personal witnessing and work for souls until the next stated meeting of presbytery."

Denominations Desire Active Work—According to reports from more than twenty denominations received at the recent meeting of the commission on evangelism of the Federal Council, there is large interest expressed in evangelism over the country. Denominations also feel the need of active, systematic and cooperative work which the commission on evangelism has undertaken. A finance committee is being formed under the chairmanship of C. W. Dorsey of Baltimore, Md.

COMMISSION APPROVES CAMPAIGN

Committees to further the campaign for the every-member canvass were appointed by the Executive Commission at its meeting last week at Atlantic City. Details of the work were discussed with board secretaries. The campaign for $10,000,000 endowment for the Board of Ministerial Relief and Sustentation was indorsed and a national committee appointed to assist Dr. W. H. Foulkes in the movement.

The resignation of John L. Severance of Cleveland from the commission was received but not accepted. The next meeting of the commission will be held in February in New York.

China Emergency Team Reorganized

The Foreign Board secretaries were in conference last Friday with missionaries now on furlough from China with a view to reorganizing for the coming winter season the team engaged in accumulating an emergency fund in China. Dr. J. C. Garritt, president of the theological seminary at Nanking, China, will be the team leader this year, and others will be Luce and Yerkes of Shantung, Lingle and Locke of Hunan, Killie of North China, Fulton of Canton and Tappan of Hainan. The program of the winter begins in the East and extends westward, including four weeks in Indiana, a week in St. Louis, and later engagements in Oklahoma and on the Pacific coast.

Folk on the Farms

A large proportion of the immigrants to this country were farmers at home.

If they go away from cities here they are separated from their fellows.

They must learn our language before they may enter into the social life of rural communities.

On Sunday there is ordinarily in the country no devotional service which they may attend with profit.

Many foreigners in the country districts have retained their racial and linguistic exclusiveness largely for this reason.

If they have a religious leader of their own race they can quickly enter more fully into the life of America.

Dubuque College and Seminary trains pastors for foreign congregations in the country as well as for city work.

May we tell you more of this effort to solve the immigrant problem on a Christian basis? Address Dubuque German College and Seminary, C. M. Steffens, D.D., President, Dubuque, Iowa.

What 15c Will Do

The little matter of 15c in stamps will bring you the Pathfinder for 13 weeks on trial. The Pathfinder is an illustrated weekly, published at the Nation's Capital, for the Nation; now in its 21st year of increasing success. The paper fills the bill without emptying the purse; it costs but $1 a year. If you want to keep posted on what is going on in the world, at the least expense of time or money, this is your means. If you want a paper in your home which is sincere, reliable, entertaining, wholesome, the Pathfinder is yours. If you would appreciate a paper which puts everything clearly, fairly, briefly—here it is at last. Send only 15c to show that you might like such a paper, and we will send the Pathfinder on probation 13 weeks. The 15c does not repay us, but we are glad to invest in New Friends. Or send $1 for full year; money back any time if not satisfied. Address Pathfinder, Bx G, Washington, D.C.

OBITUARY

Resolutions Adopted by the Board of Managers of the Presbyterian Orphanage at Their Meeting Held Sept. 16, 1913.

Whereas, it has pleased Almighty God our Heavenly Father to take to himself our beloved vice-president, Mrs. Howard F. Martin, and

Whereas, the intimate relations held during many years by her with the members of this board make it fitting that we record our appreciation of her; therefore

Resolved, That the wisdom and ability which she exercised in aid of the board by counsel and loving care of the children committed to our protection will be held in lasting remembrance.

Resolved, That her sudden removal from our board and its executive and admission committees, in each of which she held leading positions, leaves a vacancy that will be deeply felt by all the members of the board and its friends.

Resolved, That with deep sympathy with the afflicted relatives and friends of the deceased we express our earnest hope that even so great a bereavement may be overruled for our highest good.

Whereas, the Great Ruler of the Universe has in his infinite wisdom removed from our midst our faithful and esteemed vice-president, Mrs. William H. Scott, and

Whereas, the long period of her usefulness in our work will make her memory ever an example to us of helpful service gladly done;

Resolved, That our deep sympathy be extended to her mourning family and her many friends, as we bow to the divine will that has removed another pillar from our executive board.

MOSELEY—James E. Moseley of Madison, Wis., an elder of Christ church, Madison, died Sept. 22, aged 84 years. Some account of Mr. Moseley's life will appear in The Continent next week.

1847 ROGERS BROS.
"Silver Plate that Wears"

THE best argument for silverware is to say that it has proved its worth through service. That this is true is seen in the wonderful success of 1847 ROGERS BROS. "Silver Plate that Wears," which for more than threescore years has been the standard silverware, famous for both its wearing quality and beauty of design. It is sold with an unqualified guarantee made possible by actual test of over 65 years.

The Cromwell pattern shown here is a design of true simplicity. It has proved to be very popular.

Sold by leading jewelers and dealers.

Church Efficiency

Scientific Correlation of the Church to its Field through Efficiency Methods, Surveys, Publicity

If churches desire to more effectively meet their local problems, and more completely fulfill their missions in their particular fields, we can help them to do so. Our experts will make a thorough diagnosis of the whole situation, and render a working-program report. There are experts on our staff for every phase of the work. They are experienced specialists, and their findings will be constructive, comprehensive and workable.

Churches wishing exact analysis of conditions in their fields, that have special and difficult problems to solve, that feel the need of a greater measure of cooperation with laymen, that are willing to employ high-class publicity methods to promote their work—may consult us. We are able to help them.

We will consult, make preliminary surveys, work out detailed plans. We will, if desired, take charge of the work we plan and be responsible for its thorough execution.

Write for information and literature, stating the nature of the special problem to be solved

A Charge Against The Continent

Publisher The Continent—DEAR SIR: I have a grave charge to make against The Continent: It forces me to read its every issue through—almost every word. In these days of superabundant reading matter for any one periodical to establish such a tyranny over an individual amounts almost to a penitentiary offense. To illustrate more precisely what I mean, I have lately fallen in love with the Young America page. Just think of it—this cross-grained old codger reveling in "The Other Half"—that recent bit of charming, childlike fancy. Guess I've come to my second childhood!

In sober speech: Accept my hearty and unreserved appreciation for the splendid work The Continent is doing. It is to me a weekly bracer, affording instruction, inspiration, and enlarging my view of the world and the Kingdom. Only to mention a few articles from late issues: The sane and convincing editorial on the Sabbath; the clear exposition of "Judge not . . ."; those heart-searching letters of Priscilla Leonard; the messages of Dr. Jowett, especially that one on the power and proper use of words; and so on, and so on. The "sweet reasonableness" of The Continent's point of view fits into this man's "psychic state" exactly.

Please accept this awkward and round about way of saying "Thanks!" to all the Continent people from editor-in-chief to printer's devil.

And now another word: One of our missionaries in an isolated frontier field finds himself unable, because of the heavy demands on a meager income, to subscribe for any of our religious papers. Is there not someone who would be glad of an opportunity to do this bit of practical Christian work by sending The Continent weekly to this hard-working home missionary? It would prove weekly food for his mind and soul and make him a better workman.

With much appreciation,

Kalispell, Montana. ALEXANDER PRINGLE.

Around the Shop

With all the blushing modesty of the political candidate who retires behind the stage while the nominating speech is being made, the Around-the-Shop Man makes way for the expressions of some of his friendly correspondents.

"'Do you remember,' asked a friend
Whom at Winona late I met,
'How here last year, you did commend
The Continent, your paper pet?
We took the hint, and now we take
The paper for its own dear sake.'
"Thinks I, How easy to win one!
Just speak a word—the thing is done,
The paper does it. Ere I stop,
I'll tell 'The Man Around the Shop.'

J——

"If you are the one that I think you are, my dear A.-t.-S. Man—so clever that you think of everything, and make me turn first to see what you have thought of, in each issue, you will be able to finish out one letter with those that spell——"

(Of course we knew.)

"The Continent, Chicago, Ill.—Gentlemen: Herewith please find check in payment for The Continent for one year. When I sent in my trial subscription I put The Continent on instead of ——— [a well known secular weekly] and you know I am pleased to make that decision since I am inclosing the check.

"I hand you herewith a list of persons who ought to take The Continent, because I am sure they would enjoy and appreciate it, though some of them may at present be regular readers.

J. R. H."

The Around-the-Shop Man has known a great many readers who "passed on the good word" to their friends, but has yet to hear of one who isn't proud of his act. And the new members of the family feel equally happy.

A LOOK AHEAD WITH THE CONTINENT FAMILY

Bruce Barton

is the brilliant young writer who prepared that interesting article in this week's Continent—

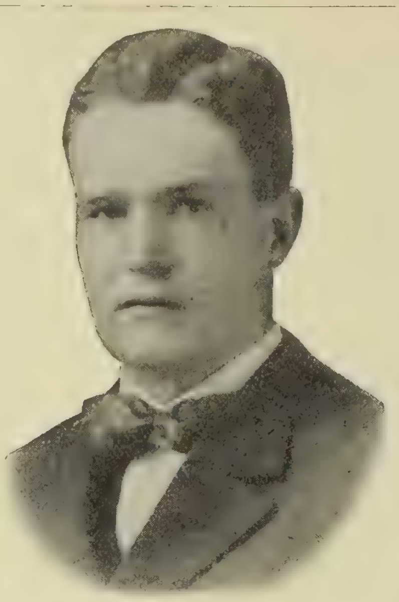
"The Easiest Thing to Talk About"



℄ Bruce Barton is widely known for his splendidly vital work on The Continent. He has a remarkable gift for discovering and illuminating some of the significant phases of life that most people pass without recognition.

℄ During the year 1913-1914 Mr. Barton will continue his brilliant work as a staff writer for The Continent. One of his articles, "Even the Poor Have the Gospel Preached Unto Them," concerns a little known practical work among men of a large city —men whom the churches do not ordinarily reach. Another group of articles of most timely interest will be announced later.

From among the many good things in the next issue many will pick as the best feature the article by Mrs. Helen Barrett Montgomery. More articles are to come from her during the year, regarding which we shall have something to say later.

No magazine, secular or religious, brings to your home such a combination of good reading features of a helpful sort as you find in an average number of The Continent, many of our friends say. To urge your neighbor to take The Continent is to do him a personal service.

It costs only 5 cents a week.

Trusted and Trusty

"I TRUST YOU."

If there is magic in any human words, surely these three have it.

In Illinois lately as in Oregon for some time past, the state prison authorities have adopted the theoretically dangerous experiment of trusting the personal honor of criminals.

Prisoners are removed from the penitentiary and set to work on the public roads without guards to watch them. They sleep at night in camps which are not picketed.

Yet they do not escape. Their pledge of honor has been previously given that they will not go away, and they do not. They are trusted. And they keep the trust.

To be sure, an occasional one fails. But such instances are so few that they do not really weaken the large rule thus vindicated with the most unlikely of subjects:

To make a man worthy of trust, trust him.

A principle that can make convicts dependable certainly deserves to be applied to more valuable and promising material.

Is it not a queer paradox to be turning to the seamy side of life for demonstration of an effectual incentive to nobility? Ought it not first to show its force in life's nobler relations?

Where, for instance, does trust more inherently belong than in the home? Yet how few comparatively are the homes where the children are really trusted—trusted as much as these honor men from the penitentiary?

Even in families of the highest Christian grade, parents nervous with anxiety for their children to do right frequently succeed in establishing only an atmosphere of suspicious expectation that they will do wrong.

The superabundance of precautions and injunctions with which the children are loaded down unite to imply that in all probability they will do everything they ought not to after all.

Yet children cannot, on the other hand, be brought up trusty by simply letting them go, hoping for the good blood in them to keep them straight. Lazy complacence is not trust; still less can indifference and inattention counterfeit it.

In order to enable trust to work its magic, there has to be created a solemn sense of pledge on both sides. There must be some one engaging to be trustful with some who engages to be trustworthy. Then the party of the first part has to live up to his agreement not simply in his outward actions but in his innermost feeling toward the party of the second part.

Dealing with convicts under the honor system, prison directors find that there are no halfway measures possible. So long as they maintain precautions to frustrate attempts at escape, the men are likely to attempt escape at any opportunity. They see that their word is not yet taken as absolutely good. Hence they lack something of sufficient cause to make it good.

But when there are no longer any tokens of suspicion that they will try to get away, the prisoners stay uncompelled. The compact is then complete; real faith is placed in them and reciprocally they keep real faith.

And what works with criminals, already broken in purpose and ideals, is a thousand times more sure to work with high-minded young people in the home.

The trusted child must know that he is trusted, and then he must be trusted—with all sympathetic and intimate companionship from his elders, indeed, but never subjected to spying pursuit.

Believe in the children wholly and they'll justify it wholly.

There is an application of the same thought to business:

The evil spirit that works most of the harm in commercial competition is the idea obsessing many business men that their rivals in the market are leagued against them with a foul purpose to "do them up." This by reaction produces that brutal distortion of the golden rule—the determination to do to others what one supposes that others mean to do to him.

And whatever may have been the original intention of his neighbors, the man who proceeds by this plan can soon provoke the worst of the treatment which he has expected. Distrust thus sets up a vicious circle of stroke and counterstroke which grows more hopelessly disastrous at every exchange.

Had only trust instead of distrust, however, been the starting point of action, an equally powerful circle of good will would have been set in motion.

Fair dealing challenges fair dealing—yes, even compels it.

In these circumstances an explicit compact is not commonly possible. It lies usually with some one dealer to adopt aboveboard methods in his own line, and take the risk of rival concerns following his example. No doubt that requires courage, especially while people so generally believe that an initiative in fairness is simply a suicidal invitation for others to take mean advantage.

But such skeptics do not know human nature as well as they think. For a little while the generous man in business may, indeed, supply an "easy mark" for tricky rivals. But in the long run he will shame even the tricksters.

Out of many other questions which could be raised under this head of reflection, but one more can be alluded to:

Why is it, in matters of comity and unity among Christian denominations, there is seldom the exhibit of absolute trust?

In almost every case where an adjustment of home mission interests has been attempted, either in frontier states or in the developing suburbs of cities, the heaviest strain on comity is the fear of each group of church men that some other group will outwit them and succeed in planting churches in the more favorable situations.

Likewise in church union negotiations there usually runs somewhere beneath the surface on each side an undermining current of dread lest undue privilege will accrue to the other party.

If it could only be sincerely assumed, as a base to all interdenominational arrangements, that Christian gentlemen may be depended on to keep their pledges at least as faithfully as penitentiary trusties, the harmony of Christendom would be vastly promoted.

The moral compulsion of trusting another man to be and do right is attested not by human wisdom only; Jesus taught it.

He said: "Whosoever smiteth thee on the right cheek, turn to him the other also."

Jesus knew that mean as humanity is, it is not often mean enough to smite a second time a trustful cheek.

New Tariff Bill Passes—"A Fiscal Revolution"

Within six months after the special session of Congress had convened on April 7 and ten months after hearings were begun by the ways and means committee of the house, the new tariff bill had been passed and signed. President Wilson used two pens in affixing his signature last Friday night, obligingly dividing his name in the middle so that Representative Underwood might carry away as a souvenir the instrument that wrote "Woodrow," while Senator Simmons took the one with which "Wilson" was subscribed. If there had been a third claimant for a pen the President might have regretted dropping the introductory "Thomas" from his name.

"A fiscal revolution" is the phrase used by a Canadian editor to describe the new act. For it completely overturns the Payne-Aldrich law, and makes a general reduction in the import duties on practically all important articles in common use. Notably is this true of foodstuffs and farm products, which have been reduced nearly a half; woolen clothing is reduced two-thirds and raw wool is to go on the free list, as is sugar in 1916. Gone is the tariff on meats, fish, dairy products, flour, potatoes, coal, iron ore, lumber, farm implements, boots and shoes.

While the bill makes a multitude of sweeping cuts in schedules, it is not regarded as a free trade measure—"freer trade" being used as a more nearly accurate characterization. But it is such a decided step away from the high protective system that a London editor declares it marks "an economic epoch."

Tax on Individual Incomes Now in Force

The new tariff law is expected to bring in about $250,000,000 annually—very much less than the present imposts—and the income tax is looked to to help make up this deficiency. It is estimated that it will produce about $83,000,000, though it is of course as yet untried. Wisconsin and a few other states have experimented with this form of taxation and the plan has long ago been definitely worked out in the countries of the Old World, but the idea of making a direct contribution to the support of the national government is almost new to this generation of Americans. Only a small fraction of the population will be affected, however, the latest estimate by the treasury experts placing the number of persons who will pay at 435,000. For the year 1913 incomes will be calculated only from March 1 to the end of December and collections will be made in June, 1914. Unmarried men and women must pay on any net excess above $3,000 a year, and married persons above $4,000. The present President, judges of the federal court now in office, officers and employees of a state or any political subdivision thereof, not including Congressmen and senators, are the only ones specifically exempted from payment by the terms of the law. These exemptions are to avoid any questions of constitutionality.

Persons liable to taxation must report on official blanks between January 1 and March 1 and failure to report is punishable by fine. The rate varies from 1 per cent up to 6 per cent, the latter rate being for annual incomes of over half a million dollars. Reductions allowed include necessary expenses actually incurred in carrying on business, interest payable on indebtedness, losses from fire, storm or shipwreck not covered by insurance, dividends upon the stock of corporations which is taxed upon its net income, and interest upon municipal, state or government bonds. Life insurance proceeds are not included, and no return of income not exceeding $3,000 is required. Firms, individuals or trustees who disburse salaries or "determinable periodical gains" are required to deduct and withhold the tax and pay it to the proper United States official.

"Now Ready for the Second Step"—Wilson

To the group assembled around him when he signed the Underwood-Simmons bill President Wilson, after expressing his extreme gratification at having a part in the accomplishment of something which he has had at heart ever since boyhood, referred to the pending currency bill in these words:

"There is no use taking away the conditions of monopoly if we do not take away also the power to create monopoly, and that is a financial rather than a merely circumstantial and economic power.

"The power to control and guide and direct the credits of the country is the power to say who shall and who shall not build up the industries of the country. We are now about to take the second step, which will be the final step in setting the business of this country free. That is what we shall do in the currency bill, which the house has already passed and which I have the utmost confidence the senate will pass much sooner than some pessimistic individuals believe.

"So I feel tonight like a man who is lodging happily in the inn which lies halfway along the journey and that in the morning with a fresh impulse we shall go the rest of the journey and sleep at the journey's end like men with a quiet conscience, knowing that we have served our fellow men and have thereby tried to serve God."

Roosevelt Raps President Wilson's Foreign Policy

Theodore Roosevelt sailed away for South America last Saturday in a blaze of glory. The night before a farewell dinner, attended by a crowd of tremendous proportions, had been tendered him in a New York roof garden. Colonel Roosevelt made one of his typically energetic and forceful Progressive speeches, asserting that every principle of the new party will eventually be adopted by the nation—"the fight has only just begun." He attacked the administration's foreign policy and declared that what was needed was a policy founded not only on good intentions, but also on strength, and he cited his own course in curing the chronic revolutions in San Domingo and protecting American interests with a strong hand. No Americans, he remarked, were then asked to leave the country and abandon property to contending factions.

Addresses were also made by Gifford Pinchot and ex-Senator Beveridge. The latter said he saw that the Democratic party would become conservative and that the Republican party would die of internal strife, leaving the Progressives the party of the future.

Accompanying Colonel Roosevelt on his departure were his wife and daughter Margaret; Anthony Fiala, the Arctic explorer, who has charge of the expedition's equipment; G. K. Cherry and Leo L. Miller, naturalists of the American Museum of Natural History; Frank Harper, Colonel Roosevelt's secretary, and Father John Augustine Zahn, provincial of the Order of the Holy Cross, a former field companion of the colonel.

Good Roads Brought to the Nation's Attention

With the coming of the automobile and motor truck and the gradual passing of the era of new railroad construction, more and more attention is being given to the subject of highway building and improvement. Last week an American road congress was held in Detroit, attended by several thousand delegates representing twenty-eight different associations. In point of attendance it was the largest road convention thus far held, and was the first to receive official recognition from the government. The call to the convention recited that the rapid concentration of population in the large cities and the high cost of living are due in large measure to bad roads which render farms inaccessible, social conditions unattractive and educational advantages limited.

The Lincoln Highway Association, with headquarters in Detroit, presented its project for a national trunk line from New York to San Francisco—a transcontinental roadway to be constructed by popular subscription in honor of Abraham Lincoln. Several variants of this idea are being discussed in different parts of the country—Boston, for example, objecting because not made the starting point of the highway.

Better Methods of Treating Prisoners

Illinois is the latest state to undertake to turn convicts into useful citizens by giving them sane and useful employment. Two score of prisoners from Joliet penitentiary have been placed on their honor and practically turned loose in an outdoor camp, there to labor on road construction. If the prisoners want to run away they can do so, for they are not wearing striped suits and they are guarded only by two men without weapons, who are foremen rather than guards, but recent reports show the "probationers" have no disposition to escape. The special inducement to stay at work is a commutation of sentence, whereby each convict may thus honorably earn a considerable reduction in his penalty. This experiment in conditional freedom is being watched with interest by students of criminology and penology.

Various topics in connection with the treatment of convicts will be considered at the annual meeting of the American Prison Association to be held in Indianapolis October 11-16. The Prison Wardens' and the Prison Chaplains' Associations will also meet at the same time. Addresses are announced to be made by Vice-President Marshall, Governors Cox of Ohio, Eberhart of Minnesota, Ralston of Indiana and Foss of Massachusetts, Provincial Secretary Hanna of Ontario, Julia C. Lathrop, head of the federal children's bureau, and Maud Ballington Booth, who is president of the woman's auxiliary. James A. Leonard, superintendent of the state reformatory at Mansfield, Ohio, is president of the association. Among the subjects to be debated are prison construction, prison recreation, the wage system and the honor system for prisoners, mail privileges and the use of correspondence schools by prisoners, child labor and crime, educational work for prisoners and other means to secure the rehabilitation of manhood and womanhood. The annual sermon is to be preached at Second Presbyterian church by the pastor, Owen D. Odell, D. D. Rev. A. J. McKelway, secretary for the southern states of the national child labor committee, also has a place in the program.

British Employers Form Defense Union

Even more serious than the Ulster militarist movement against Irish home rule—which, peradventure, may look a good deal less threatening a year hence than it does now—is the industrial unrest which prevails in Great Britain. The regular labor leaders have in many instances lost control of the rank and file, and some observers think a breakdown in the system of organized trade unionism is impending. In one cotton mill in Lancashire the spinners went on strike in defiance of agreements and of their leaders. The association of master spinners has announced that it will soon close all the spinning mills and lock out the workers unless the dispute is settled.

A national organization of British employers has lately been launched, known as the United Kingdom Employers' Defense Union. It is to have a guaranty fund of $250,000,000 for the purpose of coping with strikes, which have become distressingly frequent in England and Ireland, as well as on the continent. Theoretically an organization with such vast financial resources should be all-powerful on the side of capital against labor, but it has more than once developed that wealth is not the only deciding factor in industrial warfare.

Lutheran Missionaries Captured by Brigands

Chinese brigands, said to number 1,000, ten days ago captured five American and four Norwegian missionaries of the Lutheran Church at Tsao Yang in the northern part of the province of Hupeh. Four thousand troops were ordered into the district, but it was suggested that ransoms might prove a quicker means of saving the lives of the captives. The American vice consul at Shanghai reported last week that a son of one of the missionaries had been killed and other foreigners maltreated by the brigands. This province has not been considered unsafe for the missionaries.

Names of the captives are Rev. George Holm, wife and son and Miss Sather, Americans; Miss C. L. Rasmussen, Mr. Berdahl and Rev. H. Fauske and wife, Norwegians. The little son of Mr. and Mrs. Fauske was killed.

The region is remote from any place where the Presbyterians are at work. Advices received by the Presbyterian Board last week were to the effect that their missionaries had not been seriously disturbed.

—H. M. Pindell of Peoria, Illinois, editor The Peoria Journal, was last week appointed by President Wilson as ambassador to Russia. The new ambassador, while not a man of national reputation, is well known and respected in his home state and city as a man of ability and character. In religious affiliations he is a Presbyterian and was formerly superintendent of Peoria Second church Sunday school.

Fifty Thousand Children Taught in Vacation

The National Association of Daily Vacation Bible Schools, of which Dr. Robert E. Speer is now president, has had in the past summer season the most efficient work of all its progress so far. In 1907, when Robert G. Boville, the national director, was laying the foundation of the association, his efforts touched four cities and resulted in nineteen schools with 5,000 pupils enrolled. Six years later in thirty-four cities and towns 215 schools have engaged the attendance of 50,000 children. And this represents but a small fraction comparatively of what has developed from the introduction of this fruitful idea. A large number of other organizations have appropriated the plan, especially the home mission agencies of the churches. There are no comprehensive statistics showing the full extent of this admirable activity.

The observation that in the crowded and heated city slums children very little enjoy vacation from school, but even in summer are happier in school than when roaming the streets, was the seed of the vacation school idea. Then Mr. Boville fitted into his plan several other factors. One was the great and cool lecture rooms and parlors of the city churches standing empty and idle through the weekdays of the summer season. Another was the great number of Christian college students who find it hard to occupy their vacation periods profitably. So he brought about a conspiracy of these forces, opportunities and needs and made plans for teaching the street children in the churches through the ministry of college young men and women.

No thought of Christian service has ever "taken" with Americans quicker than this. The appeal of it to college people in particular has been wonderful. From fourteen institutions students, faculty or trustees have provided sixty scholarships to sustain workers representing them in these schools. All together 1,000 students on vacation from their studies have taught in the association's daily Bible schools this summer; of these 300 served at their own charges entirely.

Even the children gathered off the streets for this instruction showed in a substantial manner their appreciation of the privileges of these schools. Though belonging exclusively to families of the poor, the 50,000 pupils of the past season contributed in pennies $3,500 to help extend the work to other children in the summer of next year.

Episcopalian Men Assemble in New York

The national convention of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew (the laymen's organization of the Protestant Episcopal Church), held in New York city, beginning October 1, as a prelude to the triennial sessions of the official General Convention of the same denomination, was marked with a fine spirit of loyalty to definite Christian service. An attempt to commit the organization to a position on the vexed question of changing the name of the denomination was determinedly suppressed in order that no purely ecclesiastical issue might divide the unity of the brotherhood in the pursuit of its spiritual tasks.

The registered attendance was above 1,000. The convention chose as its president Walter Kidde of Montclair, New Jersey, and as its secretary W. T. Hadley of Los Angeles, a son of the late Colonel H. H. Hadley, a nationally known temperance lecturer. The two addresses in connection with the convention which seemed most to impress the public were the appeal of Dean Sumner of Chicago for a purity crusade in the church, and the plea of Dr. James E. Freeman of Minneapolis for the ostracism of wealthy churchmen believed to be guilty of commercial or industrial oppression. Dean Sumner proposed that the Sunday schools of the denomination should propose a purity oath to their adolescent boys under Sunday school instruction.

The sessions of the General Convention began in Synod Hall, on the grounds of the Episcopalian cathedral of St. John the Divine, on Wednesday, the 8th.

Disciples of Christ Adopt New Constitution

The international convention of the Disciples of Christ in Toronto last week attracted upwards of 3,000 persons. At the opening of the six days' session the denomination, which claims 1,300,000 souls, began a new era in its international organization by the adoption of a constitution for a delegate convention. The expected opposition to this measure did not appear until the second day, when there were many spirited speeches in opposition, but an explanatory resolution was adopted which placated opponents of the plan. The original plan was to create an overhead body to which all missionary and other societies might report and be subordinate, somewhat similar to the Presbyterian General Assembly. The explanatory resolution definitely states, however, that the action of the delegate body will be advisory and in no sense mandatory.

One session was devoted to a discussion of Christian unity, and strong addresses were made by Dr. Peter Ainslie of Baltimore, Dr. Charles L. Mead of New York and Rev. F. W. Burnham of Springfield, Illinois. The latter reported that progress had been made toward calling a world conference of all Christian bodies. Dr. George B. Stewart brought greetings from the Presbyterians and expressed very positive unionist sentiments.

Editorial

If the Church Struck!

TWO RECENT VOLUMES have suggested in different connections what might be the result of the sudden or gradual cessation of the life and work of the church. It is an interesting speculation. What would happen if the church struck work and went out of business?

In his Lowell lectures, Professor Royce draws a contrast between the old times and these, saying that the destruction of the temples and priests of any ancient city would have disturbed the whole life of the city tragically, if it did not paralyze it. Now, on the contrary, "if all churches and priesthoods and congregations were temporarily to suspend their public functions and their visible doings, our market places and factories and merchants and armies would continue to go on, for the time, much as usual." This would come about, he feels, because of the divorce of common life from mere institutions of religion. He does not go on to say how soon the effect of the withdrawal would be felt.

President Blanchard, in his recent little commentary on the Revelation, says that that Bible book teaches the withdrawal of the church from the world for a period, and the continuance of the affairs of state and society without it. To his surprise there is reference to the persecution of saints in the period following the withdrawal of the church. Whence do they come, when all the church has been withdrawn? The writer thinks the victims of this persecution will be those who have been brought up under the influence of the church and have felt its power all their lives without yielding to it, who are brought by its absence to a sense of what it means, and so accept the faith which once they simply neglected. Here again is the question, What would happen if the church went out of business?

Now, that is more than a speculative question. It is worth asking seriously because frank facing it it will compel one to decide what it is which the church is actually doing that could or could not be spared from society and the lives of men of our own time. Several phases of answer will occur to thoughtful people. For one thing, it would make no conscious difference in the lives of a good many people. Waive just now the question about its actual difference, and there is no doubt that so far as they would know, the disappearance of the church would mean nothing, because the church as it now exists means nothing to them.

In the life of the average reader of The Continent, the abolition of the saloon would make no conscious difference, because it is not a factor in life to him now. There are many people in whose lives the church cuts no more conscious figure than the saloon in the lives of these others. They know it is there, and they see something of it, but they never think of it as related to themselves; it is for people who want it, and they do not want it.

To another group, the cessation of the church would be a positive relief. It would take away one more irksome duty or one more annoying challenge, or one more nagging reminder of obligations not heartily recognized nor fairly met. They go to church, at least sometimes, but they quickly and willingly accept excuses to stay away. Going in the summer is quite out of the question; it is bad enough to have to go in the winter. They contribute to its demands, but chafingly, and with a persistent complaint of the number of them. The church is accepted with little grace as a necessary element in social good breeding or as a safeguard against possibly imaginary evils in a future life. But if by any accident there were no church, they would heave a sigh of relief and plan their lives without it.

Or else they do not go to church at all, nor take any part in its work, but they were brought up to feel differently and they never get over the feeling that they are not doing right. The church is a constant challenge to them, to something in them which has not suffered death even under trying conditions of life. These would be relieved if there were no church.

Of course, there would be a large group of its lovers who, if the church were removed, would lose out of their lives all they have counted best and finest. We take them for granted, in order to pass them and point out what the neglectful and indifferent would soon miss when the church struck. Beyond doubt, the atmosphere of life would change. The chief support of the Sabbath is the church; if it went, the Sabbath would go, and the effect on the lives of all men in all parts of society would be incalculable. No one can possibly live in Christendom as though there were no Sabbath. It changes the whole order of life. The very power to violate the Sabbath, to make it a day of pleasure, is due to the sustaining power of the church. Something would have to take its place, of course, but the finding and keeping that thing would be a task which some one would find most serious. The very language we use is shot through with the phrases of religion, and with the going of the church, religion as we know it here would go. There would be a perceptible change in the atmosphere of life.

The removal of the church would take from society some of its strongest restraints. It is the strongest bulwark of decency—not the only one. The motives it offers are the safe ones for society. It is a far more pervasive influence of restraint than we generally realize. It is not its teaching of future punishment, though that is not to be despised; it is rather its persistent reminder of God and the moral obligations which his presence imposes. That sense is kept alive today by nothing so much as the church.

So there would be removed the greatest of the inspirations of life. Service is no new thing, but unselfish service, self-denying service, is the constant and unfailing motive offered and urged by the very existence of the church. Its very failures, the failures of its ministers and people to live out its teaching, serve to accent its teaching—these shortcomings are so palpable when they occur.

With the church's going would go the motives which rise from the example and teaching of Christ. That is true because the greatest loss in the loss of the church would be that the Christian faith would soon cease to be taught or spread in the world. The theory of that faith does not demand that it die with the church, but the facts go all that way. The spread of the faith of Christ rests on the church—not the church in this or that particular form, but in some form. At no time has it spread without the church; at no time has it flourished with a languishing church. Whatever the Christian faith means in the world, that the church means to the world, and that would be lost if the church should cease to be.

Mere Indoctrination Fails to Make Character

It is by no means a sufficient ideal to speak for religious instruction in the public schools. And the thing wanted in the public schools and from them is moral training. And while religious instruction—if Americans could ever agree on what is purely religious and not sectarian—would certainly be a valuable factor for the public schools to use in moral training, it could never constitute the complete substance of it, nor standing alone, become a guaranty of moral results.

The parochial schools of the Roman Catholics are a melancholy demonstration of this. The whole reason for separating Catholic children in a parochial school system is in order to bring them under the daily impact of religious teaching. According to the theories of the bishops and priests, this constant impression and reimpression with religious ideas is bound to fix the boys and girls in Christian character. As a matter of experience, the system does not even make the children it handles steadfast Catholics. Roman losses from the product of parish schools are at least as serious as anything which Protestantism suffers by the falling away of its Sunday school scholars.

But the far worse detraction from the work of the parochial teachers is their failure in moral effect on their pupils. Theories aside, the sad fact of things is that the parochial schools in the behavior of their children make poor comparison with the public schools, though the latter are void of any formal character making method whatever. Evidence of this may be gathered in any city through inquiries to which a sample answer is the statement from Chicago that 75 per cent of the children brought before the juvenile court are Catholic children—most of them, of course, parochial pupils. This is enormously disproportionate as compared with the child population of the city.

No doubt, there are other circumstances partially accounting for this condition, but the main circumstance is the failure of the Roman teachers to teach conduct. They teach for belief—to indoctrinate the children. But the indoctrination goes for nothing where there is not forthwith poured into the doctrinal mold the white hot love of goodness and beautiful living. And it takes something more alive than the routine of formal catechizing to warm any child into that cordial heat.

Lots of Good Men Not Doctors of Divinity

Of innocent and unsophisticated pastoral committees there are undoubtedly a variegated assortment at large in different parts of the land, looking for the "right man" to introduce to their respective congregations. But the most innocent of all is the committee that looks into the official roster of ministers to see if the man it has in mind carries "D. D." after his name. There is no sign less revealing of ministerial qualifications than that. The degree of "doctor" pertains of course to a host of strong and consecrated men in the ministry, but it is not infrequently attached to men whom those who know them well could call by neither adjective—for "doctor of divinity" is a distinction obtainable in America well-nigh as readily by coveting it as by deserving it. And such as must be "looked up in the minutes" to determine whether they are doctors or not, are rather more likely to have arrived at the honor by the former than by the latter method.

However, the caution is not of so much consequence by way of guarding against preference to unworthy men as it is by way of warding off injustice to worthy men who have all their lives been too usefully busy to bother their heads about these "fardels." It is surely as unhappy as it is unfair to disparage such men because their modesty and their reality conspire to make them sensibly indifferent to artificial dignities and incapable of directly or indirectly soliciting this recognition. The wise pastoral committee, if it thinks its pulpit worthy of a doctor of divinity, will do far better to pick out some capable man from obscurity and set him where degree-giving institutions will take voluntary notice of his merits, rather than if it should choose, on the mere strength of special alphabetic distinctions, a "doctor" already made.

Unity Does Not Ask Sacrifice of Conviction

The most stubborn of all misconceived prejudices is the seemingly unconquerable notion that church union can be attained only at the sacrifice of conviction by those who thoroughly believe in the existing principles of their own separate churches. But there is neither fact nor logic to make that true. Church union might perhaps be secured through sacrifice of conviction, but it need not be; indeed, it ought not to be. The only thing that has to be sacrificed is the straitened idea that every difference of Bible interpretation among Christians requires them to divide into different organizations. The right church union attitude is the simple consent of Christian love that men may continue to hold their own independent views of details in religion and yet serve together in the kingdom without disparagement of anybody's beliefs. Why should a man's Christian conviction make him any other Christian's enemy, or render him unacceptable as a brother beloved in the bonds of a unified Christian church? There is no inherent reason why the different ways of administering baptism and communion, for instance, may not coexist side by side in the same organized fellowship. It is irreligious intolerance which makes out of these differences reasons for denominational cleavage—not religious conviction at all.

New Opportunity for Hypocrites in Vice War

Hypocrisy is more protean than Proteus. It always develops a new form to take advantage of every new moral interest of the times. The recent splendid uprising of public indignation against the vice traffic is already affording cover for a species of hypocrites peculiarly odious—men who pretend to aim at fighting evil while really they are only bent on making money by spreading vulgarity. As authors and publishers, playwrights and theatrical producers, they are circulating so-called "studies" of the vice question which are simply and solely obscene literature, calculated to gain a market by catering to the worst instinct of the human animal. From books that are honestly written to warn people against sin and its consequences, these productions of canting pretense are a hemisphere apart.

When a little while ago the valiant Anthony Comstock, still fighting impurity in his old age as tremendously as in youth, suppressed one such book, an awful howl was made by its promoters about their pure and noble intentions being misunderstood. But the powerful New York Times upheld Mr. Comstock manfully and declared him absolutely right. It reminded the book's sponsors that Mr. Comstock had never tried to suppress "The Scarlet Letter" nor "Adam Bede" and pointed out that the strenuous soldier for purity had simply sensed the inherent difference between lustful and salutary approaches to the grim problems of the social evil Assuredly such discrimination between these two motives for treating sex questions was never more requisite than just now. Pure-minded men must steadfastly deny to vulgar sensualists the credit of being honest allies in their war against vice.

—Men at Work, organ of the Presbyterian Brotherhood, appropriately pays a warm-hearted tribute to both Charles S. Holt and Walter Getty, who have recently resigned from the brotherhood's national presidency and secretaryship respectively. Both men have earned the warmest gratitude of the Presbyterian laity—Mr. Holt exceptionally by his longer service. When the brotherhood was first brought into being it was largely Mr. Holt's sane understanding of the church, in its general denominational phases and in particular parish phases as well, which held the new movement close to practical lines. And in later years of its progress he resisted with a pertinacity which at times became heroic all shoddy schemes for an easy, quick—and transient—success. For making the work harder by his determined policy of "safe and sure" Mr. Holt has paid an immense price in the burdens he has borne. But in the outworkings of the future the church will do him full honor for the wisdom which tolerated no foundations save those laid carefully and deep. Surely the brotherhood itself is keenly alive to what it loses in his conclusion that he can carry the great burden no longer. But there is no discouragement at the heart of the work; the secretaries, Doctors Henderson and Fox, are pushing with unresting vigor, and good responses cheer them from all sides.

—The Home Missions Council has worked out a comity plan under which the different denominations are invited to agree on a distribution of unoccupied territory, so that the various bodies shall respectively become responsible for churching unchurched communities within specified bounds. Obviously this implies a pledge from each party to the bargain that it will not invade territory set aside for another denomination. The scheme is exactly what now prevails on most foreign mission fields. The Methodist Episcopal Board of Home Missions has replied that it favors the arrangement in principle, but has no power to make or keep the compact until the General Conference of the church orders bishops and district superintendents to observe it. American Christian sentiment, therefore, will look to the next Methodist General Conference for such an order. The Protestant Episcopal board has answered in about the same terms as the Methodist board, but, of course, no one expects practical comity agreements from the Episcopalians. From the Methodists, on the contrary, there does exist a general expectation of fraternity which they cannot afford to disappoint. All other evangelical denominations seem ready for the plan; Methodist adherence will put it into effect.

—In the London press Bernard Shaw announces that "Christianity has not gained an inch since Christ." The inflated and ever inflating Bernard has made all his famous reputation by saying things that sound as if they might be so but aren't—and of course he must keep continually repeating the process. Else, in any sizable interval where Shaw kept silence or spoke homely, ordinary truth like common folks, the Shavian reputation would shrivel up and blow away—and without the attention of the public Shaw would be worse off than the boy who erstwhile stood on the burning deck—"Where, oh, where was he?" But this latest outgiving shows the Shaw reverse-sense machine still in good working order, and the attention of the public is no doubt saved until the lively gentleman can get round to think of something else equally sensational and equally shallow. Meanwhile interpreting after the true Shavian manner, we are without question to accept this remark about Christianity is a subtle tribute to the success of religion—a tribute which is indeed nothing to be proud of but less than nothing to worry over.

—Coming back with Fred B. Smith from their Men and Religion trip round the world, Raymond Robins with characteristic frankness admits learning several lessons while he has been instructing other people in many lands. In the Philippines he learned to believe, contrary to his untraveled impression, that the United States ought not to try setting up the Filipinos to govern themselves any time in the near future. An "anti-imperialist" before, Mr. Robins now tells friends that he thinks the presence of an American government in the Philippines well justified by what it has accomplished for the betterment of life there since the Spanish regime ended. By a similar reversal of former opinion, Mr. Robins learned in South Africa to be glad that the British won there rather than the Boers.

—Daily chaped service, held at noon of every school day at Columbia University, is not noted for the attendance of crowded throngs of either professors or students. In fact, out of a population of four or five thousand in the university community it is considered to be a good audience at chapel when twenty-five or thirty attend. Among the professors there is only one who appears at his place regularly every day, and that is Dr. Talcott Williams, the head of the Pulitzer school of journalism. The director's unfailing example has its effect on his students, and chapel attendance appears to be larger proportionately from the school of journalism than from any other department of the university.

The Easiest Thing to Talk About

BY BRUCE BARTON

NOT one of these men has an income of less than $12,000 a year; only one of their incomes is under $25,000. They are big, masterful, successful men. Three of them lead armies of workmen that number thousands; all, with the exception of my friend the editor, direct enterprises capitalized at millions, and the editor, by reason of his influence, has caused laws to be passed which probably have swayed as many millions as any of the others.

And this is the interesting thing about them all, the thing that makes this article worth writing: In every case I came to know these men through talking with them about religion. I had met them casually, to be sure, and with some of them I had developed a degree of intimacy. But I never really knew any one of them, never counted him a friend until I had shot a half diffident, half impertinent question to him on the forbidden subject. Sometimes I went at it with just a reporter's curiosity, asking, "What are you really trying to do? You've got all the money you want—why do you keep on working so hard?" I was just curious to know whether he had ever stopped to ask himself why he was doing it, whether he had ever heard the old verse about gaining the whole world. And sometimes I just broke in bluntly and asked, "Do you really think there is any God?"

> Contrary to usual opinions, many men of large achievement cherish ideals above money getting. In this article Mr. Barton tells what he discovered when he sounded the inner thoughts of several extraordinarily successful leaders. Difficult to "get to" on business matters, they talked freely on these subjects

There's some peculiar magic in that question. Somehow it seems to click way down deep inside a man, like the turning of a lock. I have had men stop short, push the letters and telegrams back on their desks, send their stenographers out of the room, and turn around and talk, sometimes until long after it was time for the office to close, sometimes until late at night.

The first of them is an official of one of the great railroads, in charge of all its lands and immigration. The territory under his immediate control is greater than the New England states. I have driven for days with him over one piece of 3,000,000 acres which he is putting under water—the largest single irrigation project in history. We were riding along in his private car one hot June afternoon when our conversation turned to religion. I wondered what he would say, for he is a man whom men regard as hard, in whom there are few of the gentler virtues. But he told me his vision:

"You know," he said, "I went to Europe last spring with my wife and daughter. We were to be gone a year, and when I left I thought it would be very pleasant to be away from the stress and demand of business, just to loaf and see and rest. We were over there six weeks when I left them and came back. My wife was disappointed and my friends couldn't understand it, wouldn't have understood it even if I had tried to explain to them. But the truth is the grip of this job has got me.

An Inspiration That Is Peopling a "Desert"

"Do you know what we are doing here? I'm not what you'd call a religious man, and I'm not always sure that I know there is a God. But if there is, then he left this part of his job unfinished, and we're finishing it for him. We're taking this desert and making it fit to live in. We're taking folks that have scraped and saved and starved through their young married life and bringing them up here into this new country where they can find health and leisure and comfort and education for their children and the fulfillment of dreams—where they can crystallize their existence into lives here on the rich fertile land. That may not be theology, but it's my religion. Before I die I expect to bring a million people up here into this new country and have them worshiping their God in happy, successful lives. That's why I couldn't stay in Europe; that's why I'm working eighteen hours a day; that's my faith."

One night on the broad veranda of his suburban home I talked with the chief executive of a worldwide corporation. We were talking of the abuses by great corporations and the attacks made upon them by the government, when I sprang my laboratory test question.

"My vision is a long way from realization," he said after a pause. "There are lots of abuses that have grown up inside great corporations; and when you are working with 23,000 men it's a long time after you shoot before the bell rings. But the first meeting I ever held with our directors I said, 'Gentlemen, the very first thing I propose to do is to put our own house in order. I mean to make this corporation so free from criticism in its business methods, so fair in its dealings with its employees, so open in its competition that it will be a model to all others of its kind.'"

Fighting to Do the Right Thing

He paused again. "It's a long, hard fight," he continued, "but we've made a little progress. We've adopted the most advanced profit sharing scheme that has yet been evolved; we have formed a mutual benefit association among our employees; we have offered to open our books wide to the government; we have reduced prices instead of raising them; and we have taken our company out of politics just so far as the politicians will let us. But progress is mighty slow. We're a long way off from our vision.

"For I believe our company can be made the greatest missionary society in the world. We go into a land stricken and barren and unprogressive, a land where women are hitched to the plows and men strive all day in the sun for a bare living, and we hand them the magic power of machinery. We make it possible for one man in an hour to do the day's work of three. We remove forever the haunting dread of famine; the joy of living takes the place of bitter struggle. The people are left emancipated to new happiness and education and real worship. That's my religion; there are lots of crosses in it, but it's a working creed."

"Did you ever stop to think what there is in the world that's worth trading your life for?" I asked a wonderful young man, who at 31 is making $25,000 a year as sales manager for a great corporation. "You've made enough money already to keep you the rest of your life. Why do you work so intensely—what are you after?"

A Vision Beyond Mere Money-Getting

He looked at me with a sort of mixture of scorn and pity. "Do you suppose it's money I'm after?" he spluttered. "Look at my clothes; look at the way I live; do you suppose money has any lure for me? I'll tell you what I'm after, though I don't know that I ever confessed it to anyone before. You know our sales are made by a large number of men, about 7,500 in all, who work on commission. I've got a picture of those 7,500 in my mind every minute of the day. They're an unhappy lot, most of them. Their incomes are precarious, their mode of work tends to make them rovers, most of them live beyond their earnings and they are constantly struggling with debt. They don't advance because they are only salesmen by necessity, because no one has ever really taught them to sell. If you want to know what I'm working for I'll tell you. I'm looking for the day when we will get our business with 2,500 men instead of 7,500. I'm going to pick out of this great, untrained army 2,500 men and train them. I'm going to teach them real salesmanship; I'm going to teach them to earn an average of four times what they are earning now. Instead of having them wandering over the country I'm going to make it possible for them to settle in districts and have homes, to be citizens and neighbors and friends, instead of guerrillas. I'm going to create 2,500 happy, progressing, God-fearing, home-loving families—turn 2,500 failures into successes. That's my dream, that's the thing that keeps me down here nights, the vision that pulls me up when this job seems sometimes too discouraging."

He looked at me a little reproachfully. "I don't think about ideals much because I've formed a sort of distrust for these fellows that do; but I'm sorry you ever got the impression that I was merely after money."

There is a man in New York who buys and sells big businesses. He is the confidential agent for men who invest thousands and sometimes millions on his mere word. Recently I went to talk with him about a business problem, meaning to stay for only a few minutes; instead we talked two hours. When I told a friend about it he was incredulous.

Two Hours to Talk Golden Rule; Business Minutes Precious

"Do you mean to say that he talked with you two hours?" he asked. "Why, I've tried for years to get close to that man, and I've never seemed to make any progress whatever," he grumbled. Yet the man and I had made a lifetime of progress. For he had told me in two hours what he believed and what he was trying to do. And the epitome of his story was this:

"I am trying so far as I know how to run this business on the principle of the golden rule. I'm trying never to have a deal go through this office on which both sides do not make a profit. I will not, if I know it, be a partner to any transaction in which I would not be willing myself to exchange places with either the seller or the buyer. That's the way I'm trying to make my religion work out here downtown."

Before I began to write this story I made out a list of the men I might mention in it, and I am not yet a quarter through the list. There is the big advertising man who makes $30,000 a year and has saved none of it, who told me he hoped that as a result of his living the advertising business as a whole might be drawn a little nearer to the ideals of the sermon on the mount. Or the big executive who said, "I hope before I die to have trained a hundred young men in this business who will carry the principles of honesty and square dealing and real service—the kind of service that Jesus stood for—into a hundred different businesses." Or the editor who said, "If I can hasten by just a little the coming of the kingdom of God in politics—not any mystical, impractical theory, but a working golden rule of service—I shall be satisfied." I might mention all of these and others.

The Easiest Thing to Talk: REAL Religion

But this is enough, I think, to prove that with most of the men who are doing real things in the world the easiest thing in the world to talk about is real religion. My friend Thomas Dreier, who likes to take the back cover off every man he meets and watch the soul go round, has tested the theory hundreds of times in some of the most diverse places—in the offices of department store heads and in the back rooms of saloons, in private cars of railroad presidents and in the offices of penitentiary wardens—and the percentage of his disappointments is astoundingly small. For the preachers who are discouraged because men are no longer interested in religion, he has stories to tell that could give them a new conception of the possibilities of their jobs.

There is a sort of conspiracy of hypocrisy among successful men, it seems, a shabby sort of pretense that they are worse than they really are. The good they do they explain away shamefacedly. "It is good business," they say. "We do it because it pays."

Of course it is good business and it does pay, but that is not why they do it. They do it because away under the surface, hidden from their partners and sometimes even unsuspected by their wives, they are nursing a dream. I like to scratch them with a sharp question and watch them bleed. And almost every sample of real red business blood that I've had examined has shown some trace of idealism—something which in the broader language of today can be called real religion.

The Real Battle for the Philippines

BY GUSTAVUS M. BLECH, M. D.

FROM THE EARLIEST dawn of history we have been taught that the world's great heroes were the martial spirits who went forth in battle array to fight some real or imaginary personal or national wrong. The shelves of our libraries are filled with musty volumes recording "man's inhumanity to man" on a thousand battlefields and the names of the illustrious soldiers and sailors whose effigies in marble and bronze attest the affection in which they are held in the hearts of their countrymen. The American school child is taught to venerate the names of Washington, Grant, Sherman, Johnston, Jackson and the Lees, not forgetting that among the real heroes of campaigns such as have made these men famous have been the modest soldiers who wore the brassard of the Red Cross and fought that invisible foe, camp disease, which was a thousand times more fatal than the heaviest shower of lead that ever fell on a battlefield.

Colonel L. Mervin Maus

From sad experiences during the war of 1861-1865 and our recent conflict with Spain we have been taught the folly of going to war without a well equipped medical department. Can anyone foretell what would have become of the hundreds of thousands of raw levies sent to the deadly camps of Florida, Cuba and the Philippines had it not been for the patriotic medical officers who left families and homes to protect their comrades of the line from that fearful but invisible enemy which gathers in for its toll a hundred brave men for every one killed by the enemy's bullets? To the medical corps falls the important duty of cleaning up the towns and cities of the vanquished foe, many of which as a result of war, pestilence and famine have become veritable charnel houses.

Only Half Conquered When Fighting Ceased

When the United States army entered Havana in December, 1898, only half the battle was won. The condition of the city was beyond description. Epidemic and pest diseases were encountered on every side and the streets and alleys were reeking with dirt and filth. To combat these fearful insanitary conditions the government called upon Colonel L. Mervin Maus of the army, who was the chief surgeon of the 7th army corps which had entered and taken possession of the city.

It is said of the great Moltke that in preparing his battle plans he simply placed his finger on the map, denoting a town or city to be captured, and remarked: "We will take this." The great leader had not burdened his mind with the thought of defeat. Such a word did not exist in his vocabulary. In the same spirit, Colonel Maus did not hesitate, doubt or stand dismayed before the great problem he was facing. He was a trained veteran in sanitation and held the key to the situation. Streets, forts, castles, prisons and hospitals were thoroughly cleaned and disinfected under his charge, and it can be said to his great credit that the large army of non-immune troops which occupied the forts and garrisons of the city maintained excellent health and were free from the yellow fever, which had decimated the Spanish garrison. Indeed the work was so well done and the city so thoroughly cleaned that Major Munson, the noted army hygienist, who was in Havana at the time, remarked that those who followed Colonel Maus would find little to do along sanitary lines.

Public Health Commissioner in Philippines

Leaving Havana early in the spring of 1899, Colonel Maus was called to the Philippines, which had become the center of great activity on account of the insurrection. After the campaign against Aguinaldo, in which he served as chief surgeon to General MacArthur, we next find him in Manila as commissioner of public health for the Philippines, to which position he was appointed by ex-President Taft, governor of the islands at the time.

Like all successful commanders, Colonel Maus was aware that the countless enemies he had to conquer could not be vanquished by directing orders from a comfortable office chair, so he took the field with his coworkers and constantly visited every section of the city, which was a veritable pest hole from bubonic plague, Asiatic cholera, smallpox, leprosy, beriberi and many other loathsome diseases with which the famine stricken natives were afflicted.

Leadership That Did Not Shirk Trenches

Many of the brave physicians and employees connected with the board of health succumbed to disease during the early days of American occupancy, and it is a wonder indeed that Colonel Maus escaped, for he not only marshaled his forces, organized and posted them for the performance of this most dangerous frontier fighting, but did not hesitate himself to enter the trenches and personally participate in as great a humanitarian battle as has ever been undertaken by a soldier of modern sanitary science. Men have penetrated the jungle to face the lion and tiger, but this is child's play when compared to the invasion of localities whose very breath exhales the poison of Asiatic cholera, smallpox, leprosy, plague and other death dealing pestilences.

Military science teaches that even the bravest and strongest enemy cannot successfully cope with a first class antagonist unless the army is disciplined and well organized. In order to cope with the situation in the Philippines Colonel Maus secured the enactment of a series of sanitary laws and saw that they were obeyed.

Our sanitary successes in the Philippines mark a new era. Owing to their great distance and the national lack of interest in the Philippines, the American people have not kept in touch with the progress of those islands, nor were they acquainted with the terrible condition of the people and country when the United States took possession of them fifteen years ago. From the date of Legaspi's arrival in 1565 until Dewey struck the blow in Manila bay which set them free, the Filipino people had made little or no advances in education or civilization. Ignorance, poverty, squalor and superstition encompassed them on every side, and they saw no ray of hope until America stretched forth her kind and loving hand.

The work accomplished along sanitary lines in Manila and the Philippines has practically revolutionized the social and economic conditions of the islands and reduced the death rate over 50 per cent since 1898. Laws pertaining to medicines and health have been enacted which stand as models of their kind throughout the world. Bubonic plague, with which the city was afflicted in 1901, has been eliminated; smallpox, the former scourge of the people, has been practically eradicated from the islands through the beneficence of compulsory vaccination; Asiatic cholera, which made its regular appearance from time to time, has ceased to be a visitor through health measures, cleanliness and sanitary instruction among the people.

Colonel Maus Moves Against Leprosy

Oriental leprosy, which had permeated every village and hamlet throughout the islands, is rapidly disappearing through the establishment of a colony on the island of Culion, to which all the unfortunates have been sent. The work of selecting a suitable island for the purpose was intrusted to Colonel Maus in 1900 by General MacArthur, who was greatly interested in the scheme. Splendid buildings, hospitals, schools, churches and places of amusement have been constructed on this fertile island by the civil government and under the care of superintendents and physicians over 4,000 of these unfortunates are being cared for. The mortality rate of leprosy averages about 100 to the thousand each year, and it is believed with no focal center left on the islands for infection this dreadful disease will disappear from the Philippines during the present generation.

Manila, the capital city of the archipelago, has become the most modern and healthiest city of the Orient. At the modern university founded in Manila a bureau of chemistry and biology has also been constructed and equipped with a staff of advanced and progressive investigators who are devoting their time to the study of diseases peculiar to man and animals in the tropics.

Manila is now blessed with a modern sewer system, excellent water supply, commodious harbor and wharves, splendid electric street car and lighting plant, new parks, wide streets, large hotels, hospitals, churches, clubs and places of amusement. Everything evidences the magnificent work performed by American brains and brawn.

America is justly entitled to the reputation of being the most progressive and altruistic nation on the face of the globe and should be proud of the courageous men who have founded the new colony in the Far East, which is destined to shed its civilizing influences into the remotest sections of the Orient.

Helpers or Hinderers?

BY ANNA C. WHITE

A WEALTHY, OVERBEARING woman, having occasion to call at the cottage of her washerwoman, was much disturbed by the attention of a little lad who had been gazing at her in solemn silence for some time. "What are you looking at?" she finally demanded irritably. "I was just wondering what you was a-thinking of I," came the unexpected answer, gravely given.

A wonder somewhat akin to this must occasionally arise in the minds of the newly arrived immigrants. Their early impressions, their reception in the new land, the treatment accorded them by the Americans, their first experiences of neglect and graft, all combine to confuse and bewilder the new citizen-to-be and to destroy any ideas and ideals they may have regarding the country to which they had turned such hopeful and ambitious hearts.

In the majority of cases the peasant of other lands comes to us with all sincerity of purpose and independence of spirit. The Pilgrim fathers landed to face dangers and hardships that in the end were to uplift and ennoble. The present-day immigrant enters upon a battle that often leaves him degraded and corrupt. In the old home he has lived in at least familiar surroundings. In the new land he is without friends and homeless. In the home town everyone was interested in his welfare and progress. In America no one is at hand to explain, encourage, or to help. He is dumped into the slums of a great city where the saloon, the disreputable lodging, and every manner of seductive evil await him; he is passed on to the interior and cheated, deceived and robbed in the passing. He is a stranger and we "take him in" in more ways than one. He cannot understand English and he becomes the prey of extortioners and the butt of American contempt.

Every once in a while the reading public is shocked by accounts of shooting outbreaks and violent quarrels among the alien crowd. We forget how these people are massed together under the most trying conditions. Of all tribes and nations, of varying dispositions and religions, with excitable natures inflamed still more by the unrestrained sale of liquor among them, with little or no effort put forth by the church to ameliorate their circumstances or educate them to higher ideals, is it any wonder that old-time rivalries should break out and matters be settled in familiar ways?

In a little Pennsylvania town of a little over 7,000 inhabitants only about 1,400 were Americans. The foreign element comprised twenty-nine nationalities, all differentiated by their various characteristics of language, religion, customs, politics and education. Is it unnatural to suppose that differences of opinion should be plainly expressed at times in such a Babel? A study of the housing of the alien in our cities and towns throws the searchlight of reason upon the cause of crime and the seemingly large percentage of evil among these peoples.

Who is to blame? Given a fair chance, met in half-way friendliness, trained with patience, treated with honesty and humanity, immigrants respond quickly. The church's neglect of them has been and is yet simply appalling. The very fact that they are aliens seems to be sufficient excuse for some church members to treat them with scorn and leave even the children untaught and unnoticed. Yet these are sheep who need nurture and careful shepherding. They are often naturally religious, they are ready to be convinced by any fair-minded argument, they come with open minds and hearts and the simplicity of the gospel message appeals with vital power to all that is best in them. Yet the church, a divinely appointed messenger, the visible expression of that Christianity that spells salvation, righteousness, progress and justice, withholds in pride and indifference the very secret of spiritual strength and power that is most essential in making these despised foreigners sturdy citizens and evangelistic Christians.

Thousands of neglected souls among these immigrants are today drifting into irreligion, infidelity, immorality and atheistic contempt, while those who claim to be followers of Christ are quibbling over creeds or unconcernedly passing by on the other side. When the great Christian body shall be aroused to the need of these new Americans, when it shall unitedly make war upon the organizations and institutions that are pulling them down, when it shall awaken to its responsibilities as a helper and its accountability as a hinderer, we shall hear much less of the criminal tendencies and malicious ignorance of the foreigner and more of his capabilities and progress.

IN THE LAND OF THE TOTEM POLE

Pictures by F. M. Metzgar Text by Louise B. Kaehler

SOUTHEASTERN Alaska is a treasure house of the picturesque. Besides gold mines, glaciers, snow-clad mountains and timber-clad islands, there are the quaintly carved totem poles and the quainter people who carved them, whose strange customs and arts and fondness for the water have earned for them the appellation of the Venetians of America.

Civilization and Christianity are doing away with the reverence for the totem poles among the tribes of most of the Alaskan Indians, but the old legends and traditions and history of the totem pole are always interesting to those who visit Alaska and there note with surprise what the marvelous teaching of the gospel has done for these tribes of Indians who once sat in darkness.

Family and ancestor worship is as old as the world, but nowhere is it more picturesquely followed than in the adoration of these carved and painted figures.

The totem pole is the visualized family tree of the Alaskan Indian; not only is it an object of veneration, but it is as significant as a genealogy in Burke's Peerage is to an Englishman. The Indians point back to a remote age when their ancestors lived in a beautiful land where, in a mysterious manner, the mythical creatures whose symbols they retain revealed themselves to heads of families of that day. They relate the traditional story of an overwhelming flood which submerged the land and spread death and destruction all around. Those who escaped in canoes were drifted about and scattered in every direction. After the flood had subsided, they located and staked out their preemption claims and formed new tribal relations. Thus it was that persons related by blood became widely sundered. Nevertheless they retained and clung to the symbols which had distinguished them before the flood. Hence the crests have continued to mark the descendants of the original founders of each family.

It is the ambition of all leading members of each clan in the several tribes to represent their rank by carving or painting their heraldic symbols on their belongings, and on the death of the head of a family a totem pole is erected in front of his house by his successor, on which is carved or painted more or less elaborately the symbolic creature of his clan. There were four large and important tribes in Alaska, the names of which in the Tsimshean language are Kish-Poot-Wadda, by far the most numerous hereabouts, having for symbols the finback whale (in the sea), the grizzly bear (on land), the grouse (in the air) and the sun and stars. The next clan known is the Cadda, who have for symbols the frog, raven, starfish and the bullhead. The Lacheboo, another clan, has the heron and the grizzly bear for totems, while the Lachsh Keak clan has the eagle, beaver and halibut carved on the totem poles.

Persons having the same crests are forbidden to marry—that is, a frog cannot marry a frog, or a whale a whale, but a frog can marry an eagle and a whale marry a wolf. All the children take the mother's crest and are incorporated as members of the mother's family, nor do they designate or regard their father's family as their relations. Therefore an Indian's heir is not his own son, but his sister's son. In case a woman is married into a distant tribe, away from her relatives, the offspring of such union when grown will leave their parents and go to their mother's tribe.

The oldest standing totem poles of today are found in the deserted Indian village of Old Kasaan, which are different from anything else in the world, just as the scenery surpasses all other scenery. Here are the finest carved totems of all Alaska. The oldest standing totems are a hundred years old; many of the fallen ones were carved more than 200 years ago. Some of them are shown at the right hand side of this page.

A Little True Story of Korea

BY LOUISE H. STRANG

IT WAS SPRING in Korea and the great pear tree in front of Ma Moksa's house was in full bloom, an immense white bouquet. In spite of her heavy heart, Ni Si admired it as she came into the compound. By and by it would be full of pears—small, gnarly pears, for which the missionary owner of the tree never seemed to care, but which the Koreans gathered eagerly.

Ni Si was glad that the days were warmer; there was less need of fuel and perhaps there would be work in the fields that would bring food for her little children. Her heart was sad, yet she did not despair. The Father above had kept her through the hard winter, and there was promise in the very breath of spring. Ah, had he not sent these very missionaries who were her good friends? Had they not left home and loved ones so far away that she could not comprehend the distance, and come to tell her people of the Saviour who had died for them? What a different life it made! With these thoughts she entered the house and found the missionary's wife, Ma Moksa Pouin, as Ni Si called her; literally the name meant "Pastor Ma's wife." It was helpful just to sit on the floor near this good friend; quietness and strength came from the Pouin's presence, and material help, too, for often there was work for the little woman.

Just then in came the American lady, the Meguk Pouin, as the Koreans called her. She was a visitor and could not speak the language, but Ni Si knew her by sight. The missionary began to talk in English, a mere babel of sounds to Ni Si.

"This is the little woman of whom I told you," she said. "I am trying to think of something I need in the city that she may go and buy it and then sell it to me. On the few sen gained she and the children live." "Poor little thing!" replied the other; "and I never lacked food in my life! Yet what a contented face she has."

"She never complains," said the missionary. "She is always patient. Her father has become a drunkard and her husband, a promising young man, has taken up one kind of business after another, till now, a failure, he is killing himself with opium. He lies at home and she must feed the children. She buys fruit and chestnuts in the city and sells them at a tiny profit; she sews, works in the field, in fact, does anything she can."

The American Pouin looked up. "She sews? Could she make me one of the pretty sleeveless jackets with the fur lining?" "Indeed yes. I'll see to it at once."

Ni Si's face brightened perceptibly as the request was put into Korean and also an order given for fruit. God always helped her in some way; she knew he would not fail her, and with a happier heart she left the missionary's house. A few days later, when the pear tree was shedding its blossoms in a shower of white petals, she returned bringing the pretty sleeveless jacket such as the Korean women wear, fashioned of white silk and lined with curly lamb's wool, a dainty garment.

And on that day another conversation was carried on in English which she did not understand. "Ni Si has been telling me," said the missionary, "how her little girl longs to go to school." "How many children has she?" asked the American lady. "Two little girls," was the reply. "The oldest is about 8 and wishes she could learn to read. 'Why,' said the mother, 'it's all I can do to get food for her, to say nothing of school.'" "Tell me about the school," said the visitor.

"Well, you know the Korean Christians support not only their own churches and pastors but also the primary schools connected with the church. The idea of those who began the mission work here was that we are sent primarily to preach the gospel. After the Christian church was established, there arose the necessity for educating the children of Christians under Christian influences—they must not be sent to the heathen schools. So the Korean churches established their primary schools, each child paying a small tuition fee, which provides for building, heat, and teacher's salary. Besides that, he pays for his own books and writing materials."

The American lady looked up quickly. "How much would it cost for the little girl to go to school for the rest of this year?" "Let me see—this is April; her entrance fee and the two months' tuition would amount to about 3 yen, or a dollar and a half."

"Is that all?" exclaimed the other. "Oh, I want to send the child to school—a child who longs to go to school!"

The missionary smiled happily. "Shall I tell her?" she asked. "Yes, right now; I'll give you $2."

And then in what to the American visitor seemed a babel of sounds, Ma Moksa Pouin evidently communicated her friend's desire, for the brown face of the little Korean woman grew strangely happy and she turned to the other with, "Komapsamnaita, Pouin, manhi komapsamnaita," which the American knew meant "Thank you very much," in what is called "high talk."

It brought happiness to the American, too, in the days following. One day the little girl herself came with the mother to say "Komapsamnaita."

Have you ever seen a little Korean girl? She is a reproduction in miniature of her mother, with her bright chogari, stiff starched white skirt, immaculate white socks, her glossy black hair in a long braid and her black eyes shining as she stops directly in front of you and bows her "Pyengan hasimnaika." The American lady was highly entertained. "Isn't she a dear little mite? I want her to read to me."

So little Yung Sooni took the red hymn book and sang from it in order to show her skill in reading. It is easier to learn to read in Korean than in English, for each queer-looking letter of the alphabet has its own sound. Indeed, the American lady herself had learned to read in a week—though she did not know what she read!

"The little thing calls you her mother," said the missionary. "That is her way of showing her appreciation."

"So I have a daughter," laughed the other. "Why, this is my second one. Did I tell you of the other? Well, that windy day last week, I was passing at recess the school for the little Americans—the missionary children. Just then the little sister of the Korean who cares for the building went through the gate, her water jar on her head. Suddenly, the wind blew the gate shut, the jar was broken and the child drenched. The American children took her into the schoolhouse to dry her clothes and I gave them 10 sen to buy a new jar. Since then, they tell me that she too calls me her mother. Daughters come cheap—$2 for one and 5 cents for the other!

"Dear people," she continued, "it's the personal part. Even if we cannot understand each other's speech, we know when the other cares, and takes an interest in us. I think when I give away Korean tracts and say, as you have taught me, 'Jesu miterago' [Believe in Jesus], that it is not my bit of broken Korean that may help, but the fact that the foreign Pouin cares about their believing."

On another day the missionary took the American lady to visit the girls' school which happy little Yung Sooni attended. To the visitor the sight was strange enough. There were several low-ceiled rooms, filled to overflowing with girls of various ages, some knitting, some studying, some reciting, others working problems in arithmetic on the blackboard. There were no desks such as are used in America, but the girls sat upon straw mats on the floor and for desks used low tables the height of benches. The teachers were Korean women and everybody seemed busy and happy. "What do they study?" asked the visitor.

"Arithmetic, geography, physiology, Chinese and the Bible," replied the missionary. "Their knowledge of the Bible is excellent and they could put to shame many an American girl. Chinese is to Korean much what Latin is to English, for the race came originally from China—it is even more to them than the Latin to us, for Chinese is a living language. You know the Chinese, Japanese and Koreans all use the Chinese characters, but as they pronounce the characters differently, they cannot communicate in speech, though they can do so in writing."

"Like the Arabic figures," said the other. "When I go to the Japanese stores I motion for the price to be written. We both understood the figures, though we have different names for them. Of course in larger places the Japanese speak English."

This, however, was not the end of the school episode. The American lady wrote to some friends telling of her "daughters," and later came a letter from an American girl:

"Dear Miss Benton: Do you know of a little girl who would like to go to school? You said that $5 would be enough to send her for a whole year. My sister and I have a $5 gold piece that father gave us and we should like to send a little girl to school. From RUTH."

A postoffice order was inclosed.

When the Meguk Pouin read this letter she gave a little scream of delight and ran to tell her friend. And that very day who should

THE HOME COUNCIL

The Golden Rule for the Home Library

BY ALICE URBAN

IN ORDER to preserve the integrity of the home library it has sometimes become necessary to establish a standard of privilege regulating the borrowing and lending of books. With books, as with all other things, a part of the pleasure of possession lies in the sharing with others; but so irresponsible has become the exchange of books that there are many who confess to shrinking from subjecting the precious home library to the kind of usage which returns the volumes to their places on the shelves soiled, defaced and coverless.

How can we keep our home libraries intact and in cleanly array, and still follow our natural generous impulse to pass along our store of literary treasure? It surely would be selfish to impose upon others the uncompromising remedy some one has prescribed: Read only such books as you can own. Besides, the public library with its wide range of literature and its free circulation has changed the old conditions and formed new habits of reading. But it would hurt no one to conform to the general restriction of borrowing only under stress of need or rare opportunity.

Prodigal Lending in Part Responsible for Depleted Bookshelves

This restriction applies not so much to the freer circulation of the current volume as to the books composing the formal library of the student or of the home. Here it often happens that there is sad depletion among valuable sets, simply as a result of prodigal borrowings, and, yes, prodigal lendings; for the responsibility does not rest with the borrower alone.

> As good almost kill a man as kill a good book; who kills a man kills a reasonable creature, God's image; but he who destroys a good book kills reason itself, kills the image of God, as it were, in the eye.—Milton.

Many a gap on bookshelves is due to the carelessness of the lender. He has taken no account of his lendings, as he ought to have done, by some method of record. Such a record should be a part of the "system" of the individual home. In every vacant place in my own library I place a card with the penciled name of the borrower of the missing book, and the date of the borrowing. An unsightly multiplying of the vacant places, if not the actual need of the missing volumes, reminds me that it is time to recall my treasures, and guided by the cards, I begin to gather them home.

Whatever the adopted method of regulation or record concerning book-lending and book-borrowing, there should be no compromise when it comes to the care given the borrowed volume. If you have ever shrunk from replacing a carelessly soiled volume among its clean companions, you will agree with me in this.

I recall a time of actual suffering during an enforced observance of what might be called a begriming process. For several weeks a busy young woman carried with her everywhere—on train, veranda, lawn, and in hotel dining room—what I knew to be a borrowed book. It was, moreover, the first of a set of volumes.

Apparently unconscious of her crime, the eager reader sacrificed to the wear and tear of her spare moments the freshness of the soft green and gold, thoughtlessly left uncovered, exposed to the soil of handling and accident. My book loving heart quivered in sympathy for the owner. How would she bear the sad contrast of this dingy volume with its bright companions? But it happened that in this particular instance the owner was not entitled to sympathy, as she actually allowed the young woman to borrow the other volumes of the handsome set!

Courtesy in Lending Met by Courtesy in Handling

In the bygone days of few books, when the library was a sentient part of the home, what tender care was given the much-read volume whose dimmed covers and worn pages bespoke the eager, loving touch of many hands! In those days the courtesy of lending was met by the courtesy of careful handling. There were protective coverings to encase the borrowed book—wrappings of soft paper or cambric, fortified by the "thumbpiece" and the bookmark to lessen the possibility of soil and dog-eared leaves.

Our trouble today is that our new privilege of books has lessened our reverence for them until they are more often mere acquaintances than valued friends.

Parents who would enlist the aid of their children in building up and preserving the home library, should early instill into youthful minds that thoughtful estimate of books which will insure not only a reverent care of the home volumes, but a willing practice of the golden rule that asks: Do unto the borrowed book as you would have others do to the book that is borrowed from you.

Meeting the Need of the Business Mother

THAT THIS is increasingly the day of women's work has been somewhat recently demonstrated by the Cooperative League of Chicago in the establishment of two clubs, or homes, for business mothers and their children. There have been homes for working girls, homes for women without children, homes and institutions for the children themselves, but up to the time when the Cooperative League established its first home nearly three years ago, no way had been found to care at a modest sum for both mothers and children where the burden of support fell upon the mother.

The idea of homes where low-waged mothers could live independently with their children, secure also in the comforting knowledge that the little ones would be properly and tenderly cared for during business hours, first germinated in one mother's grievous need. This mother, thrown suddenly on her own resources by the death of her husband, was unable in all this big city of Chicago to find a single private home which would receive her year-old baby and give it the love and attention she felt it ought to have while she was at work. She finally had to send her bonny son to a distant state, to a friend to whose keeping she knew she could trust him safely.

One who went through the experience with her, herself a mother, made a vow then and there that she would find a way sometime, somehow, to establish a home, a real home, for mothers whom misfortune had forced out into the industrial world.

That vow has been fulfilled, and thus the first Business Mothers' Club of Chicago came into being, through the efforts of the Cooperative League, a society purely nonsectarian, founded for the purpose of establishing and maintaining, without pecuniary gain to its members, residential clubs for business women with children.

This home-making, home-conserving society is built upon the belief that it is the privilege of every woman to be a homemaker, and her royal prerogative to be a mother; that if necessity forces her into becoming a wage-earner, thus depriving her of her natural rights as a woman, society owes it to her to supply these womanly privileges, so far as it is able. Also, the league, realizing that the child of today is to be the citizen of tomorrow, believes in surrounding the child deprived of his natural home and otherwise of necessity intrusted to the chill mercies of institution or boarding house, with all those tender home influences necessary for his proper mental, spiritual and physical development. And finally, it insists that, for the best good of both, the vital relationship between mother and child should be kept inviolate. All this the league is accomplishing through the two clubs already established.

Conditions of entrance to the clubs are simple: The mother must be a business woman with children, dependent on her own resources for a living. She must show a clean bill of character. The length of her stay depends entirely upon herself. Her conduct must be entirely in harmony with the spirit of the home. There must be no airs of conscious superiority, no influence which shall stir up strife or produce discontent or unhappiness. Her duties are simple—to keep her room in order, dress her children in the morning and put them to bed at night, and keep their clothing neat. The laundry is at her disposal, but she is not supposed to use it on Sunday if she can possibly manage it any other time.

Food of the very best is generously provided, and is chosen with regard to individual needs. Medical service is provided without extra charge.

A housemother is in charge of each home—a real mother, not simply a matron, who understands children and their needs, and mothers the mothers themselves, too, when they need it.

Each home has also a conscientious and dependable kindergartner, who is the younger children's chum and companion during the day, and the friend and helper of the older children, whom she starts off to school at the proper time, and lifts over lesson difficulties during study hours at home. The children have their own playhouse, fully equipped with gymnastic apparatus and games and toys.

For these privileges the stipulated amount charged is $4 a week for the mother and $3 for each child. A special arrangement is made for the mother whose circumstances are particularly straitened; and the mother who loses her position, or who must forfeit her salary for a time because of illness, is cared for at the club until she is again on her feet. For this reason the clubs probably never will be entirely self-supporting.

Membership in the Cooperative League, $2 a year, is open to all who are in sympathy with its aims, regardless of nationality or creed. The payment of $25 secures a life membership, and it is the earnest hope that an endowment fund may be established.

Dues and special gifts have made possible the two homes now in operation, and the need of others is pressing; for numerous homes with a small membership are planned, rather than increase in the housing capacity of the homes themselves. Thus the league hopes to keep away from the institutional suggestion, and to preserve the true spirit of the genuine home. For this reason probably no club will ever receive more than twenty mothers with their children. This work should not be confined to Chicago alone. Similar conditions and their resultant needs exist in other cities to the same degree. Mothers elsewhere are facing a problematical future, in which business life threatens to annihilate the home and to throw children, if not onto the street, at least into the somewhat questionable associations of institutional life. The Cooperative League of Chicago looks forward to a time when its ideas and ideals will be put into practical and nationwide use. S. C. R

Nibbles Nutcracker of Bird-Tree Hollow

BY REBECCA DEMING MOORE

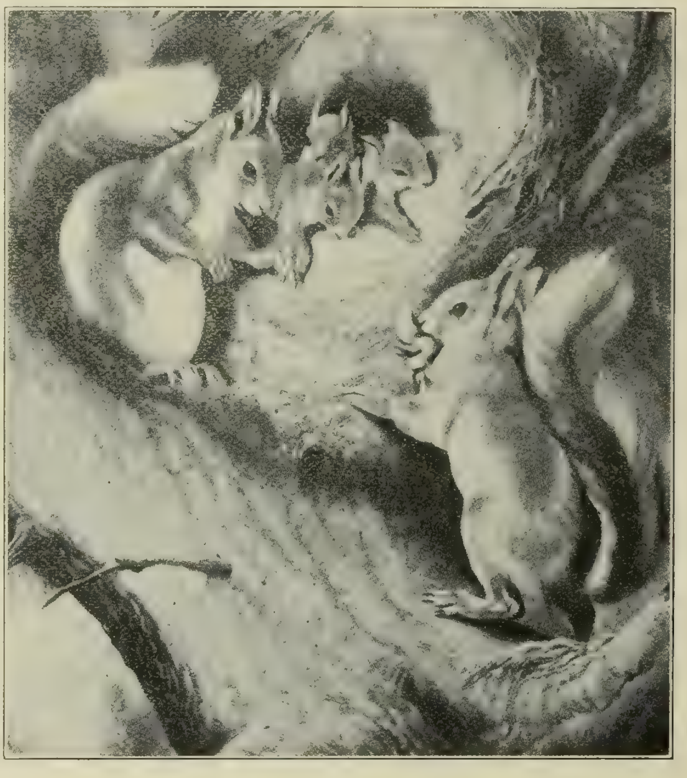
NIBBLES NUTCRACKER was a tiny baby, only two and a half inches long; but Mrs. Nutcracker was not in the least disturbed by his size, for she had two other babies who were not one whit larger. Besides, if the babies had been bigger they would never have fitted into Mrs. Nutcracker's cozy little home in Bird-Tree Hollow.

Nibbles and his brother and sister were born in March. They were very red little babies, their heads a little darker than their bodies, and their tiny toenails were black, with white tips. They couldn't see one another nor the kind mother who lapped them so fondly, because their eyes were tightly closed.

Perhaps you have guessed by this time that Nibbles Nutcracker was a wee squirrel. He looked very much like your old Kitty Gray's kittens, and he acted like them, too; and this mother purred like Kitty Gray but in rather more harsh a tone. Nibbles and Silky Coat mewed at first, and when they grew a little older they squealed, when they thought Mother Nutcracker was washing their faces a little too hard.

When they were three weeks old the babies had some warm new gray dresses. Their tails were growing finely, too. When they were five weeks old, their dresses were trimmed with pretty fine white hairs. Just one week later there was great rejoicing in the Nutcracker family, for all three little gray Nutcrackers had opened their eyes on the squirrel world. Mrs. Nutcracker was very proud that her babies were making such progress, but they still needed her careful attention. Their legs were very weak and wabbly, and they were cutting those sharp teeth that they would need later on for cracking nuts. They had a very droll kind of teething ring—they bit at their mother's teeth!

Now that their teeth were coming on so well, Mother Nutcracker thought they needed something more than a plain milk diet, so she used partially to chew a nut meat and then let the three children take it from her. There was a great chattering and, I'm sorry to say, some quarreling when this was going on.



At Home in Bird-Tree Hollow

Perhaps you will wonder where Father Nutcracker was all this time. To tell the truth, the house was not large enough for him, and besides, Mrs. Nutcracker's temper was just a little uncertain while the babies needed so much care. He much preferred visiting among his friends to staying at home with the family. Besides, the babies were getting harder and harder to manage and Mrs. Nutcracker began to look forward to the time when she could take them out of doors. Their little one room house was becoming decidedly close quarters for her growing family.

It was a joyful day when the baby Nutcrackers had their first outing. They frisked and frolicked; Nibbles even put his two little arms around Silky Coat's neck, he was so delighted, and Bobby combed out his brother's now really beautiful tail with his sharp little claws. Mother Nutcracker was glad her children were behaving so well, because the neighbors in their snug homes in a near-by hollow tree were craning their necks and cocking their little beady eyes to see what was going on. She marched proudly ahead, beckoning to her young ones to follow.

From that time on there were daily excursions, and every day they learned a little more about looking out for themselves in the big new world of outdoors. They were really going to school—a squirrel school, where the lessons were climbing and balancing, nut hunting and nut gathering. And how they loved those lessons! At first Nibbles Nutcracker was very timid about running over high branches. They were so far, far up in the air. Once he lost his balance and fell down, down until he caught at another branch with his sharp little toenails. Next time he was not quite so much frightened, for he knew those sharp toenails would save him a fall. Once when the claws failed to catch at anything, he found he landed on the ground squarely on his feet and quite unharmed.

Nibbles Nutcracker didn't know how much that pretty tail of his, acting as a balancing pole, helped him in climbing. He was proud of it, though, and liked to curl it over his pretty gray coat, which was now thicker and glossier than ever. Nibbles thought this beautiful tail had been given him solely for ornament, but he was to learn that it was his winter overcoat, as well as a convenient towel when he washed himself. Mrs. Nutcracker had brought up her children to be very neat, so face washing was one of his earliest accomplishments. Using his paw for a wash cloth, he would scrub away, just as you have seen Kitty Gray do.

The lessons went on daily. Mrs. Nutcracker, although she scolded and chattered a good deal, was an excellent teacher, making her children try and try again until they were letter perfect in climbing and jumping. Nibbles liked his climbing lessons best of all, for once in a while he could take a good swing, just as you may have done on a grape vine.

There were other things to be learned, too, serious things. Nibbles and the other children had to be taught how to tell where a beechnut lay buried in the ground. This was a very difficult thing to learn, and how he did it I really don't know, nor does anyone else outside of the Nutcracker family, I imagine. Then, the nut once secured, Nibbles found out just where to put those two long sharp teeth of his to reach the broad side of the nut meat first. Tree buds, maple and elm, he discovered were also good to eat.

There came a time when Nibbles had to learn that nuts were not always to be eaten immediately. He was taught that sooner or later there would be no more lying about on the ground or fastened tight in their burs on the branches. Nibbles learned to curb his appetite and run with the toothsome nut to a convenient hollow, where there was already quite a collection.

Now about the neighbors of the Nutcracker family. There were many of them, and I am sorry to say they did not always get on in a very friendly fashion. Bobby Blue Jay was a great tease. Nibbles disliked him heartily, and really he was not at all polite. When Nibbles wasn't looking he would run toward him and peck him with his beak or beat him with his pretty wings. Poor Nibbles would whirl around, surprised and angry at such treatment; but however fast he might run, he could never catch saucy Bobby Blue Jay.

There were other neighbors, too; in fact, they were relatives with whom the Nutcrackers were on very bad terms. These were the Red Squirrel family. They were always quarreling. Sometimes the Reds stole the Nutcrackers's nuts, and what was worse, they would take tiny eggs out of the birds' nests and think nothing of making a meal of them. Sometimes they would even run away from their forest homes to the nearest farms, where they would steal corn or anything they could find. They were lazy, too, and didn't always make a store of nuts. In fact, Mrs. Nutcracker could hardly be blamed for urging her family to have just as little to do with them as possible.

Other little cousins of our Nutcrackers were the Chipmunks. They were not naughty like the Reds; but they had never learned to climb and preferred to run swiftly over the ground or piles of loose stones, so the Nutcrackers seldom played with them. They wore very pretty red coats, which were marked tastily down the back with three stripes of black and two of white.

But of all their friends and relatives, the Nutcrackers admired most the Flyers, or the flying squirrels as they are called by some on account of their wonderful accomplishment. Nibble Nutcracker thought himself a fine acrobat until one day he saw one of his cousins, a Flyer, jump from a tree. Nibbles held his breath as he saw young Flyer leap down, down from the very top of a tall maple. Nibbles knew he would never have dared to make such a leap, skillful as he thought himself. He really felt very much disgusted with his own performance until he saw that to help him Flyer's coat had an extra frill fastened to his legs. If Nibbles had ever heard of balloons he would have known that this was very much like what a balloonist calls a parachute.

Nibbles and his brother and sister have long since grown to be fine large squirrels. They attended to their lessons so well that now they are quite able to look after themselves. In fact, their mother has given up taking care of them. They now do just as they please, but they have been so carefully trained that I am sure they are no naughtier in any way than other squirrels.

Sole Use for His Head

"Oh, Willie, Willie!" cried a teacher to a hopelessly dull pupil. "Whatever do you think your head is for?"

Willie, who evidently thought this another of the troublesome questions that teachers were always asking, pondered it deeply. "Please, miss," he replied at length, "to keep my collar on!"

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

October 19, 1913—The Report of the Spies

Everyday View of the Lesson

By J. L. Scott

Lesson Text, Numbers 13:1-3, 17—14:25. Golden Text, Romans 8:31: If God is for us, who is against us?

Journeys mean more than the mere distance they cover. About fifteen months ago the children of Israel left the land of the Pharaohs for the one promised of God. The distance was not great, but because of the circuitous routes followed they had probably gone some 400 miles. Measured by incident and lesson, they had gone much farther. One's essential lifetime may be compressed within the compass of a few days. The Israelites lived longer the night they crossed the Red sea than they had lived for centuries. Everything is relative, and judged by that standard one may become old in the shortest time.

No journey could have been more eventful. Great waters had been crossed on foot; bread had fallen from the clouds, and a people without law had been transformed into a nation. We live long in proportion as we live fully.

Moses Could Reward with Sight the Faith of the Israelites

But the journey seemed to be approaching the end. The borders of Canaan were in sight and the dream of centuries was about to be realized. From the first it had been a journey of faith. God had manifested himself at every turn. Like that other journey of which it is a type, his presence was essential day and night. The time had come for Israel to pass from the desert to the land of promise. Moses was faithful. He stood upon the border and said: "Jehovah thy God hath set the land before thee; go up, take possession, as Jehovah, the God of thy fathers, hath spoken unto thee."

But evidences of distrust were all too apparent. A spirit of doubt had seized the people. Again the lawgiver urged, more emphatically than before: "Dread not, neither be afraid." And still they hesitated.

We have all witnessed the same thing. There comes a crisis in human life. One stands upon the border and hesitates as to what to do. He is not far from the kingdom of God, but fear has taken control of his will. There are enemies before whom he dreads to meet. God urges him on with promises that would draw him, but fear holds him to his place. His faith fails at the crucial test. Such was the condition of Israel. The gates were open, but the people hesitated to pass through. Instead of action there was delay. They doubted God. He had promised much, but sight must confirm faith.

Spies Impressed by the Land but Depressed by Its Inhabitants

Twelve men were to be sent ahead to test out the truthfulness of God. Moses consented and patiently waited forty days for their return. That there should be two reports was only natural. The fertile resources of the country had impressed each alike. It was indeed a land flowing with milk and honey; from that there was no dissent. But the one feature of the land which seemed most to impress the people was the character of its inhabitants. Humanity is the most important product of any country. Daniel Webster used to say that the glory of New Hampshire lay not in her harvests, but in her men.

The grapes of Eschol were desirable, but by what walls were they guarded? Here the spies differed. Ten recalled the people as a race of giants. Fear magnifies everything upon which it looks. That the Canaanites were a strong race is a historic fact, but those men saw things through a distorted vision. Their sympathies were not with Moses.

Some men are born with their faces toward the sunset. These belonged to that class. Any movement beyond the border naturally enlisted their opposition. And unfortunately their kind are not extinct. Such men delight to serve on committees, but the sons of Anak are sure to figure in their reports.

Caleb and Joshua, on the contrary, were hopeful. They conceded the existence of difficulties, but felt themselves in touch with God. In the one case there was faith, in the other fear. The success of most churches is due not to the many but to the few. Thank God for our Calebs and our Joshuas! They redeem much that otherwise would fail.

The two felt a strength that the ten did not know. There was a God who was ready to help and overcome. He had been their salvation before, and only waited to be such again. But the people believed the ten, as they are ever likely to do. Caleb and Joshua they would stone, and Moses they would set aside.

The Chronic Objector Clogs the Wheels of Progress

Right and wrong are never questions of majorities; two may be on the side of God, while ten are against him. Men are strong only in proportion to their faith. Neither the world nor the church owes anything to the chronic objector. He dulls the sickles of those who would reap and closes the barn against the harvest. Israel listened to the ten and thus demonstrated an unfitness to enter upon the promise.

Opportunities seldom come twice to the same person. The people were turned back into the desert, while another generation marched over their graves to an inheritance that might have been theirs. One stands upon the borders of a better life. He hesitates to cross over because of his fears. He listens while Satan tells him of towns walled to the heavens and of giants ready to destroy. He forgets that God has promised to be a part of his future. Such an omission is fatal, and thus Kadesh-barnea becomes but another type of life.

The Lesson Verse by Verse

By Hermon D. Jenkins

Analysis—Although God had assured Israel of victory, the people hung back and insisted upon seeing the land for themselves. They chose men of social standing, "princes," rather than men of faith. The natural result followed—divided counsels, weak endeavor and threatened ruin.

Faith and fear do not see with the same eyes. Men who must see everything before risking anything seldom make a success of life. It is better to study our duties than to measure our obstacles. If it is our duty to bring the world to Christ it matters nothing to us whether the world contain fifteen persons or fifteen hundred millions. In any active campaign no one knows less about what is going on before him than the soldier in the ranks. It is enough for the commander to know the aim and end.

It is better to know and trust our Leader than to inquire whither we are being led. There is no doubt Palestine, or the land of Canaan, as it was then commonly called, was at the time of the exodus the gem of the East. Its lofty mountains rose between the sands of Egypt and the wide desert which separated its inhabitants from the "Far East." In this historic seat it alone had noble forests, now almost entirely swept away, and its different elevations gave to it a variety of grains and fruits possessed by no other land. Its abundant rains in most years afforded a profitable agriculture, and its profusion of wild flowers produced the honey for which it was everywhere as famous as it was famous for its herds and their milk (Ex. 13:5). Even now when it has been swept by interminable wars and after the destruction of its forests by drenching floods, evidence abounds on every side that it was formerly the seat of a large population enjoying an abundance coveted eagerly by the people of other lands. Palestine, like Lombardy, possessed that "fatal gift of beauty" which made her plains the scene of almost perpetual warfare.

Spies Men of Ability, but Lacking in Vision

Verse 2—In order that the people might not think the decision already cut and dried, the men chosen for this delicate task were their natural representatives, the shieks of their various tribes. They were men of some ability without doubt or they would not have achieved their present position. But it was soon evident that they had not achieved their place by courage or by faith. An officer who had become famous in our civil war published later a volume on the "Barren Lands in the Interior of the United States," in which he designated as absolutely worthless vast sections of land now selling at $50 an acre. He was a good soldier, but a poor farmer and a poor judge of farm land.

Verse 3—Moses sent these men from their long sojourn at Kadesh-barnea, but he could not give them his eyes or his faith. Lacking these, they only added to the difficulties of an already difficult situation.

Charles Darwin spent his life in studying animals. He wrote a book on pigeons and another on the angleworm. But people insisted on asking his judgment in vexed questions of philosophy. Thomas Edison has been marvelously successful in developing the commercial uses of electricity, and so, when doubters wished to know whether the soul was immortal, they went to him with the question. The higher truths are revealed not to the bigger brain but to the childlike heart (Mat. 21:16). A man may read Hebrew readily, but misread the needs of his child.

The Majority Report Is Not Necessarily the True Report

Verse 25—The explorers spent a good deal of time in their investigation but learned little. They learned that the soil was fruitful, the orchards prolific and the bees industrious, but they did not learn that God was able to bestow the land upon them through marvels wrought among the heathen (Ps. 2:8).

When they found the land abounding in those peculiar products which had been prophetically described to them (Ex. 13:5), it would seem as though they ought to have accepted the rest of what was told them as incontrovertible. So the Christian's experience in this world, conforming to what the Bible says of it, gives him assurance that heaven will be as described in the same divine oracles.

Verses 28-29—Readers of Cæsar's "Gallic War" will remember the famous passage in which his undersized soldiers from Italy regarded the German warriors as "giants." Cæsar had hard work to bring his veteran legions out of their "funk," so demoralized were they by the sight of whole tribes exceeding any stature they had ever seen among Oriental enemies. Undoubtedly these mountaineers (v. 29) were men of great bulk and sinews, as most mountaineers are. But in the make-up of a soldier, while we desire bulk, obedience and courage, we can spare the first more readily than either of the others.

It Was Two Against Ten, but the Two Won Out

Verse 30—Caleb was joined by Joshua (Num. 14:6, 24). Both men were born leaders, and both were old men (Num. 14:22-23). But students familiar with history will recall that the Venetains failed in their attempt to take Constantinople until led by Dandolo, then ever 90 years of age. Neither Caleb nor Joshua denied the fact that there were men of huge stature to oppose their march or that the people of the land dwelt in cities fortified by the best military art of the day. They denied nothing and affirmed a great deal. They affirmed their ability to seize and hold the land God had intended for them. It was Joshua who led the army across the swollen Jordan (Josh. 3:9-17); and it was Caleb who chose for his position in the new land its most difficult fields and its mountain fastnesses, asking no help but promising to take it with his own hand (Josh. 14:6-15).
